BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY
3 9999 08655 213 8

№ 7661.50

J.1

GIVEN BY

Ex. from C. J. Libbie & Co.

Exchange from
C. F. Libbie & Co
Nov. 28, 1913
*7665.50

THE JURISPRUDENT.

1946

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, CORNER OF WASHINGTON AND SCHOOL STREETS.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 10, 1830. NO. I.

MERCANTILE LAW.—No. I.

Municipal jurisprudence may be classified under two general heads; that which is purely conventional, and that which is founded on generally received principles of natural equity. Now it is evident, we think, that this latter division possesses more interest than the other. An exquisitely artificial system, like that which regulates the course of real property in this country, has indeed charms for the antiquarian and the lawyer; but to the general reader it necessarily presents an aspect not only unattractive, but, we fear, absolutely forbidding. We would not be understood, however, to disparage the study of this part of our law, or to deny that occasionally it takes strong hold upon the imagination. It may be, and no doubt is, amusing enough to a man of curious and speculative turn to trace the machinery from its original structure, simple but compact, rude yet effective, down to the ingenious and elaborate apparatus, which has at length become too complicated for the management of any but the most scientific practitioner. Nor is the investigation without this further interest, that the successive additions and modifications, which the system has undergone in its progress, illustrate and are illustrated by the manners, customs, state of knowledge, and history in general, of the different periods through which it is deduced. To a mind, therefore, constituted like that of Butler, such a study is remarkably congenial, and may be supposed to convey a proportionate enjoyment. But there are not many, who have either the taste to relish such inquiries, or the industry to prosecute them with effect.

Again, we can readily conceive that it must be an intellectual exercise of a very pleasing kind, and one exactly resembling that of the geometrician or algebraist, to obtain from a few general axioms, first, the leading propositions, and from these again, by regular deduction, the whole body of subordinate rules with their corollaries, which make up the law of real property; to work out the intricate problems which the occasions of a state of society like ours continually give rise to; and to apply the general formulæ to cases and circumstances to which, at first sight, they seem but ill-adapted. It is precisely this sort of gratification, which we can suppose to have been enjoyed in an eminent degree by the subtle and ingenious Fearne. But this also, as well as the other, evidently presupposes a peculiar aptitude, either natural or acquired. In all probability the great majority even of those, who may honor us by becoming readers, are neither antiquarians, nor black-letter-lawyers, nor mathematicians; are not absolutely enamoured of Lord Coke; nor would quite forget to dine, in their eagerness to settle the almost invisible boundary, which separates a conditional limitation from a contingent remainder. We may, therefore, safely revert to our original position, that the study of that branch of law, which is arbitrary in its principles, and artificial in its structure, has no great claim to general interest.

But the case is very different with that which has its foundation in reason and equity. There is no man with a well ordered mind, by whom the distinctions of right and wrong, even with all their niceties of shade and gradation, can be contemplated with indifference. There is no man to whom the practical application of admitted principles in the distribution of justice, or rather in the correction of injustice, can fail to be directly interesting. Here every decision may be referred to a standard recognised and adopted by all. Every man is in himself a test of its soundness. It is no longer authority, but reason; it is no longer mere law; it is truth, and nature, and morality. The further, therefore, we recede from regulations merely technical, the nearer we approach to the fountain head of natural justice, the more generally interesting does the inquiry become. Some mixture of positive rules there must and will be in every part of the system; but if there be any which is peculiarly exempt from artificial subtleties, and more directly referrible to equitable principles than another, it is unquestionably that which relates to commercial transactions.

Indeed, this branch of our law may be considered rather as the accessary than the principal. It merely comes in aid of what is already established. It rarely originates anything; but simply enforces the obligations of conscience, and sanctions the regulations which, in the practice and course of trade, have been found beneficial. In its details it refers to usage, and in its precepts to common honesty. It is consequently neither abstruse in the matter, nor technical in the form. Its language is not made up of > 'Phrase which time has thrown away,

> Uncouth words in disarray,
> Tricked in antique ruff and bonnet.'

It is the dialect in common use—the ordinary speech of men of business. It requires therefore no previous study to understand it, no painful effort to bring the mind to bear upon it.

In an age and a country like this, it is needless to [illegible] upon the importance of competent acquaintance with mercantile law. What is it which has caused, in late years, so immense an addition to the judicial business of this country? What are the great majority of cases in the decision of which our courts of law are almost incessantly occupied? Are not three fourths of them mercantile questions? Let any one consider for a moment, the vast and complicated scheme of our foreign and domestic trade—let him reflect upon the multitude of hands through which the several commodities pass—on the thousand modes which are in operation, for advancing the separate interests of all concerned—on the amazing stimulus which luxury has given to competition, and the countless schemes and speculations thence resulting; let him endeavor to reckon up the various classes of men who derive, not subsistence only, but opulence, from trade—the hosts of manufacturers, merchants, brokers, factors, ship-owners, wharfingers, carriers, bankers, money-jobbers, and insurers—and lastly, let him contemplate the confusion introduced among all these by a bankruptcy, and he will readily conceive that the maintaining a just equilibrium in all the parts of such a system as this, may well engross a large share of the labors both of the legislature and the bench.

Yet though so multifarious in its details, and so extensive in its application, the mercantile code of this country is by no means intricate or confused. On the contrary, it is remarkably simple and harmonious. Indeed it is a system of sudden and comparatively modern growth, having been begun, matured, and perfected within the limits of the last half century. It has therefore passed through few hands, and is the work of a succession of judges as vigorous in understanding, and of as enlightened and comprehensive views, as any that have adorned the bench,—of Mansfield, Kenyon, Ellenborough, and Tenterden. But though from this circumstance it has derived a more than ordinary unity and consistence, it has nevertheless the disadvantage, in consequence, of remaining still in a great measure an undigested heap of particulars. It is not many ages since England became decidedly a trading country. In the old text books of the law, therefore, little is to be found on the subject of mercantile dealings. It is evidently considered a matter of minor importance; and whilst unwearied labor is bestowed in digesting, illustrating and commenting upon every part of the law which concerns the realty, whatever relates to the mere personalty, that unsubstantial, ever-changing property, which was almost beneath the regard of the lordly proprietor of lands and manors, is either altogether passed over or dismissed with an occasional notice. Unfortunately, in modern times, the labor manifested in the compilations of Comyn, Viner and Bacon has not been fashionable, and hence it has happened, that there is not a single treatise in which this part of our law has been reduced into one general code. Particular sections have, it is true, been handled with great ability, and some by persons now deservedly at the summit of the profession. The work of the learned Chief Justice of the King's Bench on Shipping, that of Mr Justice Park on Insurance, and that of Mr Justice Bayley on Bills of Exchange, are all excellent in their kind. Again, there is a short Treatise on the Law of Principal and Agent by Mr Paley, and a few others which will readily occur to the memory of the reader, well deserving the attention of the student. Still, in all these treatises there is this disadvantage, that each is the work of a separate individual, and confined with reference to some only peculiar class of cases, there wants that unity of design, that co-relation between the different parts making up the whole, without which we conceive there can be no perfect understanding either of this or any other system. To judge of a system, as of a building, to ascertain its bearings and proportions, it must be viewed altogether, and with one sweep of the eye. The parts of which it consists, being all referrible to common principles, and directed to a common end, necessarily illustrate each other.

Granting, however, to these works all the merit to which they are entitled, still so long a time has elapsed since their appearance, that great and important changes have taken place. The very principles on which many of the decisions were founded have been shaken—the commercial policy of ages has been overturned, and positions of law, deemed incontrovertible, may be, and indeed have been, drawn into question. Again, innumerable cases have since come under the cognizance of the courts, doubtful points have been settled, and many distinctions and qualifications of general rules have been admitted to meet particular exigencies. It is evident, therefore, that some correction and more addition will be needed. But, besides all this, there are several important heads of mercantile law which have never yet been the subject of any methodical treatise; and there is a multitude of cases relating to them, which are only to be found scattered through volumes of reports, or, at best, collected under general titles without order, method, or connexion. Now this may be a matter of little consequence to those in whom long practice supplies the place of study or research; but it is a formidable obstacle to the progress of the novitiate.

[To be continued.]

TRIALS.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Supreme Judicial Court, Boston, June 25th, 1830.
Chief Justice PARKER Presiding.

COMMONWEALTH vs. SELDEN BRAYNARD Appellant from a judgment of the Municipal Court rendered in May, 1829.

J. T. AUSTIN and DANIEL DAVIS, Esqrs. for Commonwealth.

S. D. PARKER and DANIEL WEBSTER, Esqrs. for Defendant.

The indictment charged the defendant with the forging of an accountable receipt for money, which was set out in the words following, viz.

Boston, March 11, 1829. This may certify that S. Braynard has paid two more of his notes of Five Hundred and fifty dollars each on account of my mortgage on his place at Jamaica Plains.

H. G. OTIS.

Hon. H. G. Otis testified that the paper produced in evidence and conforming to the above was not his signature—was a forgery.

James W. Fosdick testified that he was in the employment of Messrs Yates and McIntire, dealers in Lottery Tickets at their licensed lottery office, Providence. He had received orders to deliver the defendant in tickets whatever amount he should pay to Mr Otis in discharge of a mortgage of an estate at Jamaica Plains made by defendant to Mr Ritchie, and by him assigned to Mr Otis, on which Messrs Yates and McIntire had a subsequent mortgage. On 11th of March, 1829, defendant applied to witness at Providence to deliver him a quantity of tickets, saying he had a certificate of such payment. Witness had then shut up the office and was at his house, and refused to transact the business that night, but agreed to meet the defendant as early as he pleased the next morning. After daylight and before sunrise on the 12th, the witness and defendant met at the office, where the defer[illegible]ness the above paper purpo[illegible]y Mr Otis, and the witness [illegible]nt a quantity of Lottery Tick[illegible]alue of $1137. The forged p[illegible]hew in a letter to Messrs Peabody & Watts, of this city. Witness saw it enclosed, and deposited the letter containing it in the Post Office. The paper produced is the same that the defendant passed to him.

F. O. Watts, Esq. received a letter purporting to be signed by Mr Chew, containing the forged paper. The letter was produced. Had no doubt the forged paper is the one that he so received.

William F. Otis, Esq. testified that his father was assignee of a mortgage made by defendant to A. Ritchie, Esq. The money not being paid, an arrangement was effected by which defendant gave six promissory notes for $550 each, with an endorser, as collateral security to said mortgage, and the terms of this arrangement were reduced to writing by witness, and signed by Mr Otis and defendant. The instruments were prepared in duplicate. One was kept by him as Attorney for his father. The other delivered defendant. They were both written on paper, which witness had procured to be ruled and cross lined at the margin, but by some mistake in ruling, it did not answer the purpose for which it was intended. The instrument which he retained was on a whole sheet covering two pages, the other two being blank, and he had no doubt the other was so likewise. One of the notes was paid, and at the request of defendant he wrote a letter to Yates & McIntire, stating that fact. The other five notes were not paid. Witness produced them in Court.

Mortgages to Yates & McIntire, of the same property subject to the mortgage held by Mr Otis, were read to the jury.

Benjamin Eaton. Defendant kept an office in State Street, Boston. The witness had some concern there, and saw defendant every day or nearly every day, but could not remember any day in particular. On his cross examination he said the defendant's office consisted of two rooms, both very public. Loungers and readers of papers were too frequently there, and it contained no place where a person could write without being observed or be liable to interruption.

Samuel Byrt kept with defendant in his office, and lived with him at his house in Jamaica Plains. About the middle of March, 1829, he rode with defendant from Jamaica Plains to Boston. After a short period, which might be half an hour, the defendant started for Providence in his own horse and chaise, and returned the next afternoon near night. The witness did not know of defendant's intention to go to Providence, till after they had arrived in Boston, and just before defendant ordered his horse and chaise.

On cross examination, the counterpart of the contract produced by Mr Wm F. Otis was shown to witness, who said he got it from the defendant's trunk at Jamaica Plains by defendant's order, when defendant was in prison after the trial in the Court below.

The Counsel for the respondent objected to the paper produced going to the Jury, it not being an accountable Receipt, as the Instrument said to be forged is described in the indictment. It could, in no sense, be considered an accountable Receipt within the meaning of the Statute. The Statute must be construed strictly.

Upon this point Mr Parker cited the following authorities. 2 East, 977—2 East, Pleas of the Crown, 985. Foster, Crown Law, 119. 1 Leach's Cases in Crown Law, 134. The King vs George Williams, 363. The King vs Ellor. 2 Leach, 612. Clinch's Case. Same 711. King vs Hunter. 2 Douglass, 301. The King vs Jones. 2 East, 927. Harrison's Case. 2 do. 952. He referred also to 17 Mass. R. 49.

The Statute has the words release—discharge. An accountable Receipt for the payment of money or delivery of goods, means an original undertaking to pay the money or deliver the goods. It raises the contract—imposes an obligation—recognises a right to the money or goods in some other person—not merely a right to retain. It is something different from a release of a debt, or an acknowledgment of satisfaction. It is different from that kind of evidence which is used to show a pre-existent debt paid in full or in part.

Mr Webster contended that the words used in the Statute were equivalent to the words in the English Statute 'for the payment of money or the delivery of goods,' that this Receipt was for neither.

The Judge thought the question was one of some difficulty, and a proper one for the consideration of the full Court. He should, therefore, rule the paper in, and the respondent might except if he thought proper. The paper was accordingly submitted to the Jury.

The Counsel for the Government here stopped, and—

S. D. PARKER, Esq. opened the defence. He remarked that the case was of great consequence to the respondent; that the penalty of the Statute was highly severe. The Government should be held to strict proof. The time and place should be alleged and proved. The allegation in the Indictment is that the offence charged was committed in the County of Suffolk. That allegation should be proved. The Jury were not to guess at the place, it must be made out with all reasonable certainty. They were not to suffer themselves to be led away by prejudice. The question as to variance between the paper alleged to be forged in the Indictment and the one here produced is saved for the whole Court; the Jury have nothing to do with it on this trial. He then read the following authorities to show that the Court sitting here had jurisdiction only over offences committed within the County.

2 Hale's P. C. 163—Mass. Laws, Act of 1812, chap. 133—Hawkins' Pleas of Cr. Book 2. ch. 25 sect. 35. Indict. 4 vol. p. 19. Comyn's Dig. Action iv. 9. vol. 1. p. 262.—Parke's and Brown's Case, 2d East, 992.—Seven Bishops Case—12 Howard's State Trials, 344, 336, 317—Ch. J. and Justices Powel and Holloway said they would not allow the Jury to guess.

4 Barnewell and Alderson 149. King vs Burdett. 'In order to warrant a presumption a prima facie case must be made out.' In same case Ch. J. Abbot says, 'A fact must not be inferred without premises that will warrant the inference'—161.

Rex vs Crocker, 5 Bos. & Pul. 91—(2d New Repts.) The date of a forged Instrument is not much to be relied on. The venue is material, and must be proved by prosecutor.

2 Mason Reports, 469—United States vs Britton. 'The rule is that the place where a forged instrument is found, or offered in a forged state, is prima facie evidence that it was forged there, unless disproved by some other fact in the case.'

The Government will probably rely on Dr Hensey's case in 1. Burr. But the date there is of a genuine paper—having a true date at the domicil and residence of the prisoner; and where his other papers were found. This is a false paper. It is necessarily dated at a particular place. It must have been dated at Boston, let it have been made elsewhere or anywhere. And the paper or remnant of the paper on which it was written was found at his domicil in Norfolk, not in Suffolk.

We deny that the respondent committed the offence charged anywhere. There is no evidence that he did it in Boston.

The Solicitor here cited from 2 East and 2 Russell, and commented on the case in Mason.

Mr WEBSTER, in closing the defence, remarked, that, in the present posture of the case, they might properly call upon the Court for instruction. It was necessary for the Government to give some evidence to satisfy the Jury that the crime alleged was committed within this jurisdiction. He could see none. The prosecutors thought otherwise, and it became his duty to make such suggestions upon the respondent's case as occurred to him.

The Indictment was of great consequence to the defendant. It was a charge of forgery. No charge could be of more importance to him. It draws after it great consequences.

It was not his habit, on any occasion, and he trusted he should not be inclined on this, to draw off the attention of the Jury from the issue before them, by considerations that did not belong to the case.

The paper alleged to be forged was produced. It corresponded with the one set forth in the Indictment. Mr Otis denies the signature to be his. Somebody had forged it. It was first seen in the respondent's possession. He had an interest to make it. He did not attempt to conceal these facts. The Jury might be of the opinion that the paper was false, and that it was made by the respondent. Suppose it to be so. They were called upon to decide another point as material. Was the paper made within the County of Suffolk? They were as much bound to try that question as anything else in the case. It was as necessary to prove that the paper was made in Boston as that it was made at all. The Government must make this out. The respondent need not show where it was made. There must have been a breach of the peace within the County of Suffolk. No offence out of the State can be shown—nor can any offence committed without the body of this County be tried here. The Jury would not suffer themselves to be carried away by any impressions, which they might have of the guilt of the respondent, and pass over all other points in the case. They were as much bound to try the issue submitted to them, as if life were depending. They were bound by their duty and their oaths so to do, without regard to the guilt or honesty of the respondent.

It was (he remarked) a humble virtue to protect the innocent. I. met the sentiment of every honest person in the community to acquit such. But it required independence and firmness to shield the guilty. They owed a higher duty to themselves and the community in such cases, than to secure the victims of the law. They were bound to uphold the rules of evidence, to surrender their convictions of guilt to the claims of the law of the land.

There are three places where this paper might have been made.—In the County of Suffolk, in Norfolk, or in the State of Rhode Island. The Government contended that it was made here. They must prove it. If it was made in the County of Norfolk or in Rhode Island, they had nothing to do with it. If upon the evidence they now had, they could convict the respondent in Rhode Island or in Norfolk, they could not convict him here. He could not be convicted in two states or counties for the same offence. If he were to be indicted in Rhode Island for making this paper, then, your verdict here would be no bar. He might suffer twice for the same offence.

He would ask their attention to the evidence. What was the proof that it was made in Norfolk, if there were no evidence actual or legal that it was written elsewhere?

The evidence offered goes to rebut the presumption which the law raises, that it was written elsewhere. No witness saw the paper here. It was first seen in Rhode Island. In absence of proof, the law presumes it was forged where it was used. Such is the result of all the cases in the Books.

The Government itself had offered evidence which is prima facie, that the offence charged in this indictment was committed in Rhode Island. The prosecutors have produced evidence which shows that the prosecution cannot be sustained, unless there be something to change the legal presumption. What had they offered for that purpose? What were the circumstances on which they relied? They had not told them. He was left to conjecture what they might be. From some intimations which had been given by the Counsel for the Government, in the course of the trial, he inferred that the date of the paper was to be relied on for that purpose. There was not a case in the books which sustained that position. It is nowhere relied upon as a circumstance to change the legal presumption, or to prove the place of making. The case in Burrows does not support the position of the Government. There is not a case in the Books where the date of a forged paper is relied on to prove the locality. Mr Otis lived in Boston. The person who made the instrument wished to give it the appearance of a genuine paper. It must, therefore, be dated here. It was necessary that it should be so, to effect the fraud. The date is, therefore, no evidence of the paper having been written in Boston. How is it with one who forges a Bank Bill on a Boston Bank? Does he not date it at Boston? or does he date it at Northampton, or Plymouth, or wherever he happens to use it? The date is not then even a circumstance to rebut the legal presumption.

It is said also that the paper on which the Receipt was written was peculiar; that it came from Wm F. Otis' office, and was taken from the sheet on which the Agreement between Mr Otis and the respondent was written; that that paper was, probably, kept in respondent's office in Boston. Is it likely that the respondent would go to his trunk or pigeon hole in his office, and in the place of his business, in open day, make this paper? It must have been the result of repeated trials. He must have compared the signing with the name of Mr Otis on the Agreement. It could not have been done in haste. He would not have used such a scrap of paper at his house or office, where paper was plenty. He probably went to Providence on the business of the mortgage—left his house in the morning—found that he could make no other arrangement of his business, then wrote the receipt there on this strip of paper taken from the sheet in his pocket. There was no reason why he should wish to use this kind of paper. Yates & McIntire had received no such paper from him before with Mr Otis' name on it. This is not all. Where was the paper first found? At his residence in Norfolk. His important papers would be most likely to be kept there. So is the evidence as far as it goes. He was arrested and imprisoned. He did not return to his house till after the trial in the Municipal Court. His clerk found the paper there. This is a strong circumstance. It derives strength from the case in Burrows. His other papers were found in Norfolk; and not only his other papers, but part of the same paper with the one offered in evidence.

As far as these circumstances go to show that he should be convicted there, they show that he ought not to be convicted here.

If he wrote this paper in Boston, when did he do it? Not the day he went to Providence. He was in his office not more than ten minutes. It was not a place he would be likely to select for such business. It was uncommonly exposed. There was no hiding place — no place of privacy. The case required all these. It was, besides, the work of time. Would he be most likely to do it in State Street, at home, or on his journey? Another thing. When do we first hear of his intention of going to Providence? Not till the morning he left. He said not a word about it even to his confidential clerk. He went away in haste. He must have made it, if at all, at his house in Norfolk, on the way to Providence, or after he arrived there. In either case the jury could not find him guilty here.

He had submitted all the remarks he had to make upon the subject. He believed the Government had not made out a case upon which they could feel justified to find a verdict against the respondent. He would make no appeal in his behalf. He would let him stand upon the law and the evidence. The Jury were sensible and just men, and would give him the benefits of both. If so, he had no fears as to the result.

The Solicitor contended that the only question about which there could be any doubt, in this case, was as to the place where the offence was committed. The charge as alleged in the indictment was clearly proved. He thought the Jury would come to the conclusion that it was committed in the County of Suffolk. He denied the position of the respondent's Counsel, that the place of uttering is presumptive proof of the place of making. The case in the Circuit Court did not sustain it.

Circumstances, at any rate, would control that presumption. The circumstances in this case did so. They were strong, and, in his opinion, conclusive.

The Respondent's place of business is in Boston; and the prosumption is a fair one, that the instrument was made there. It could not have been made in Providence. The respondent arrived there late, and was anxious to get his business done immediately — said he had the receipt with him. He finished his business early the next morning. It must have been the work of time to make the paper. He must have compared the false signature with Mr Otis' real name on the Agreement in his hands. This Agreement was most likely to be at his place of business. He could not have made this paper on the way to Providence. He had no materials, and would hardly undertake to do it with such as he could find at a public house. The Counsel for the respondent, in fact, admit his guilt, and ask the verdict of the Jury upon a mere mattter of form. They were bound to adhere to these forms; but they would not require very strong evidence to satisfy them that the offence charged was committed within this County — at the respondent's place of business; — and that he ought to be convicted. He will be convicted nowhere if not here. It is enough that the weight of evidence is on that side of the case. It could not be made certain. They owed a duty to the respondent and his family; but they owed a higher duty to themselves and the Commonwealth.

In charging the Jury, the Judge remarked, that they were called upon in the case before them, to exercise a great degree of intelligence and candor. They must give the respondent the benefit of a principle of law, which has long been settled, and which had its origin in sound reasons — that every offence should be tried in the County where it was committed. The Government had established this principle, and it should be bound by it. They might have no doubt of the guilt of the respondent; but yet, if they were not satisfied, upon the evidence in the case, that the crime was committed within this County, they were bound to acquit him.

The Government, among other things, relied upon the date of the instrument and the circumstance that the respondent's place of business was in Boston. There was but little, if anything, to be inferred from the date. It was necessary that it should bear that date to effect the object. And as to the circumstance that the respondent's place of business was in Boston, there might be a fair presumption from that, that his usual business was done there — but it afforded less evidence that extraordinary and unusual business was done there. It was proved that the respondent did business there and at his house in Norfolk. If the presumption that he committed the offence in Norfolk was as great as that he did it here, that circumstance amounted to nothing, one presumption destroyed the other. If upon the presumption that he committed it in Norfolk, the jury might convict him there, they could not, upon a similar presumption, find him guilty here. These circumstances, with others, they were bound to weigh, and as they found that fact, so would be their verdict.

The Jury retired and returned a verdict, Not Guilty in the County of Suffolk, and the defendant was discharged.

ENGLISH CASES.

PREROGATIVE COURT—MAY.

Before Sir John Nicholl.

Simpson vs. Choppin and Skelton.

Sir John Nicholl gave judgment in this case. It was a suit to determine as to the validity of the will of the late Mr Charles Frederick Schweitzer, which was opposed by the relatives on the ground of the insanity of the testator. When the case was before the Court on the arguments, we stated the facts so fully that it is unnecessary to do more at present than to allude to a few of those which were the most prominent.

The testator was a man of most eccentric habits from his childhood. His father sent him abroad for his education, but he behaved in such an extraordinary manner in several of the continental cities, and uttered his sentiments on religion and politics so freely, that he was continually getting into scrapes with the authorities. Upon his return to this country, his father purchased a commission for him in the 27th regiment, which he soon after quitted without leave, and his commission was superseded. When his father died, the property came in equal shares between the testator and his brother, being about 1,000*l* a year to each. The brother ran through his share in the speculations of 1825. The testator lent him 1,000*l*, but, upon his spending that also, he would lend him no more, saying, that he deserved to suffer. From this period he continued residing at one coffeehouse or another until his death. He had made several wills, one in favor of a lady whom he had seen at a party only once, and whom he declared to be the finest woman in England. Another will gave his property to a Miss Morris, but this will he revoked, because Miss Morris had gone unattended in the evening from her father's house to a house a few doors off. The will in question was in favor of a child of three or four years of age, named Elizabeth Huggins, the grand-daughter of Mr Simpson, the proprietor of Simpson's coffee-house, Cornhill, at which place he frequently took up his residence. He had in former wills left legacies to the children of Mrs Choppin and Mrs Skelton, but in this will he had wholly omitted their names. He had taken, at an early period, to excessive drinking, and this habit increased on him towards the close of his life, and though he committed various irregularities yet still he kept an account at the Bank, and transacted all his pecuniary matters there, without any assistance, up to the period of his death. He was in the habit of wearing solid gold buttons in his coat, and he carried his money in something similar to a shot-belt. On one occasion he wrote to old Mr Skelton a letter, which he addressed 'To old Skelton,' and dated it, 'This day of our LORD JESUS CHRIST the carpenter's son.' He was a professed atheist, and was in the habit when intoxicated, of swearing oaths of the most horrible description. He also carried blasphemous prints in his hat, to assist him in his irreligious arguments.

Sir JOHN NICHOLL, after adverting to the principal facts adduced in evidence, said that the question for the Court was whether the testator was of unsound mind, or the contrary. The facts in support of either view of the case were pretty strong, and it appeared almost as if the relatives themselves appeared to think him sane, for they left to him the sole management of himself and of his property up to the period of his death. It had, however, been proved in some instances that persons who had always conducted themselves and their property well were nevertheless insane, and this was done by taking a view of the whole course of their lives. The partition between eccentricity and insanity was so thin, that it was difficult to say where the former terminated, and where the latter began. He was certainly both odd and eccentric, and had latterly given way to habits of intoxication to such a degree, that he would take nothing but champaigne or brandy for breakfast. He was irritable, passionate, malicious, violent, suspicious, and given to groundless aversions. The combination of all these feelings had generally been taken as indicative of insanity. With respect to his atheism, he did not think that that necessarily indicated insanity, and he would not give judgment upon such a ground; but he did think the manner in which it existed in the mind of the testator, and the extraordinary mode which he took in communicating it to others, did indicate unsoundness of mind. Under all the circumstances of the case, he must come to the conclusion that the deceased was not only an eccentric man, but that he was insane, and the will therefore must be set aside, and Mr Schweitzer be taken to have died intestate. The Court, however, would order the costs to be paid out of the estate.

. Kerr vs. Phillips and others.

This was a question as to the testamentary intentions of Mrs Charlotte Phillips, the lady whose sudden death at Finchley excited so much public attention a short time since.

Dr LUSHINGTON supported an allegation praying the Court to admit two unfinished papers to probate, as they contained the intentions of the deceased with respect to her property. The deceased, under her mother's will, became entitled to a sum of 5,000*l*, and she had executed a regular will on the 31st July, 1829, disposing of this sum in a particular manner. Five days afterwards she drew up another paper of instructions, containing a different disposition of her property, which she placed in the hands of a Mrs Vesset, requesting they might be given to Mr Scott, her attorney, to be put into a legal form. Before this was accomplished Mrs Phillips died, and the admission of these papers to probate was opposed by her next relative, Mr Atkinson, who would have been entitled to the property had she died intestate.

The KING'S ADVOCATE appeared on behalf of Mr Atkinson, and contended that this paper ought not legally to operate, as the probability was, she had not finally made up her mind as to the ultimate disposal of her property.

Dr ADAMS appeared for the husband, Mr H. Phillips, and contended that the will of July, 1829, was not procured by undue influence of the husband, as had been asserted. With respect to the allegation, he declared that it was a matter of indifference to his party whether it was admitted or not. The only important difference between them appeared to be a bequest of 500*l* to Mr Phillips's natural daughter, and a different disposition of the moiety of 2,500*l* to her husband.

The JUDGE said it was evident that the intentions of the deceased were contained in the will of 1829, and the instructions now propounded; and, he should, therefore, direct the allegation to be admitted.

---

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Rex vs. Knight.

The defendant was a servant to a tea-dealer in the county of Worcester, who had been sent about the country by his master, showing samples and collecting orders, and afterwards carrying the parcels about for delivery, according to the orders. The question was whether this was hawking and peddling, so as to require a license under the Act of the 50th Geo. III.

The COURT was of opinion that the Act applied only to those who carried about the goods to be sold and delivered immediately, and not to those who carried about the goods for delivery pursuant to previous order and contract, otherwise a license would be necessary to legalise the transactions of travellers for London houses.

---

ROLLS COURT—MAY.

Robarts vs. Jefferies.

This case occupied the attention of the Court during the whole day, but possessed little matter of public interest. It was a bill filed to obtain from the defendant, a solicitor, the title-deeds of an estate which had been mortgaged, and the equity of redemption of which had been purchased by the plaintiff, Abraham Wildey Robarts, the Member for Maidstone. The defendant grounded his case on the points that the deeds had been deposited with him partly as a security for a debt due to him as a banker by the person who had owned the estates, and had sold her equity to the plaintiff; and also that he had a legal lien on these deeds for his bill of costs, as solicitor to the same individual. The first point he was unable to establish sufficiently by evidence; with respect to the second, it appeared that he had taken a promissory note, payable on demand, as a security for his costs.

His HONOR decided that as such a promissory note bore interest from the day of payment having been demanded, while an attorney cannot charge interest on his bill of costs, the defendant had accepted a description of security which superseded his lien on the deeds. As his Honor considered the defendant to have been to blame in the retention of these deeds, he gave his decree against him, with costs.

---

WORSHIP STREET.

Mr Amos Petett, a respectable looking man, was yesterday brought to this office, charged by Mrs Martha Bacon, a widow lady, and proprietress of a public house in St Luke's, with annoying her in the public streets, she having repeatedly desired him to desist.

The complainant, who appeared to be about forty years of age, and possessed of very considerable property, stated that the prisoner had for some time past visited her house, and repeatedly made proposals of marriage, which she always refused listening to. On the previous evening he became so annoying and intrusive, and also abusive, declaring he would not leave her house, that she was compelled to give him into custody. Four men were employed in ejecting him from the house.

Mr BENETT—(To the prisoner)—You have no right to force this lady against her will. Will you promise not to annoy her again?

Prisoner—No, if she is determined not to have me.

Mr BENETT—Well, if you will promise not to go to her house again I will discharge you.

Complainant—Will you promise——

Mr BENETT—Madam, if you interrupt I shall have done with the case altogether.

The prisoner, in reply, said he would not make any promise; but, when the Magistrate informed him he should hold him to bail, he said, after some hesitation, he would not, and was discharged.

The complainant enjoys a property of £1,300 per annum, independent of her business.

---

UNION HALL.

Yesterday a Mr Emmerson appeared to answer a summons, granted at the instance of Miss Benson, an artist, for refusing to deliver up a miniature likeness of himself, executed by that lady.

The complainant said that having been introduced to Mr Emmerson, she expressed a wish to take his miniature, in order to exhibit it as a specimen of her abilities in that line of drawing. He assented, and when the likeness was finished, requested that it might be left in his possession for the purpose of showing to his friends, adding at the same time, that it would probably be the means of recommending her to several of his acquaintances. It was expressly understood, however, at the time, that the miniature was to be returned to her in due time after its exhibition. It remained in the hands of the complainant for the last seven months, and at the expiration of that period, conceiving that he had had it quite a sufficient time for the purposes he required it, she applied for it, but he peremptorily refused to pay eight guineas, the sum she demanded, or to restore the miniature.

Mr Emmerson said that the lady who had brought him there that day, had actually solicited him to sit for his likeness, and he acquiesced, at much personal inconvenience to himself; that when it was finished, owing to his not having engaged her to execute it, he, of course, considered that he was entitled to it; and therefore, retained it in his possession.

Mr CHAMBERS — If you pay eight guineas, the complainant will have no objection to permit you to retain it; but it is too much for you to suppose that she would have gone to the pains and labor of taking your miniature, merely for the purpose of bestowing it on you, whom she has represented as almost a total stranger to her.

Mr Emmerson — Really, it was under the impression that I was to have had the miniature for nothing, that I went to the labor and inconvenience of sitting like a poker, and fearful of stirring a muscle while it was painting.

The Magistrate remarked that he saw nothing at all striking in the countenance of the gentleman, to excite a desire on the part of an artist, to execute his likeness gratis. It may be well to state that Mr Emmerson possesses what might be termed a good-natured countenance; or, in Ireland, a potato face; that is, plump rosy cheeks, eyes wide apart, and a crooked nose!

After some further discussion about the title to the picture, the Magistrates decided the case, by compelling Mr Emmerson to deliver it up to the right owner, and the parties retired.

---

Mr Justice ——— actually broke off a summing-up, upon one occasion, with — 'Mr Undersheriff, I should like to know what that fat man means by pressing against those two young women in the third row of the gallery' — and on another, 'Really, Mr Foreman, I am exhausted, worn out, with the outrageous conduct of that witness in the box,' (who, amongst other profanities, kept on saying, that what he deposed to was 'as sure as God made apples.'

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 10, 1830.

We offer to the public, this week, the first number of the Jurisprudent. It exhibits the general outlines of the plan of the publication. Should our subscription authorise it, we shall issue another number in the course of a few weeks, and, after that, the paper will be published regularly every Saturday. We believe nothing like the proposed periodical has ever been undertaken in this country.

The Profession of Law in England is furnished, through the daily papers, with full reports of all proceedings of the Courts, on the Circuits, at Nisi Prius, and in Banc. Many cases, in that way, are brought before the public, which would otherwise never be heard of out of the purlieus of the courts. Decisions are often made, points ruled, and questions investigated, in the civil and criminal courts, which are of interest to the public, as well as to the members of the Profession, and which can never be introduced into the regular Reports. Those are already multiplying to such an extent, in England, and in this country, as to impose a burthen upon practitioners heavy and grievous to be borne.

'The multiplication of books,' says the late Judge Howe, 'is an evil that falls more heavily upon the Profession of Law, than any other. It was an evil complained of in the time of Coke, and if it existed then, what must it be now. There are more than ten tribunals in England, whose decisions are constantly published, each sending out one volume a year. And there are not less than twenty courts in this country, whose decisions are constantly reported. We have already more than two hundred and fifty volumes of regular Reports.' And Essays, Compilations, Digests, and Treatises are alarmingly increasing under the exuberant productiveness of steam presses and professional leisure. As it seems no longer possible for any one, with ordinary length of days, to run over the whole field of legal knowledge, the inquiry now is, how the most information can be got in the shortest way. No practitioner, who values his own reputation and regards the safety of his clients, is willing to be wholly ignorant of any department of his profession. He must not only be thoroughly imbued with its elementary principles, but he must pursue them out in all their channels and applications, and follow after the dim and doubtful, as well as brilliant lights of the law. He must know the old cases and the new ones — the jus antiquum, jus novum et jus novissimum.

The number of points in a modern library of five hundred volumes is said to be, at least, 2,625,000. Well could George the Third say, 'I have had occasion to consult the best lawyers in my dominions, and not a man of them can do more than refer.'

It is said that there is no royal road to the law. There is no royal road to any science. No remark can be more just when applied to elementary knowledge — to first principles. But we must either find such a road to the cases in the books — to Reports and Digests — or give up the journey altogether. No one can hope to follow every path, which private gentlemen or industrious travellers have found it convenient or amusing to lay open. The most we can do is to learn the guides and monuments by the way, and to fix the landmarks of our territory. The great matter is to know where to find the law — to know where to go for the shield of the innocent and the sword for the guilty — for the words of encouragement and persuasion to the timid and honest, and of subduing and coercive eloquence to the corrupt and oppressive judge; — to find the means to defend the persecuted, to protect the laws against abuse, and to hold up the broad shield of the Constitution between the citizens and the corruption and oppression of power. These are some of the highest duties of the Profession. The advocate need not always have his sword drawn and glittering, and his armor upon him. The humble attorney need not commit to memory all the precedents in his Wentworth or carry his Natura Brevium in his pocket. He need not bear a camel's load of technicalities about him, or be ready, at a moment's warning, to dictate a bill in chancery by the wayside. It is enough that he knows when to lay his venue and fix his locus in quo. He should be able to allege his scienter when necessary, but need not always be ready to prove it.

It will be the humble effort of the conductors of The Jurisprudent, to give as full references to cases decided here, and in England, as their limits and means will allow.

We shall hope to receive occasional aid, in our advertising department, from gentlemen of the Trade, and, in return, we will speak as well of their books as we think they deserve.

If we succeed in our undertaking, as we hope to do, we shall take particular pains to get early information of all interesting legal events in the several states — to give a list of their judicial officers, and of the lawyers in them; and, more especially, the respectable ones, who may send us their names.

We might appeal with confidence, for support, to the liberal members of a liberal profession — who, by the way, patronise every body better than one another; — but we make no appeals. We have no belief that the Profession or the country will be ruined, if we don't get a thousand subscribers for our paper, and we hope they won't be if we do. If those to whom we send it, like the plan, they will take it; and if they do not, why then the Jurisprudent will fail for want of subscribers — that's all. Our terms are certainly moderate, and as lawyers never make any other than such, so they never complain of reasonable charges.

QUARTERLY REVIEW OF JURISPRUDENCE.

We would call the attention of our readers to our first page, which contains the first No. of a series of articles from the above named work, under the head of Mercantile Law. We intend to continue the publication of them, with the hope that they may prove interesting to our patrons. We know of no periodical in this country, or in England, which bears the marks of more talent and industry than the Review of Jurisprudence.

It is issued quarterly, and has now been published about two years, with great success, under the management of nearly twenty Barristers of eminence at the English bar. Many of the elementary articles are written with great ability, and cannot fail to interest the reading part of the Profession in this country. It contains besides, a great variety of useful intelligence, and the incidents and on dits of the legal world, under the head of 'Events of the Quarter.'

It is our design to republish, in the Jurisprudent, all the articles which are of general interest. By devoting to that object two of our pages weekly, we shall be able to present to our readers, in the course of the year, almost the entire contents of that useful periodical. If we should accomplish nothing further in our undertaking, our patrons will be amply compensated for the expense of their subscription. We hope, however, to do much more.

AMERICAN DIGEST.

We have before us the proposals of William Hilliard, Jr. Esquire, of this city, for publishing an Analytical Digest of American Reports. We are glad such a work is in progress. But Mr Hilliard will probably meet with less encouragement, by way of subscription, than he anticipates, if he anticipates much.

Judges, benchers, barristers and attorneys, omne genus, involuntarily sigh and shudder at the sight of a subscription paper. They have hardly yet recovered from the panic occasioned by the appearance of the Digest of American Law, which now sells for something less than a guinea a page.

Mr H. now proposes to serve up to them, at a single meal, somewhere about 5000 pages more, royal octavo, on a fine small type, by the way of helping their Digest-ion!

He must not be disappointed or discouraged, if his professional brethren manifest a wish to see his work before they determine to buy it.

We have no doubt, that the proposed work, executed with the ability and fidelity, which we have good reason to believe Mr H., and know Mr Rand, who is to assist him, possesses, will ultimately succeed. And should it be continued, it will supersede, in a great measure, the necessity of getting up, every year or two, separate Digests of State Reports, — and in the end, we hope, 'like Aaron's serpent swallow up the rest.'

We hold most feelingly, in this regard, to the doctrine of consolidation; and hope the Analytical Digest may have the effect of nullifying, if not state rights, at least all further combinations of state authorities, against the peace and to the manifest detriment of the Profession.

---

'We are a forgiving people,' said a worthy magistrate in Court the other day, while one of the 'truly lucky' gentlemen was shaking in the wind, and hanging in mid-air, by the slender thread of a venue, which would have been cut if the sword of justice could have been used.

No remark can be more true. Our whole population to a man, will turn out and join the chase to hunt down a rogue, and when he is caught, and safely lodged in limbo, one half the men and all the women would vote him out by acclamation, if, peradventure, he happens to be a genteel defaulter.

Fuller, who was so careless as to put into his own pocket some fifty or sixty thousand dollars of other people's money, and so unlucky as not to get away with it, has been in the poor debtor's house, in Leverett Street, hardly long enough to get rested; and we begin to talk about the locus penitentiæ and the honorable intentions of the unfortunate man.

It would be no marvel if we were called upon, ere a se'nnight has passed, to subscribe him out of jail. And if he should be so unlucky as to be put into the safe at Charlestown, ten to one, he will be pardoned out, before half the less genteel rogues, who have mis-taken a gilding or mis-placed a lady's indispensable, have got through their ninety days solitary. Any one who chanced to pass through Court Street yesterday, while Fuller was under examination, might have supposed the good people, even then, were gathering to the rescue.

---

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Adjourned Law Term — June, 1830.

The court adjourned on Tuesday, the 22d ult., after a laborious Term, during which a great number of cases have been argued, and a very considerable number determined. At the March and adjourned June Term, opinions have been given in upwards of forty cases. Several were continued Nisi for advisement to Salem this month.

We give, below, the names of some of the cases determined in Berkshire county, September Term, 1829, and the points decided in them.

We shall give, in our next, the cases decided in Worcester county, at the September Term of the same year; and those of the succeeding law Terms will follow as fast as our limits will permit.

No one, who attends upon a law term of the court in this county, can entertain any doubt of the ability and industry of the Bar, or of the learning and diligence of the Court.

We much doubt whether any portion of our country sends forth to the world more sound and practical law, more ably and faithfully discussed questions, or better reported Cases, than come from the Supreme Court of this State. New England industry, practical tact, and freedom of thought and inquiry, are admirably adapted 'to elicit the fair and lovely forms of Justice and Equity from technical imprisonment — to dig the ore of principle from the rubbish of the practice — to polish the severity and decorate the nakedness of the law — to call in the feelings of the heart to the aid of the understanding bewildered by professional intricacy' — and nowhere, in this land of business men and unfettered intellects, have professional industry and learning been more successfully applied to these purposes than here. The present Chief Justice of that court, when he shall retire from the Bench, will leave behind him, not only a name which will be long remembered and treasured up with the proud memorials of the Commonwealth, but a body of law, which would do honor to the brightest periods of English Jurisprudence.

AMERICAN CASES.

MASSACHUSETTS.

BERKSHIRE CO.—S. J. COURT—SEPT. TERM, 1829.

A. H. Woodruff vs. N. Halsey et al.

A mortgagee of personal property mortgaged to secure a debt, may maintain trespass against a stranger, who takes it from the possession of the mortgager, although the trespass be committed before the debt becomes due.

A mortgager of a building standing, not on land of the mortgager, but on that of a third person, may maintain trespass against a stranger, who pulls down and carries away the building, the building being unoccupied at the time of the trespass, and the mortgager not having taken actual possession.

Trespass may be maintained against a person, who carries away the materials of a building, which has been pulled down by a trespasser, though the person carrying them away was not engaged in the pulling down.—Parker, Chief Justice.

Commonwealth vs. the County Commissioners of Berkshire.

A notice of a meeting of the Commissioners of Highways, for the purpose of viewing the route of a highway, signed, 'By order of the Commissioners, A. B. Chairman,' was held to be sufficient, notwithstanding the objection that it did not appear that the notice was issued at a meeting of three or more of the commissioners. Where, upon a petition for the alteration of a 'County road,' as it was called, though in fact it was a Town road, or the location of a new road between two other county roads, the commissioners of highways laid out a new road between the termini; it was held that their describing the new road as an alteration, did not vitiate their proceedings.

When the commissioners, after notice to the persons interested, viewed the route for a highway, and adjourned to a certain time and place for the purpose of locating the way, and assessing the damages to individuals; it was held that it was not necessary to give notice of the time and place so appointed.

Seth Jenkins vs. Moses Hopkins.

The defendant in 1799 conveyed to the plaintiff land in New York, with covenants of warranty and freedom from incumbrances; a judgment had been recovered in 1786, against the defendant's grantor, which constituted a lien on the land, and in 1801 upon a scire facias to revive the judgment, an execution was issued, by virtue of which the land was sold by the sheriff, and a deed given by him to the purchaser. Held, that as the plaintiff's title was entirely defeated, there was a breach of the covenant against incumbrances; and that the damages were the amount of the consideration and interest.

The testimony of witnesses, that they were in possession of the land under a grantee of such purchaser, without proof of a conveyance by deed to such supposed grantee, was held not to be sufficient evidence, upon actual eviction under a paramount title, to allow the plaintiff to recover on the covenant of warranty.—Parker, Chief Justice.

Joseph Farnum vs. A. Platt.

The owner of land, having leased a marble quarry thereon for 10 years, conveyed the land, 'reserving the use of the quarry until the expiration of the lease.' The lease was cancelled within the 10 years with the consent of the parties; held that the reservation was not thereby extinguished, but that it would continue in force till the end of the 10 years.

Where one has a right of way over another's land, and the way is not defined, if the owner of the land stops up the way which is in use, the other party will be justified in going over another part of the land.—Parker, Chief Justice.

D. Barret vs. M. Barret.

A judgment in favor of the Judge of Probate in a suit upon a Probate Bond, brought in his name, for the benefit of a legatee, against an Executor and his sureties, may be set off against a judgment recovered by the Executor, in his individual capacity, against the legatee.

The Court, in their discretion, refused to set off the costs in such actions.

Joshua West vs. John Chamberlain.

Taking possession of a mortgage estate, for the purpose of foreclosure, does not operate as a payment of the mortgage money; for the land still remains only as security for the money.

S. having mortgaged an estate to W. to secure the payment of several notes, W. assigned the notes and mortgage to C. taking from C. a written agreement with regard to one of the notes, which was for $500; that he, C., would pay $500 to W. as soon as it could be collected on the note of S. C. received $30 of S. on account of this note and took possession of the mortgaged premises for the purpose of foreclosure, and S. occupied the estate for some time afterwards as tenant to C.; but S. being insolvent, never paid C. anything for rent.

In an action brought by W. vs C. on his contract before the three years for foreclosure had expired, the declaration also containing a Count for money had and received; it was held, that the taking possession of the mortgaged premises did not amount to payment of the mortgage, and therefore that C. was not liable on his contract; that C. was not liable to pay the $30 until the whole sum was collected, without notice from the plaintiff before bringing a suit for it; and that C., in this action, was not liable for rent, which he had not actually received.

Henry B. Boynton vs. Isaac M. Rees.

1. Where a grant was made of a right to erect and maintain a dam, from the grantee's land, on one side of a stream to the grantor's land, on the other, at about 60 rods below certain mills of the grantor, and a dam was built more than 60 rods below the mills, and, afterwards, without any objection on the part of the grantor, was removed 20 rods higher up the stream, but was still below the 60 rods, such removal was presumed to be within the intent of the parties to the conveyance.

2. It was also held, that the grant was not invalid, because no consideration was mentioned in the deed; and that to avoid it as a voluntary conveyance fraudulent as against subsequent purchasers, the party objecting to it, must prove that no consideration was given.

3. The erection of the dam and the occupation of it, six months in the year, by the grantee, it being occupied the other six by a third person, were held not to be conclusive evidence of notice of the grant as against a subsequent purchaser of the grantee's land.

4. A purchaser of land without notice of an incumbrance, may convey the same, free of incumbrance, to a purchaser who has notice.

5. Where a witness who assisted in erecting and maintaining a mill dam, and had used it long enough to create the presumption of a grant of an easement in the stream, stated that his right was derived from a written agreement, it was held that his testimony of the terms of the agreement was inadmissible, without evidence of the loss of the instrument, to prove the title to the easement.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

SUPERIOR COURT OF JUDICATURE.

Vol. 4 contains the cases decided from January, 1827, to May, 1829

Prichard vs. Atkinson.

In a writ of entry judgment was rendered in favor of the demandant, and the tenant having sued out a writ of review, died pending the review—it was held that the writ of review was abated by the death of the tenant.

Nelson vs. Swett.

When the goods or estate of a defendant are attached, it is a good cause to abate the writ, that no summons has been left with the defendant for his appearance at the time and place, when and where the writ was returnable.

Ela vs. Rand.

In an action of assumpsit against a secret partner it is a good plea in abatement that there are other secret partners not named in the writ.

Clindenin vs. Allen.

A writ does not abate by the death of either party, between the time when the writ is served and the time of entering the action, provided the cause of action by law survives.

Woods vs. N. M. Company.

It is a good plea in abatement that the action is misconceived.

Waldron vs. Tuttle.

Where an individual delivered to a constable a warrant in the name of the State requiring him to arrest an individual, and promise to pay the constable for the service of the process, it was held that an action might be maintained on such promise although there is no statute which prescribes the fees to be taken by a constable for such services.

Woods vs. N. M. Company.

When the legislature authorizes an act, the necessary consequence of which is damage to the property of another, and at the same time prescribes the particular mode in which the damage shall be ascertained and compensated, he who does the act cannot be liable as a wrong doer.

Parker vs. Holmes.

When a contract not to sue is to be construed as a release.

Buel vs. Miller.

An executory agreement in writing, not under seal, may, before breach, be discharged and abandoned by a subsequent unwritten agreement, even in cases where the original contract to be binding is required by the statute of frauds to be in writing.

Roby vs. West

When an illegal contract is made between parties who are in pari delicto, the contract is void, and neither party can maintain any action which requires for its support the aid of such illegal contract. Where A. & W. employed R. to sell for them on commission tickets in a lottery not authorised by law, under an agreement that R. should be considered as the purchaser of all the tickets he did not sell or return by a particular day, it was held that although the purchase of the tickets by R. was not illegal, yet as the agreement with respect to the purchase was only a part of an entire contract, which was illegal, the whole was void.

Goodwin vs. Smith.

In scire facias against bail the plaintiff was refused leave to amend, it appearing that the principal was, from the time of judgment against him, until his death, so sick that he could not safely be surrendered.

Chamberlain vs. Crane.

Where a judgment had been entered upon a wrong count at May term, 1817, the court at May term, 1827, gave leave to amend the record, with a saving of the right of third persons acquired under the judgment.

Edgerly vs. Emerson.

A new ground of action cannot be introduced into a cause, by way of amendment, upon a review; but matters of form may be amended.

Pickett vs. King.

The court will not permit a writ of entry to be amended by striking out the name of one of the demandants.

Rand vs. Rand.

On an appeal from the decision of commissioners upon an insolvent estate by a creditor, an attested copy of the declaration filed in the register's office was delivered to a deputy sheriff, who returned thereon that he had served the same by giving a copy of the copy with a copy of his return thereon, it was held that the service was sufficient.

Buckman vs. Buckman.

An appeal lies to this court from an order of the court of Common Pleas to stay all proceedings in a cause.

Bean vs. Burleigh.

When an appeal from a decree of a judge of probate is granted by this court, upon a petition for that purpose, under the statute of July 2, 1822, nothing is open to objection in the proceedings of the court below, upon the hearing here, except the grievances alleged in the petition as the reasons of the appeal.

Atwood vs. York.

Where parties having a controversy of less value than two hundred dollars entered into an agreement under their hands to submit the same to referees, but did not acknowledge the agreement before the justice of the peace to whom the report was agreed to be returned—a report of the referees made in pursuance of the agreement was held not to be a legal foundation for a judgment rendered by the justice.

And whenever a report is made returnable to a justice of the peace, the rule of submission must name a day certain when the report shall be returnable; and the report must be returned accordingly; otherwise the judgment will be erroneous.

Greenough vs. Rolfe.

If, under an unqualified submission, referees take upon themselves the whole responsibility, and decide a question of law, otherwise than the court would have done; or, if in such a case, knowing what the law is, they choose to disregard it, and decide according to what they consider the equity and good conscience of the case, the parties are bound by the decision.

So if a distinct question of law is referred, under circumstances that show an intention in the parties that the law of the referees shall be the law of the case, the parties will be bound by the decision, however erroneous.

An erroneous judgment of the referees, when their judgment has been fairly exercised, is not alone, a sufficient ground to set aside an award.

It will be presumed, that referees intend to decide according to law, where it was agreed by the parties that they should decide according to the law and justice of the case.

George vs. Harris.

Where several individuals put their names to a subscription paper, and promise to contribute each a certain sum to an object which all are desirous to accomplish, the promise of each may be considered as made in consideration of the promises of the rest; and if one refuse to pay, the others, having accomplished the object, may recover of the one who refuses to pay the sum by him subscribed.

And parol evidence is inadmissible to vary the terms of such a promise.

Goodwin vs. Smith.

The officer who makes the return of non est inventus upon the execution against the principal, must state particularly in his return, what notice he gave to the bail; otherwise the bail cannot be charged.

New Publications.

ENGLISH.

Fulbeck on the Study of the Law.

Peake's Additional Cases at Nisi Prius.

A new Law Dictionary, containing a concise exposition of the mere terms of art and obsolete words.

Wilkinson on Limitations of Actions, as affecting Mercantile and other Contracts.

Maule and Selwin Reports, vol. vi. part ii. being the completion of these Reports, filling the chasm between them and Barnewall and Alderson.

Crabb's History of English Law.

A Commentary on the Tenures of Littleton, written prior to the publication of Coke upon Littleton. Edited from a copy of the Harleian collection of MS., by Henry Cary, Esq., of Lincoln's Inn.

Burns' Justice, 25th edition.

Palmer's Practice in the House of Lords.

Comyn's Law of Landlord and Tenant. By G. Chilton, Jr. Esq.

The Life of a Lawyer, written by himself.

AMERICAN.

Reports of Cases in the Court of Chancery, N. York. By A. C. Paige. Vol. 1.

Law of Fixtures and other Property, partaking both of a real and personal nature. By A. Amos and J. Ferald. First American edition, with Notes, &c.

Vol. 7 of Pickering's Reports, and Part 1 of Vol. 8.

Case of Charles River and Warren Bridge. By O. Pickering.

Vol. 9 of Cowen's Reports.

Vol. 4 of Kent's Commentaries.

Halstead's Digest of New Jersey Decisions.

Treatise on the Equity Jurisdiction of the Chancery Court. By Geo. Jeremy. First American, from last London edition. Published by Hilliard, Gray and Co.

Vol. 3 of Peters' Reports.

Vol. 3 of Wendell's Reports.

Vol. 4 of N. Hampshire Reports.

J. Willard's Address to the Worcester Bar.

IN PRESS,

Digest of 6 last vols. of the Massachusetts Reports. Richardson, Lord and Holbrook.

Bigelow's Digest of Pickering's Reports, being a continuation of his Digest of Massachusetts Reports.

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. Complete sets of this work (thirty volumes in all) can now be had, on application to the Publishers, on liberal terms. The number and variety of the topics discussed in this work, and the high reputation it enjoys both in this country and Europe, render it a most valuable addition to the library of literary men. A General Index of the first twentyfive volumes has also been published, in a style to match with the current volumes of the work.

Subscribers and others whose sets may be deficient, can be supplied with the missing numbers. Subscriptions to commence at any period, received at $5 per annum. GRAY & BOWEN.

July 10.

PETER PARLEY'S TALES ABOUT AFRICA—PETER PARLEY'S TALES ABOUT ASIA.—These works are now in press, and will be shortly published by GRAY & BOWEN. They will be executed in the neatest style, and embellished by maps and numerous engravings, many of them from original designs. The object of these works is to communicate to children, in an amusing manner, the outlines of Geography and History. The Tales about America and Europe have been before the public some time, and have had a sale beyond any other publication of the kind.

PETER PARLEY'S TALES OF THE SUN, MOON, AND STARS.—This work will be published in a short time. It is designed to follow the books mentioned above, with a more particular reference, however, to its use in schools. It will embrace a view of the more simple parts of Astronomy, and be so prepared and illustrated by engravings as to bring this subject easily within the grasp of the juvenile mind. A work of this kind is evidently needed, as there is now no book before the public which pretends to give a familiar view of Astronomy suited to children.

GRAY & BOWEN have received by late arrivals the following valuable Foreign Books, which they will sell at low prices.

Dibdin's Library Companion, second edition, one large 8vo. vol.

Bowring's Poetry of the Magyars.

Moore's Byron. Splendid quarto edition.

Belzoni's Researches in Egypt and Nubia.

Description of the Ruins of an Ancient City in South America, with plates.

Memoires de M. De Bourrienne, 10 vols.

Histoire De France. Par M. Bignon, 4 vols.

Dictionnaire de Maximes. Par J. L. Malire, 1 vol.

Histoire du Congress de Vienne, 3 vols. 8vo.

Lafayette en Amerique, with Plates, 2 vols. 8vo.

The Works of Lope de Vega, 21 vols. quarto, fine edition.

Obras de Quevedo, 11 vols.

Don Quixotte, 5 vols.

Las Eroticas Villegas, 2 vols.

Trabajos de Persiles y Sigismunda, 2 vols.

Teatro Italiano Antico, 8 vols. July 10.

NOW PUBLISHING, BY CARTER & HENDEE, A SERIES OF SCIENTIFIC TRACTS, designed for Instruction and Entertainment, and adapted to Schools, Lyceums and Families. Conducted by Josiah Holbrook and others.

The whole Series will contain simple and clear outlines of the various sciences, and their principal division, with their application to the common purposes of life.

TERMS.—Not lest than 24 numbers of a 12mo size, containing 24 pages each, will be published in a year, at $1,50, payable in advance. July 10.

FOREIGN WORKS.—GRAY & BOWEN, having made arrangements for importing FOREIGN BOOKS, are now ready to receive orders for English, French, and German Works, and will execute them with regularity and despatch, on the most reasonable terms. They have experienced Agents in LONDON and PARIS, and feel confident that the orders they may be entrusted with, will be executed promptly and at the lowest possible rates. Directors of Libraries and Public Institutions who may favor them with their orders, may rely on every attention being paid to their requests. July 10.

PROPOSALS for publishing by subscription an ANALYTICAL DIGEST OF ALL THE AMERICAN REPORTS. By WILLIAM HILLIARD, Jr. Counsellor at Law. Revised by BENJAMIN RAND, Counsellor at Law.

The study of American Jurisprudence will always form an essential part of the education of every accomplished American Lawyer. And to the practitioner, as well as to the jurist, the decisions of the various Courts of Law and Equity in the United States, are daily becoming more important. The Jurisprudence of the several States, with a single exception, is founded upon the Common Law of England. On most subjects of general importance, there is a great similarity in the legislative enactments of the several States. And the judicial decisions of the Courts of the several States, are often cited and respected as authorities in the Courts of other States than those in which they were pronounced. The decisions upon local or statutory law, merely, are comparatively few, and even in these, from the similarity in the statutes and usages of the several States, precedents and analogies may be found, of general application. Few, perhaps, are aware of the number of volumes of American Reports, which now exceeds two hundred and fifty. It is believed that an Analytical Digest of these Reports, upon the plan of Mr Jeremy's consolidated Digest of the English Reports, is a desideratum. The advantages of such a digest, judiciously arranged, so as to bring into one view all the adjudications of all the Courts in the United States, upon each particular subject, will be duly appreciated by every practical lawyer. It is intended that the work shall contain all the reported cases to the time of publication, without any exceptions; and a Supplement containing the subsequent decisions will be published annually.

The work will be published with despatch.

---

The work will be printed on a beautiful small type, and good paper, and will be comprised in four or five volumes, (probably not exceeding four,) royal octavo size, each volume to contain about 1000 pages; and will be delivered to subscribers at $5 per volume, in good law sheep binding, which is a very low price for a law work embracing so great a quantity of matter.

After publication the price of the work will be raised to $6 per volume.

---

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From Hon. JOSEPH STORY, Judge of the Supreme Court of the U. S.; and Hon. ISAAC PARKER, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts.

The proposal of Mr Hilliard, to publish a uniform Digest of all the American Reports, upon the plan of the English Digest of Mr Jeremy, appears to me to be entitled to the patronage of the profession. No work of this kind, sufficiently accurate and extensive for general practice, at present exists. The want of one cannot but be felt by every lawyer, whose inquiries reach beyond the limits of the local law of his own State. Such a compilation, executed with the care, fidelity and ability, which so important a task demands, would be so highly useful, that it could scarcely fail of general approbation. As far as I have had the means of comprehending the plan of Mr Hilliard, from a personal communication with him, it appears to me entirely satisfactory. And the assistance and supervision of so distinguished a lawyer as Mr Rand, cannot but ensure an accuracy and completeness in the execution of the plan, correspondent with his just claims on the public confidence.

JOSEPH STORY.

---

I have no doubt the Digest proposed by Mr Hilliard will be highly useful, and that it will have a tendency to relieve the profession from the great labor of looking through hundreds of volumes, or of indices, to ascertain whether points sought for have been treated of and decided. I also feel assured that Mr Hilliard's professional acquirements, and assiduity in legal researches, qualify him to give such a book, under the revision proposed, all the usefulness which the plan itself suggests.

ISAAC PARKER.

Subscriptions received by HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. July 10.

---

CARPENTERS' CATECHISM. THIS DAY PUBLISHED, By GRAY & BOWEN, An Introductory Catechism. By Dr CARPENTER; and also a Catechism of Scripture Names, by Dr Watts. Intended for the use of Sunday Schools and Families. July 10.

---

WORCESTER ON THE ATONEMENT.—Just published and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Atoning Sacrifice, a Display of Love—Not of Wrath. By Noah Worcester. Second Edition. July 10.

---

THE TRIBUNE.—Published by CARTER & HENDEE. S. P. HOLBROOK, Editor. The following plan will mark the general course of the paper.

All party politics and discussions will be entirely excluded, though a summary of political intelligence and results will make a part of the publication.

From the superior facilities offered by the publishers' line of business, many of the selections will be made from a great number of the very latest books and periodicals. This, with the amount and variety of the original articles, will, it is hoped, make the paper acceptable to general readers and family circles.

It is a part of the design, to mention, by title, at least, if not otherwise, all books that are published in Boston, or received for sale from other cities from week to week, and this part of the plan may hereafter be extended.

It is another part of the design, to give the usual attention to public amusements, and also to give timely caution of such as may offend good morals.

Lastly, it is a part of the design of THE TRIBUNE to display, as occasion may require, some of the moral and other evils, attendant on the existing laws of imprisonment for debt.

As the plan involves expense, the publishers request that all who favor their views will manifest it by an early subscription—for the continuance of the publication beyond a limited number will depend on the amount of early patronage.

The undertaking they have been induced to engage in from the representation of gentlemen in whose judgment they confide, as well as their own opinion, that a paper containing a great variety as well as a quantity of miscellany, would be acceptable to the public. With the public they leave the question.

Terms, 3 dollars per annum, if paid within six months, or $3,50 if paid after.

Subscribers may discontinue after six months.—Persons who will obtain five responsible subscribers shall have a sixth paper gratis.—Those who have subscription papers will please send the names to the publishers as fast as subscribed. July 10.

---

NEW BOOKS,—Just published by CARTER & HENDEE.—THE SELECT WRITINGS OF WM E. CHANNING, consisting of Discourses, Reviews, and Miscellanies, collected and revised by the Author, with additions, now published for the first time. 1 vol. 8vo.

BEAUTIES AND DEFECTS IN THE FIGURE OF THE HORSE, comparatively delineated in a series of Engravings, accompanied with explanations of the points and character of that most noble and useful animal.

THE NEW AMERICAN GARDENER; containing practical directions on the culture of Fruits and Vegetables; including Landscape and Ornamental Gardening, Grape Vines, Silk, Strawberries, &c. &c. By Thomas G. Fessenden, Editor of the New England Farmer. Fourth Edition.

FIRST LESSONS IN PLANE GEOMETRY. By Francis J. Grund.

THE CLASSICAL READER. By F. W. P. Greenwood and George B. Emerson.

PESTALOZZI'S LETTERS on the Education of Infancy, addressed to Mothers.

THE LITTLE PHILOSOPHER, or Infant School at Home. By Erodore. Complete in Five Numbers.

THE CHILD'S ARITHMETIC, or the Elements of Calculation, in the spirit of Pestalozzi's method. By Wm B. Fowle, Instructer of the Monitorial School, Boston. New Edition—price reduced. July 10.

---

JUST PUBLISHED BY CARTER AND HENDEE, MATHEMATICAL TABLES, comprising Logarithms of Numbers, Logarithmic Sines, Tangents, and Secants, Natural Sines, Meridional Parts, Difference of Latitude and Departure, Astronomical Refractions, &c.

Advertisement.—The Tables comprised in this volume have been very carefully compared with the best English and French Tables; and they will be found, it is believed, not inferior, in point of correctness, to any similar Tables in use.

Prefixed is a short introduction, explanatory chiefly of the methods of using them.

---

GRAY & BOWEN have in PRESS A DICTIONARY OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE; or, an Explanation of Words and Things connected with all the Arts and Sciences. Illustrated with numerous Wood Cuts. By GEORGE CRABB, A. M. Author of 'English Synonymes,' 'Technological Dictionary,' and 'Historical Dictionary.'

'This little volume contains definitions of all terms of art and science, with such additional explanations in some cases as serve to illustrate something more than the bare meaning of the word. It is drawn up with special regard to brevity, in order to comprehend within a convenient space all words on which the reader may wish for immediate information. Although so small in bulk, yet this book will be found to contain a vast number of words which are not to be met with in any other works whatever, the explanation of which is nevertheless highly necessary for those who are not in the constant habit of hearing them used in ordinary discourse. Of this description are the Latin phrases now adopted into our language, as "Sine quâ non," "Ne plus ultra," and the like. The historical essays on each science, which have been expressly composed for this Dictionary, serve to show the progress of the arts and sciences from the earliest periods to the present.'

The American edition will be carefully revised, and contain a large amount of new and valuable matter. It will extend to nearly four hundred 12mo pages, with about five hundred fine engravings executed on wood. It will appear very soon. July 10.

---

ENCYCLOPEDIA AMERICANA. CARTER AND HENDEE have just received Vol. III. of the Encyclopedia Americana. A popular Dictionary of Arts, Sciences, Literature, History, Politics and Biography, brought down to the present time, including a copious collection of original articles in American Biography; on the basis of the seventh edition of the German Conversations-Lexicon. Edited by Francis Lieber, assisted by E. Wigglesworth.

C. and H. are Agents for the above work, for the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and receive subscriptions for the same at their store, corner of Washington and School Streets, Boston. July 10.

---

CARTER AND HENDEE have in Press, SELF EDUCATION; or, THE MEANS OF MORAL PROGRESS, Translated from the French of M. Le Baron Degerando. To this work was awarded the honor of being 'crowned' by the French Academy; a distinction annually confered on one or two works, deemed the most useful that have been published during the year. And a late Review remarks; 'We have no ethical work of any living English writer to be compared with that of Degerando.'

VIEW OF THE UNITED STATES, for the use of Schools, with Maps and numerous Engravings.

INFANT SCHOOL MANUAL, or Teacher's Assistant. Second Edition. Enlarged and much improved.

SCRAP TABLE, containing Original Anecdotes and Sketches.

YOUNG LADY'S BOOK, with 700 Engravings on Wood, of a superior quality, intended as an Annual for 1831.

THE YOUTH'S KEEPSAKE, a Christmas and New Year's Offering for 1831.

A NEW COLLECTION OF PSALMS AND HYMNS, for Public Worship. By Rev. F. W. P. Greenwood.

COMMON PLACE BOOK OF AMERICAN POETRY. By George B. Cheever.

---

PICKERING'S REPORTS No. 1, Vol. 8th, this day published by HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. July 10.

---

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. Will shortly be published a Digest of Pickering's Reports by Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law, being a continuation of his Digest of Massachusetts Reports. It will be printed and bound to match that work. For further information apply to HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. July 10.

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 7, 1830. NO. II.

MERCANTILE LAW.—No. I.

[Continued.]

There are not many capable of either generalizing or distinguishing correctly. At all events the study becomes a work of much greater time and difficulty, than it would be if a clear and comprehensive notion were first obtained of the principles which override and govern the whole. And, after all the pains which the most persevering industry can bestow, the mere case-lawyer will be liable to continual error from trusting to fancied and incorrect analogies. In short, no sound lawyer ever was or ever will be made by the study of particulars. The only way to know accurately, is to make sure of the principle—the only way to judge truly, is to consider the matter in question with reference to that principle, and then, by way of guidance, help, or confirmation, to ascertain whether the same or a like point has before arisen, and in what way it has been determined.

To supply, as far as in our power, these several imperfections; to connect the disjointed parts of the system, and embody all which belongs to it; to fill up what is defective, correct what is erroneous, and fix what is floating, is the object we have now in view; and in order to this, we propose to give in successive numbers of this magazine a series of plain, concise, and popular treatises on the mercantile law of England. In the prosecution of this design it is our intention first to shape out a general outline of the whole system of foreign and domestic trade, commencing with the simplest contract of sale, and tracing, in somewhat historical order, its gradual progression to the vast and complex operations of modern commerce. Having given this view of the whole, in order to the better understanding of the parts, we shall then retrace the sketch, and endeavor to fill it up with greater accuracy of detail. Nor are we without a hope, that in the way proposed, the student may be led by a gradual and easy ascent to a vantage-ground, from whence the entire plan may be seen, as it were, mapped out before him. It will then be found that the several districts into which it is parcelled out, however distinct in their boundaries, all partake of the same general properties, and are governed by the same general rules. The only difficulty then remaining will be the assigning of the particular case to its own specific class; a difficulty which will be infinitely lessened by the commanding view thus obtained. It has been urged before, and it cannot be too often repeated, that no art, no science, no system of any kind ever was or ever can be thoroughly learnt by the mere investigation of the separate parts. Who ever became, we will not say a good physician, but even a good oculist, by attending solely to the eye? Who can understand the working of a compound machine, if he confine his view to a single wheel? It is by observing the relation of the parts to each other, and to the whole that truth is to be obtained.

Each case also must be carfully analyzed, so as to elicit the principle. The same principles which regulate the simplest and most direct bargain between two individuals, will then be found to apply equally to the most intricate commercial dealing. The mind, however, is frequently puzzled by the introduction of a number of circumstances, altogether immaterial to the real question in issue; nor is there any habit more valuable, in order to correct and ready judgment, than that of separating immediately what is essential from what is merely accidental, and then confining the view solely and exclusively to the former. Thus, in a question as to the precise interpretation of the terms of a contract of sale, what matters it, for this purpose, whether the real buyer and seller dealt directly with each other, or by the intervention of a broker—whether both resided in England or one abroad—or whether the goods were to be handed over immediately, or to be delivered through the agency of a carrier? Our notion in this respect will be illustrated by the work itself. For the present, therefore, a single example will suffice. A mercantile house in England commissions one of the partners who transacts the business abroad, to buy and ship off to them a certain quantity of foreign produce. He employs a broker to effect the purchase, who makes a bargain with the grower, manufacturer or warehouseman of the goods, and stipulates for the delivery of them on a specified day at a particular place, to be thence shipped to England. The seller gives the broker three months' credit for the price; and he draws a bill of exchange on his principal for the amount, which is accepted by him payable at his banker's abroad. In order to provide funds for the payment of this bill when due, the partner draws on the house in England in favor of the bank, by whom this 2nd bill is discounted, and the cash placed to the credit of the drawer, so as to meet his acccceptance;—the 2d bill is then indorsed over by the bank to a bill broker, who sells it for value to be ultimately paid by the house in England on account of the goods so purchased for them. Now this, stripped of the machinery, is neither more nor less than a simple sale between A. and B. of goods to be delivered on a day fixed, and paid for in three months' time. It is evident, however, that out of a transaction so complicated a great variety of questions may arise. Thus, the goods may neither be of the quality, nor quantity contracted for—they may have been damaged in the carriage either by land or water—they may have been altogether lost—the broker may have deviated from his authority in making the purchase—he may have become bankrupt before the three months were expired—the firm in England also may be insolvent, either before the goods are shipped—and they may consequently be stopped in transitu—or after their arrival the wharfinger may detain them for his general balance. These and many other cases may occur, and the first consideration, therefore, ought always to be, on what particular part of the transaction does the matter in dispute depend? If it be on the legal construction of the contract of sale, then everything may be dismissed, except what relates to the mere bargain, as between A. and B. If it arise out of the relation of principal and broker, or of the partner abroad to the firm at home, then let it be viewed solely with reference to those several relations; the other particulars being taken into account only so far as they are necessary to the elucidation of that which is the real question.

All this may seem, and certainly is, very obvious; yet however true and simple in theory, there is scarcely any rule less regarded in practice. It is the great fault of modern reports, that they set out indiscriminately all the facts of the case, without considering or caring whether they have any immediate bearing upon the point to be decided. This may be very useful for swelling the bulk of a volume, and enhancing its price; but it is attended with a serious inconvenience to the reader. He is obliged to wade through the whole, because he is ignorant what and how much of it is material—and thus the memory is fatigued, the attention dissipated, and the mind distracted by a variety of minute circumstances, which have no more to do with the matter really in dispute than the adventures of Tom Thumb, or Jack the giant-killer. This error we shall at least endeavor to avoid in the present work. Indeed, to give a lengthened detail of particular facts, is manifestly inconsistent with its design. Where so much is to be comprehended, the limits assigned to each portion must necessarily be very narrow, and we shall therefore merely lay down general propositions, and illustrate them severally and in order, by a brief statement of the most important cases, which properly belong to them. We are at the same time far from supposing that it will be possible to proceed strictly in an arrangement so purely philosophical as that each case shall be assigned exactly to the class under which it falls. Such a method, however excellent in theory, would be found exceedingly inconvenient, if not altogether impracticable. An exception to one rule is an example of another, and it may be proper to consider it sometimes as the one, and sometimes as the other. But with this and such other qualifications as are absolutely necessary, the rule of philosophical classification will be carefully observed. If, for instance, the case be one of partnership, it will be ranged under the head of partnership, even though the subject-matter should happen to be a bill of exchange, or a charter-party of affreightment. Under the title of bill of exchange, the properties and incidents of a bill, as such, will be considered, and they only, and so with the rest. The advantages of such a method are so obvious, that on this head we shall say no more, but shall conclude these prefatory observations by reminding our readers, that if a faithful exposition of the law and principles of trade be at all times useful in a country depending in a great measure for its subsistence on trade, it must be so in a more especial manner at a period like the present. A revolution has lately taken place both in the maxims and practice of commerce. True principles have gained ground, and a better policy is both understood and acted upon; a spirit of free unfettered enterprise has gone abroad, and speculations are embarked in of a magnitude unknown to former times. The legislature also has recently interfered by many important enactments in the regulation of mercantile dealings, and the disposition of the property of defaulters; and, lastly, the code of international law has in these days been settled on a solid basis by a judge, whose enlightened decisions are recognised as authority by all the civilized nations of the world. Under these circumstances, we may perhaps be pardoned for hoping that the subject proposed will be found neither unimportant nor uninteresting.

No. II.

In pursuance of the plan marked out in our introductory article, we proceed to give a rapid sketch of the rise and progress of trade, together with a brief notice of its existing state in this country; avoiding, unless necessary for the clear development of a legal principle, all such topics as belong more properly to the province of political economy.

Division of labor, which is the first step towards civilization, is necessarily attended with an interchange of commodities. This, at first, is a direct barter in kind of the superfluity of one individual, for the superfluity, in some different article, of another. The inconvenience of this method, and the restrictions which it imposes on traffic, soon, however, suggest the introduction of a conventional medium of exchange, for which purpose choice has generally been made of some one or more of the scarcer metals, both for their durability and their little variation in value. Money, which is the name it has received with us, is valuable, not so much for its intrinsic worth (for silver and gold, however precious, are commodities which we seldom want), but as the means of procuring other commodities which we do want. It is a token indicating that the possessor has bestowed on others goods of his own of a certain value, and empowering him to receive, by the transfer of the token, an equivalent in such other goods, as may better suit his wishes or necessities. It serves, at the same time, as the measure of this value; for the metal, of which it consists, being divided into small portions of a size, weight, and quality fixed by authority, and of a value which may for all practical purposes be considered as constant, it furnishes a common third, in aliquot parts of which the value of all other commodities may be reckoned.

From the introduction of money may be dated the origin of trade, the limited transactions of barter being scarcely entitled to the name. It should, however, be borne in mind, that, though greatly extended as well as facilitated in its operation by the interposition of this machinery, the exchange of commodities remains in substance the same. The difference is this—that A, instead of receiving immediately the commodity of B in return for his own, receives that which will procure him, either now or at any future time, whatever commodity he may want, of equal value with his own. The principle is still reciprocity of actual benefit. The name only, not the character of the transaction, is changed: what was before a barter, is now called a sale; and A is said to sell, and B to buy the goods.

All objections on the part of the proprietor to dispose of his surplus stock being thus removed, there would naturally be a resort of sellers wherever there was a probability of a demand; and mutual convenience would quickly lead to the adoption of a stated time and place of meeting for the purposes of traffic. Hence the establishment, in some central and populous part of each district, of markets, for the sale of commodities in ordinary request; and of fairs, at greater intervals, for dealings of a more extensive kind. The transactions at these public marts, as they are among the earliest, so are they in general the simplest operations of traffic, being, for the most part, bargains for the sale of goods, carried into immediate effect by delivery on the one part, and payment on the other. We say for the most part, because some commodities being too bulky to be conveniently transported to market and carried home again if unsold, would be disposed of by samples. In these cases an interval takes place between the bargain, which properly constitutes the sale, and the delivery and payment which complete it; and out of the various circumstances which may take place during this interval, questions somewhat more complicated not unfrequently arise between the parties.

We have hitherto supposed trade to be confined to the mutual dealings of the inhabitants of particular districts. But the wants of men extend with their means. A demand arises for rarer and more remote commodities, and has no sooner arisen than it is supplied. For on the other hand, competition and accumulations of stock render it necessary to seek more distant markets; and thus, by a gradual and simultaneous approximation of buyers and sellers, the traffic of each region is pushed beyond the limits of its immediate neighborhood, and the sphere of communication is widened. Certain tracts of country are better suited to the growth of particular produce, while others, either from their vicinity to the places from which the rude material is obtained, or from other local advantages, become celebrated for a particular species of manufacture. Thus, to select an obvious instance, hilly regions are more favorable to the growth of wool; plains to the production of corn. In the neighborhood therefore of the former, cheaper and better cloth would be found; in that of the latter, cheaper and better grain. As soon then as the periodical fair, becomes inadequate to supply the continually increasing demand, itinerant traders appear, who, under the name of pedlars, vend the wares of one district among the inhabitants of another; making, by an addition to the price, such a profit as may remunerate them for their labor and risk. The occasional stalls of the fair, and the packs of the pedlar, are followed, and soon, in a great measure, superseded, by the establishment of permanent shops; the proprietors of which are a sort of middle men between the producer and consumer, purchasing in wholesale from the former the various articles which may chance to be in request, and retailing them at an advanced price among the inhabitants of their own immediate neighborhood. As wealth and population advance, and, by consequence, demand increases, it becomes necessary to add to the stock in each particular article, until at length it is found expedient to confine the trade to some specific class of goods; and thus, by degrees, a body of shopkeepers is created, dealing each in a particular kind of commodities. Again, as the profit of the producer depends mainly on a speedy return of the cost of production, of course those who could purchase the largest quantities would be able to procure them also at the cheapest rate. Hence the formation of another class of intermediate tradesmen, called, distinctively, wholesale dealers, or warehousemen, who, being possessed of a larger and more disposable capital, buy up the stocks of the grower or manufacturer, and dispose of them in smaller stocks to the retail tradesmen or shopkeepers. And thus, even without taking into account the subdivision of mechanical employment, which keeps at least equal pace with the increase of intermediate dealers, the steps between the grower and consumer are continually multiplied.

Now the transactions between the proprietor of the raw material and the manufacturer, between the manufacturer and the warehouseman, and between this latter and the shopkeeper, suppose, as we have seen, the transfer of large stocks, between parties for the most part resident at considerable distances. The transmission, therefore, of the purchased property becomes an object of considerable importance, and one which in early times would necessarily be attended with difficulty, hazard, and expence. In an industrious community, however, a want is not long felt before it is supplied. It was natural, therefore, and in the course of things, that individuals should present themselves, willing for a reasonable conpensation to undertake the safe conveyance from place to place of whatever goods might be committed to their charge. Originally this conveyance would be by wagons overland and along navigable rivers by barges; but as trade and capital increase, not only are lighter vehicles invented for the more expeditious transmissions of lighter goods by land, but artificial rivers or canals are formed, connecting the districts from which the raw material is obtained with the seats of manufacture, and these again with the distant markets. At present, therefore, the inland communication is kept up by the wagons, stage-coaches and vans; by canal-boats and river barges; the proprietors of which are classed indiscriminately under the name of common carriers. The owners of the soil along the banks of these rivers and canals would not unreasonably require some compensation for the permission to take on board and discharge the cargoes of the vessels which navigated them; besides which, there would be both inconvenience and risk in leaving them exposed until it might be convenient to remove them. Hence, at different points along the line of communication, wharfs were constructed, at which goods might be deposited for loading or delivery, the proprietor or wharfinger undertaking for a proportionate remuneration, to keep them safe and undamaged until they were carried away to their destination.

But besides this overland communication, it is evident that in an insular country like this, the surrounding seas would early be made subservient to the purposes of traffic. The coasting trade of England seems indeed to have been almost coeval with the first efforts of her industry; and constitutes at this day one of the most important appendages to her domestic commerce. It is to the exigencies of this mode of conveyance that we owe the construction of ports, quays, piers, and docks; and when these are wanting, or not easily accessible, another class of men step in, who, under the name of lightermen, undertake the unloading of vessels, and the transport of their cargoes to the wharf. But with such advantages as England possesses, the spirit of enterprise would not long be confined to her own shores. The same causes which have been alluded to as producing the gradual expansion of traffic into remoter districts of the same country; together with the facilities afforded by the progressive improvements in navigation, would operate in a precisely similar manner to extend those dealings to the inhabitants of other countries. Thus, for example, the flax of Ireland, and, consequently, its linens, were found to be better than those of England; while the woollen cloths of England claimed a like superiority over those of Ireland. The latter were desirable for their warmth; the former for their cleanliness and elegance; and hence an interchange naturally took place of the surplus woollen cloths of the one for the surplus linen fabrics of the other. The same observation, carried onward, applies to the wines of France and Portugal, the silks of Italy, the hides and timber of the Baltic.

[To be continued.]

DEATH OF THE CHIEF JUSTICE.

Chief Justice PARKER is no more to be numbered among the living. He died on Sunday night, 25th ult. between 11 and 12. It was not generally known in the city, that he had been sick, until his death was announced on Monday. It is very rarely that we have to announce a death that creates so much melancholy excitement. His loss is a severe bereavement not only to his family and immediate friends, but to the City and whole Commonwealth. He had been presiding during the week, at the special session of the Supreme Judicial Court in Salem, for the trial of those charged with the murder of Mr White, and returned to the city on Friday. He spent Saturday morning in the law library, and in the after part of the day rode to Dorchester with Mrs Parker. He spent the evening at his own house in social conversation, in his usual good health and spirits, and retired to bed to all appearance, perfectly well. It has for years, been his custom to rise very early in the morning, and take a long walk for exercise before breakfast. On Sunday morning he woke up at five o'clock, and observed to Mrs Parker, that he felt symptoms of the approach of one of the sick headaches that he was subject to. She observed instantly that his voice and countenance was changed, and expressed alarm; he replied that he would rise, and she assisted him with some difficulty to a chair, and sent for Dr Warren. The Chief Justice spoke no more, and soon closed his eyes forever! The doctor arrived in fifteen or twenty minutes, but the case was beyond human aid. It was ascertained that he had suffered a paralysis and continued insensible till near the middle of Sunday night, when he expired, at the age of 63 years.

Judge PARKER has taken an active part, and filled a prominent station in the annals of the Commonwealth, for more than thirty consecutive years past. He was born in this city in 1767, was graduated at Harvard in 1786, and read law in the office of the late Judge TUDOR. He commenced practice in Castine, then District of Maine; thence he removed to Portland, and soon after represented Cumberland District in Congress, and for a short period was U. S. Marshal for Cumberland.

On the death of Judge SIMEON STRONG, he was appointed Justice of the Supreme Court, but declined the appointment, probably to continue a more lucrative practice of the law. On the resignation of Judge DANA in 1806, Judge PARKER was again appointed Justice of the Supreme Court, and accepted, and returned to Boston to reside. On the decease, of Chief Justice SEWALL, in 1814, he became Chief Justice, which station he filled with honor to himself and the Commonwealth up to the very day of his death.

Judge PARKER is no more! He is indeed no more with us in the land of the living: He is no longer at home to cheer his own domestic circle: he is no longer among us as an exemplary citizen: no longer present to give direction, and to impart wisdom and the result of long experience, to our Judicial tribunals! But the valuable treasures of his mind still exist: his opinions are on record: he has contributed largely to rear for his country a structure of jurisprudence, that shall remain an imperishable monument to his fame, long after all those who now live shall have slumbered in the dust! His dicta shall regulate the decisions of after ages, and his profound principles of law shall be cited as authority all over these States and in England, the parent country of the Common Law. As a classical scholar, few were more accomplished,—as a learned man few more profound,—as a citizen, none were more universally respected than Chief Justice PARKER.

But we feel entirely incompetent to do justice to the character of the departed. We waited till the last hour in hopes that some elder and more able hand would have sent in a better sketch, and have relieved us of a task for which we feel incompetent. On reference to the college catalogue, we find among his classmates the late Hon. TIMOTHY BIGELOW, late President HARRIS, Hon. JOHN LOWELL, CHRISTOPHER CHAMPLIN, ALDEN BRADFORD, Esq. and others. We yet hope that some other of his intimate friends will furnish us for publication, with a more suitable sketch of his character.—Columbian Centinel.

At a Meeting of the Members of the Bar of Suffolk, held at the Court Room, on Tuesday, the 27th of July 1830, the Hon. LEMUEL SHAW presiding, and JOSIAH QUINCY, Jr. Esq. being Secretary, it was Voted, That the Bar of Suffolk, deeply impressed with their recent loss in the death of the late Chief Justice PARKER, whose distinguished talents and public services have conferred an unfading lustre upon the Judicial character of his native State, take the earliest opportunity of testifying their sincere respect for his memory, their high sense of his eminent public services, and their cordial sympathy in the sorrows of his afflicted family.

Voted, That the substance of the foregoing resolution, be communicated to the widow and family of the late Chief Justice.

Voted, That the standing Committee be instructed to consider and report what further measures it may be expedient for the Bar to take on the subject of the death of Chief Justice PARKER.

---

The recent demise of Chief Justice PARKER, of the Massachusetts Supreme Court, adds another to the lists of distinguished jurists who have been cut off in the midst of their usefulness, and many of them while in the immediate discharge of their laborious duties. The eloquent PINCKNEY died in this manner, surviving, however, several days, after exhausting himself in a powerful argument. The gifted EMMET, in the discharge of his duties at the Bar in one of the Astor causes, was struck with paralysis in the Court Room, and conveyed upon a litter to a neighboring dwelling, where he soon expired. ALEXANDER J. DALLAS, after arguing a cause with more than his wonted ability, returned to his lodgings at Philadelphia, and died soon after. DE WITT CLINTON, although not directly engaged in professional duty, was cut off, after a very short illness, in the fulness of his fame. SAMUEL DEXTER died somewhat suddenly on his return from an arduous session of the Supreme Court at Washington. Our lamented WEBSTER was snatched from us still more abruptly, even while engaged, on the very theatre of forensic action, in the full exercise of his high and manly powers.

The predecessor of Judge PARKER, Chief Justice SEWALL, died in a manner nearly similar. He was holding a term of the Court at the time of his attack, and survived but about a day the first warning of impending dissolution. The death of Judge PARSONS could not be called sudden, for he had been failing some time—but, if we recollect right, he was able to be in Court a short time before his decease, and if not to impart to its deliberations the fulness of his strength, still to animate his Associates and the Bar, by his venerated presence. There is a coincidence, it seems to us, worthy of notice in the respective cases of Judge PARSONS and Judge PARKER. Each died sustaining the same office, and at precisely the same age—an age fixed upon by the latter, in his sketch of the character of the former, as a period beyond which an advance was little to be desired, and was generally hazardous. Whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the correctness of his first position, the public, we are certain, will accord to the late Chief Justice PARKER the full tribute paid by him, in the conclusion, to his honored predecessor.

Beyond the age at which he had arrived, I do not know that an instance exists of an improvement of the faculties of the mind, but many present themselves of deplorable decay and humiliating debility. Should it not be considered a happy rather than a lamentable event, to escape the infirmities, the disabilities, and perhaps the neglects of a protracted old age? PARSONS died in the zenith of his reputation, in the strength of his understanding; and so dying, has left a legacy to his children and to the public, in his character, more valuable than exhaustless riches.—Concord Statesman.

ENGLISH CASES.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS—MAY.

[Sittings in Banco at Westminster Hall.]

Doe, dem. Lord Teynham v. Tyler.

Before the CHIEF JUSTICE resumed the reading of the evidence in this case,

Lord TEYNHAM, the lessor of the plaintiff, addressed the Court, and begged leave to be heard upon two points, not matters of law, as he should not attempt to address the Court in that particular, after the observations which his Counsel, Mr Sergeant Jones, had, with so much ardor and ability, submitted to their consideration; what he had to say referred to mere matters of fact.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said, that in this case as well as in all others, the Court must proceed according to the established rules, and as his Lordship had placed his cause in the hands of able Counsel, it would be irregular for the Court to allow the party himself to address them.

The reading of the rest of the evidence, and of the report having been concluded,

The CHIEF JUSTICE called on Mr Sergeant Jones to support his rule, observing that as the general impression of the court was not to send a cause down again for trial, merely because certain evidence might have been improperly received, where the evidence without it is sufficient to sustain the verdict.

Mr Sergeant JONES contended that the evidence above referred to was inadmissible, and ought not to have been received upon the trial. The question to have been decided, was whether the 12th Lord Teynham was of competent mind to suffer a recovery, and cut off the entail upon the property. There were two points which he should contend for—first that the evidence received (the steward's accounts) was not admissible; and secondly, if he succeeded in proving that it was not, that the rest of the evidence was not sufficient to warrant the Jury in coming to the conclusion which they had. In the first place, the evidence was not admissible, because the papers (the accounts) not only charged the steward on one side, but he discharged himself on the other by writing balance paid over to Lord Teynham. Besides, not a single individual pretended that Lord Teynham ever saw those papers or knew of their existence. The learned Sergeant quoted several legal authorities to show that evidence of this kind must be proved to be in opposition of the party making it before it can be received; but such was not the case in the present instance. With respect to the second point, whether, in case the Court should be of opinion that the evidence was not admissible, the rest of the evidence would be enough to establish the verdict, he should contend that was not the real question. It was, whether the Jury had arrived at a conclusion upon premises legally admitted in evidence putting aside those papers; he thought there was no other solemn act proved on the part of the 12th Lord Teynham; and it appeared clear to him that the Jury would not have come to their decision, without that part of the evidence which was considered highly important, and commented on as such by his learned friend. He hoped that the Court, in a case of this kind, would not trust to mere conjecture and hazard, that the Jury would have come to the decision without the evidence in question, and that they would make the rule absolute for a new trial.

The CHIEF JUSTICE, in delivering judgment, said that it appeared to him that this rule ought to be discharged. He should assume, for the purpose of the argument, that the evidence objected to was improperly admitted; but still he found that both in this Court, and in the Court of King's Bench, when applications were made for new trials, on the ground that certain evidence was improperly admitted, these Courts did not shut their eyes to the rest of the evidence; and when they saw that there was enough on the rest of the evidence to preponderate in favor of the finding of the Jury, they would not disturb the verdict. It had been said that it would be difficult to know what was passing in the minds of the Jury in considering their verdict, but he did not think it at all necessary to examine that point. The shorter and plainer course for the Court to pursue, would be, on hearing the evidence read over, to judge by their own discretion, whether if the objectionable evidence had not been produced, the Jury would have come to the same conclusion. He should not say more (as it might prejudice any future step which the noble Lord might think fit to take) than that the other facts, independent of the evidence objected to, did preponderate in favor of the verdict found by the Jury. It was open to the noble Lord to bring another action of ejectment or a formedon. Under all the circumstances, and acting upon the opinions which have been laid down in different cases upon this subject, he was of opinion that the Court could not send this case down for another trial.

Mr Justice PARK said that he quite agreed in the judgment of the Chief Justice. He did not think if he had been on the Jury that the evidence objected to would have had the slightest weight in the scale in determining the decision they had arrived at. Indeed he almost lamented that the evidence in question was received; not that he considered that it was improperly admitted, but because it led to this discussion. He might say that, having had the longest practice of any one in Westminster Hall; and he had known it over and over again when applications of this kind were made, that the answer of the Court was, 'Though this evidence may have been improperly admitted, there is quite enough to show that this verdict was found upon the rest of the evidence, independent of that which had been objected to.' This rule was so clearly understood, that it had got into the text writers. In 'Taunton's Reports,' there was a case in which a Lord Advocate, who was not apt to yield much, and who was stopped by Lord Mansfield when arguing the same point which had been so ably urged by Mr Sergeant Jones, and told by the learned Judge that the Court would not set aside a verdict on account of certain evidence being improperly received, if it appeared that there was sufficient (without it) to warrant the finding of the Jury, the same rule had been followed in the Court of King's Bench. In the case of Nathan v. in which he (Mr Justice Park) took a part, the question was whether I. S. was admissible to prove a certain fact; but Mr Justice Dallas said it was unnecessary to consider that point, because if that witness had not been called, there would have been sufficient evidence to warrant the Jury to find the same verdict. This, therefore, could not be considered a new point. It was open to the noble Lord to bring another action of ejectment, but he thought, if he could not produce stronger evidence, it would be better for him not to try the experiment.

Mr Justice GASELEE said he would assume that the evidence in question ought not to have been received. If the effect of refusing this rule would shut out the lessor of the plaintiff from bringing any other proceeding, the Court would pause before it discharged the rule; but there was nothing to prevent the noble Lord from having another inquiry, as the time was not expired for bringing another action. It had been said, on the part of the lessor of the plaintiff, that this evidence proved the only solemn act by the 12th Lord Teynham; but it appeared to him that there were a great many more solemn acts proved by the rest of the evidence than was the object of these papers to establish, he, therefore had no difficulty in saying that he concurred with the Lord Chief Justice and Mr Justice Park in directing that this rule should be discharged.

Mr Justice BOSANQUET said he was of the same opinion as the other Learned Judges, and he thought that, on refusing this rule, the Court would be violating no principle of law or practice. The question was, if the Court had any reason to think that the evidence objected to did, in any degree, influence the finding of the Jury; being of opinion that it did not, and that the Jury manifestly laid aside that evidence, it appeared to him that the rule ought to be discharged.

---

KING'S BENCH.—JUNE.

(Sittings at Guildhall, before Lord Tenderden and Common Juries.)

Huygh v. Gray.

This was an action on three bills of exchange, amounting to 175*l*; they were drawn by the plaintiff in October, 1828, at three and four months, and accepted by the defendant. The defence was 'no consideration.' Plaintiff is a Dutchman, and was represented as at one time a Purveyor-General in the French army. The defendant is a gentleman of some property residing in London. Some years past the plaintiff and the defendant met in America, and, afterwards, upon meeting in London, they renewed their acquaintance, when the plaintiff stated that he had a lot of valuable pictures by ancient masters, and that, as he was about to visit the Continent, he was anxious either to sell some of them, or to raise money upon them. The pictures were twelve in number, and were frequently inspected by the defendant and other persons whom he took to inspect them; after some negotiations, a written agreement was entered upon between the parties, by which two of the pictures, one a Benedictine, by Rubens, and a Madona, by Vandyke, were given up to the defendant, for which he gave 125*l*. in cash, and the three notes in question. The pictures were not absolutely sold, but were given as security, subject to sale upon due notice to the plaintiff. In some time after obtaining possession of the pictures the defendant discovered that the pictures were copies, and of no value, and he then refused to pay the bills, having previously applied to the Court of Chancery to restrain the plaintiff from disposing of the bills. The defendant, in his answer, admitted that the pictures were not originals, and that the stipulated price was an evidence of the fact, for if they had been such a much larger price could be obtained for them; in fact, that they would then be worth 7,000*l*. He also admitted having represented them as painted by Vandyke and Rubens, but contended that such representation was a custom in the picture line, and was not binding without a special warranty.

For the defence there was also put in a list of the pictures, in the handwriting of the plaintiff, and in this list the two pictures were represented as true originals.

Mr Smart was called, who proved that the pictures were not originals; and no attempts were made to deny this statement.

Lord Tenderden thought it quite clear that the pictures were warranted as originals, and that the plaintiff could not recover.—Plaintiff nonsuited.

Moorey v. Elphick.

This was an action brought to recover compensation for an injury done to the plaintiff's horse and cart by the careless driving of the defendant. The parties are tradesmen, residing on the Eltham road. The plaintiff's cart was standing still opposite to his brother's house, when the defendant, who was driving by, instead of looking towards his horse, whilst passing that of the plaintiff, he was looking backwards, and his cart struck against that of the plaintiff, whose horse fell, and had two of his ribs broken, besides injury done to the cart; the particulars of which were given in evidence.

The plaintiff's case was conducted by Mr Gurney, who said he could not anticipate any defence to this action, unless the defendant made such a complaint as one he had seen in a book of Travels, where the writer relates the circumstances of a ship Captain who had run ashore on a foreign island, and wrecked his vessel, for which he claimed compensation from the inhabitants, stating that, if the island had not been in his way, his vessel would not have run ashore.

Mr Denman, for the defence, said there was this difference between the two cases—namely, that the island was immovable, whereas the plaintiff's cart was drawn by a spirited horse, which started upon hearing the other come up, and caused the accident complained of.

The learned gentleman called two witnesses to make out this case, who did not, however, establish these as facts; but it was admitted by all the witnesses that the plaintiff's cart was left on the side of the road without any person in charge of it.

Lord Tenderden, in addressing the Jury, censured the practice of leaving horses and carts without persons in care of them: it was, he feared, too common a practice, and ought not to be tolerated; but, however, the question for the Jury was, whether, on his part, the defendant had driven his cart with sufficient care.

Verdict for the plaintiff—Damages 10*l*.

Jager v. Niller.

This was an action for slander. The plaintiff is an attorney residing in the Commercial road; the defendant is a medical gentleman, residing in the same neighbourhood.

Mr Broderick stated the plaintiff's case. In the beginning of the last year a party of friends went down to enjoy themselves at Blackwall. Amongst them was the plaintiff and his brother-in-law, a Mr Bulcock, who accidentally fell over the balcony at the Blackwall Tavern, into the water, and was drowned. In the month of August following, the defendant was at the house of a Mr Broughton, another medical gentleman, where he spent the evening, as he had frequently done, Mr Broughton being also acquainted with the plaintiff. This gentlemen proved that, in the course of conversation, the defendant, adverting to the death of Mr Bulcock, asked witness whether he had heard that Mr Jager had, on that occasion, given his brother-in-law a gentle tip over the balcony; adding, that lawyers knew how to do things nicely. On his cross-examination, he would not undertake to say that the words were or were not uttered maliciously, but he acknowledged he was afterwards present when the defendant offered the plaintiff to state that he did not believe any such report; at the same time defendant said he had never used the words imputed to him. This appeared to satisfy the plaintiff, but the witness objected, saying it would not satisfy him, for that the words had been uttered. At the time the conversation first took place between the witness and the defendant there was no person in the room, but upon Mrs Broughton entering, the defendant repeated the report, which he said he had heard; and Mrs Broughton, could not say that the words were uttered maliciously, or that they have produced any impression on her mind; and so little effect had the report on the first witness, that he did not mention it to the plaintiff for six weeks.

At the commencement of the trial, Mr Brougham, on the part of the defendant, offered to say for his client that he did not believe the report, and that he had never attributed any such act to the plaintiff, but this was declined by Mr Broderick and Mr Platt, on the part of the plaintiff; as was also a suggestion made by his lordship during the trial, that a Juror should be withdrawn; to this also Mr Brougham offered to accede.

Mr Brougham addressed the Jury, and contended that, as no injurious impression respecting the plaintiff's character had been produced on the witness's mind, he could have sustained no injury, and would not be entitled to a verdict.

Lord Tenderden said the question which the Jury had to decide was, whether, if the words were used, (and there was no proof to that effect,) they believed they were uttered with an intent to injure the plaintiff's character; and the question of damages, if they gave any, would depend on the extent of the injury which the plaintiff received.

Verdict for the plaintiff—Damages one shilling.

---

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.—MAY.

(Sittings before Lord Tenderden and a Common Jury.)

Burghart v. Slare.

This was an action brought to recover 10*l*., being the value of a parcel sent to a booking-office, and not forwarded as directed.

The Attorney-General and Mr Earle conducted the plaintiff's case, and Mr Campbell and Mr Talford attended for defendant.

The plaintiff is a tailor residing in Suffolk street. The defendant is the proprietor of the booking-office, kept at the Old White Horse Cellar, Piccadilly. The parcel, or box, containing two coats, was left at the office on the 23d of September, 1828, and was directed to James Hamilton, Esq., Ardingly, Sussex. In a few days it was discovered that the parcel had not reached its destination; but it was not until December following that the box was discovered at the Four Swans, Bishopsgate street, where it had been lying for nearly three months. It had been brought to that office by the Worthing coach, and the case for the plaintiff was, that the parcel had been originally and wrongfully sent to the Four Swans, from whence no coach then started that went in the direction of Ardingly; and a clerk from the Bolt-in-Tun, in Fleet street, proved that, from his office, there was a Sussex coach, by which they were in the habit of sending parcels to Ardingly, which is a village about a mile and a half off the road. It also appeared that parcels for Ardingly were not taken in at the Four Swans. A card, or ticket was put in, by which the defendant undertook to take in parcels, to be forwarded to all parts of England; and on this card there was a notice that the defendant would not be answerable for parcels in value above five pounds, unless insured. This parcel was not insured, nor were two-pence paid for booking; but the plaintiff's servant who delivered the box said that he was, for two years, in the habit of leaving parcel's at the defendant's office, by whom he was allowed the two-pence for his own use, as an encouragement for bringing parcels to the office. The plaintiff had to make and send two other coats for Mr Hamilton.

Mr Campbell contended that, upon the evidence, the plaintiff must be nonsuited, as the notice protected him from liability in cases where parcels exceeded in value 5*l*.

The Attorney-General cited several cases to show that such a notice did not protect against negligence, which was shown by the defendant's having sent the parcel to a wrong office.

Lord Tenderden held that the defendant would not be liable if he had sent the parcel to the proper office from whence coaches started for Ardingly, or its immediate neighbourhood. As the evidence stood it would appear that there was no coach for Ardingly from the Four Swans; and there was also evidence that the parcel had been originally sent to that office. He could not, therefore, nonsuit the plaintiff.

Mr Campbell, for the defendant, contended, in the first place, that the action could not be maintained by the plaintiff, but by Mr Hamilton, to whom the coats belonged; next that the notice protected the defendant, who, he would show, had sent the parcel by Newman's Brighton coach, which was in the habit of taking parcels for Ardingly; and even if there were negligence on the part of the proprietors of that coach, still his client was not liable. The learned gentleman called witnesses for the defence, to show the parcel had been originally given to Newman's Brighton coach, which passed by Handcross, and it was also proved that parcels were frequently and generally left at that place for Ardingly, which is within less than four miles of that place. But there was no entry of this parcel in the books at the defendant's office. This was accounted for by the clerk of the office, who said that when the twopences were not paid, there was no entry made of the parcel. This was the general practice of the office.

Lord Tenderden, in charging the Jury, said he did not think the action ought to have been brought by Mr Hamilton, but could be sustained by the plaintiff, and the only questions for the Jury were —first, whether Newman's coach was a proper coach by which to send the parcel to Ardingly, and if they thought that coach a proper conveyance, they had then to consider whether the parcel had been actually sent by that coach; for if it had been so sent, and that they believed Newman's coach a proper coach, then the defendant's liability ceased, for he was only bound to take care that the parcel had been sent by a safe and proper conveyance. He could not avoid reprehending the practice, which had been sworn to by the plaintiff's servant —namely, that of retaining, with the consent of the defendant, the sum of two-pence, which had been given to him to get the parcel booked. He did not mean to impute any improper motive either to the defendant or the plaintiff's servant, but the effect of the practice was to deprive the plaintiff of that security which he would have if the parcel had been entered. It was a great deficiency in the defendant's case that he had not produced Newman, by whose coach the parcel was said to have been sent, nor was the way bill of that coach produced, and at this period of time it was difficult to identify the particular parcel which had been sent by that coach. There was another feature in this case—namely, that the plaintiff's name and address were written on the parcel, and if the defendant had found any difficulty in finding a conveyance to Ardingly, he might have returned the parcel.

The Jury, after consulting for two or three minutes, found a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages 5*l.* and the box to be given up to the plaintiff, which was done in Court.

AMERICAN CASES.

MASSACHUSETTS.

HAMPDEN CO.—S. J. COURT—SEPT. TERM, 1829.

Commonwealth vs. Marcus R. Stevens, et al.

The window of a dwelling house being covered with a netting of double twine nailed to the sides, top and bottom, cutting and tearing down the netting and entering the house through the window, are a sufficient breaking and entering to constitute burglary.—Parker, Chief Justice.

Horace White vs. Oliver Mosely, et al.

The plaintiffs being owners of a close and a mill thereon, on the south side of a river, and their milldam being rightfully extended to land on the other side, which they did not own, the defendants crossed the river below the plaintiff's land and destroyed a part of the dam, on the north side, and having effected their object, they recrossed the river at the same place and went upon the plaintiff's close. It was held that the destruction of the dam and entry upon the close were distinct trespasses, so that a judgment in trespass quare clausum fregit for the latter would not be a bar to a like action for the former.

It was held also that in trespass qu. cl. fr. for the destruction of the dam, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover consequential damages for the interruption of the use of their mill, this injury being set forth in the declaration.

George Loury vs. William Russell, Jr.

By a bill of lading expressing that goods are to be carried from one port to another, a direct voyage is prima facie intended; but this may be controlled by a usage to stop at intermediate ports, or by a personal knowledge on the part of the shipper that such a course is to be pursued.

Commonwealth vs. William F. Loring.

An indictment under the second section of the statute of 1814, ch. 175, for receiving and concealing a dead body, was sustained, where the evidence, though it had a tendency to prove an offence under the first section, of digging up the body, did not conclusively prove such offence.

Penal statutes, though they are to be construed strictly, are yet to receive such a construction as will conform to the manifest intention of the legislature and avoid absurdity. Thus an indictment upon the statute of 1814 c. 175, forbidding any person to dig up a human body 'not being authorized by the selectmen of any town in this Commonwealth,' it was held sufficient to aver, that the defendant was not authorized by the selectmen of the town where the body was buried—this being according to the intention of the legislature.—Parker, Chief Justice.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

SUPERIOR COURT OF JUDICATURE.

Vol. 4 contains the cases decided from January, 1827, to May, 1829.

Fernald vs. Ladd.

The performance of a contract made by an attorney in court, in relation to an action, may be enforced by attachment.

But, except in cases where the contract has been reduced to writing and put on file, or entered by the clerk upon the docket, the court will not interfere in this mode, but leave the aggrieved party to his remedy by action.

Spencer vs. Blaisdell.

Bank bills may be attached by virtue of a writ and may be seized and sold upon an execution.

Eames vs. Carlisle.

E. and others, on the one part, and C. and B. on the other, agreed to submit a claim of the former against the latter to the determination of the referees. Afterwards C. B. and F. gave a bond to E. and others, with a condition that C. and B. should perform the same agreement on their part within ninety days from the date of the bond. It was held that a neglect on the part of C. and B. to perform an award made after the expiration of the ninety days, was not a breach of the condition.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 7, 1830.

The design of this publication is to furnish to the Profession of Law, a weekly Journal of Jurisprudence and Legal Intelligence; and to give the earliest information which can be procured of the Judicial Proceedings of this country and England.

The Jurisprudent will contain, so far as is practicable, a digest of cases decided and trials had, which are of prominent interest to the public. And notice will be taken of cases decided and points ruled in courts of law, in many cases, before they appear in the Regular Reports.

It will also contain notices of all such books, men, and legal events here, and in England, as will be most likely to interest the Profession.

A regular digest of cases reported will be given as soon as possible after the publication of the Reports. It is the design also of the conductors of the publication to introduce into it, occasionally, elementary articles, legal biographies, and analyses of new works.

Those who are inclined to favor the undertaking are requested to forward their names as early as possible.

Terms $3 00 per annum, if paid within 6 months, and $3 50 if paid after.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.

One square, with the privilege of changing in every other paper, $20, per annum.

Single advertisements $1 50 per square for two insertions.

We commence this week the regular publication of the Jurisprudent.

The favor which the first Number has met from the public, and especially from members of the Profession, has afforded us much gratification.

We have received much more encouragement than we expected; and have no fear that we shall receive less patronage than we deserve.

We solicit communications from our friends on all subjects which may be likely to interest our readers.

Notices of Professional Men—interesting Trials—and important Legal Opinions, will be peculiarly acceptable.

We commend our enterprise to the favor of the public and the support of the Profession.

NEW HAMPSHIRE REPORTS.

We continue in this number the publication of the Digest of Decisions, in the 4th vol. of these Reports. It will be found to contain a number of important cases. It is generally known that there is no authorized Reporter of Decisions in the Courts of that State. And although there are many inconveniences resulting from the want of such an officer, which readily suggest themselves to the mind of every Lawyer, there are some advantages to the Profession, at least, attending the manner in which these Reports are got up. They are prepared by the Chief Justice of the Superior Court and published under his immediate inspection. No cases will be likely, therefore, to meet the public eye, which are not found, on careful examination, to bear the test of principle and law. And cases which are of little interest will seldom find their way into the Reports.

With the exception of the first volume, which was prepared by Mr Adams, these Reports might well enough be called Richardson's Cases. We hardly do right, perhaps, to call the first Volume a Book of Reports. It being rather slender and thin when it first made its appearance, and when we were called upon to subscribe for it twice as much as it was then worth—we were surprised, on inquiry a few days since for our old acquaintance, to have a full and plump octavo handed us, bound and lettered to correspond with the other members of the family; but not more so than we were, on opening it, to find the last half of it stuffed with an old Pamphlet of Laws on the subject of paupers and militia trainings, with an 'act for the killing of Bears,' and 'for the punishment of lewdness, adultery, polygamy and fornication.'

A more pitiful attempt was never made to spunge the Profession out of an extra two dollars.

It is bad enough to have a mongrel volume of Reports, so that when citing it, you are not quite sure whether you may stumble upon the authority sought for, or refer the Court to an act for the settlement of Paupers, or 'the preservation of fish in Mardin Meadow;' and it is worse still to be made to pay, the thirteenth time, for Acts of the Legislature which are of little or no interest to Lawyers or others out of the state, and which have appeared already in every shape which ingenuity could invent, to those within.

We absolve the Court from all blame in this matter. The other volumes are well executed, and especially the two last, which are handsomely printed and on good paper.

There are no cases reported in this State earlier than 1816, when Judge Richardson was appointed Chief Justice. No doubt many inportant cases were determined from the year 1802 to 1816 while Judges Smith and Livermore presided in that Court. There were many able Lawyers at the bar during that time, and who was for so many years at the head of the Court, may be considered as the Father of the System of Judicature of that State. At the time he went on to the Bench there were no Reports of Cases published in any of the New England States. 'There had been no history of past transactions preserved by a Reporter; the sage opinions and learned counsels of departed Judges had been lost even from the memory, and precedents were sought for only in the books of a foreign country.' The separate duties of courts and juries were not clearly defined or generally known. Books were comparatively scarce, and the application of the principles contained in those, which were found in the lawyers' libraries, to the new condition and exigencies of the State, was difficult. This has always been a critical task to the most profound lawyers and judges, and must have been peculiarly so in the early periods of our government.

Judge Smith,

In proportion as our judicial proceedings become more simple and concise the difficulty was increased of rejecting what was redundant or inappropriate, of dispensing with unnecessary technicalities, and yet preserving the substance. The mind of Chief Justice Smith was well calculated to accomplish this work. It was not bound down, by prejudice, to the servitude of technical learning, nor was it so illiberal, from a limited education or narrow pursuits, as to reject the aids to be derived from the experience and wisdom of others. He could give the full energies of his discriminating mind to the investigation of a question, without the danger of losing sight of justice in a too great reverence for forms, or of sacrificing general principles to individual cases. 'He would tolerate nothing of antiquity which reason did not respect, and shrink from no novelty to which reason might lead.' The effects of his efforts to reform the practice of the Court, to give weight and dignity to its proceedings, to clear the course of justice, and open it to all, are generally felt and acknowledged. And it is much to be regretted, that that gentleman, in his retirement from the Bench, and from the bustle of life, has not thought fit to give the rich fruits of his industry and learning to the public. He will live in the memory of those who were associated with him at the Bar, or who have listened to him from the Bench, long after he shall have followed his beloved, lost family to the grave. But he should be remembered otherwise, and in after-times. He should be remembered, in the recorded productions of his mind, as a public benefactor, a successful advocate, and a learned, able and upright judge—as one of the greatest and best men of his State.

New Hampshire could not, perhaps, in many respects, have been more fortunate than she has been in the selection of a successor to Chief Justice Smith.

Judge Richardson

went upon the Bench under somewhat more favorable circumstances than his predecessor. He has labored hard to sustain the reputation of the Court and entitle its opinions to the confidence of the community. The volumes of Reports now before the public bear ample testimony to his industry, and prove how well he has succeeded in the discharge of the duties of his office. To those who have only occasionally seen him presiding on the Bench, there may be an appearance of haste, and precipitancy in his decisions upon points which arise in the course of a trial; yet no one ever reviewed an opinion or reconsidered a point with a fairer or less biassed mind. The operations of his intellect are rapid, and his impressions strong; but he has nothing of the pride of opinion, and seems glad to find that if he has committed an error he has an opportunity to correct it. He apprehends the points of a case with great readiness, and, though always indulgent and courteous to the Bar, decides with much promptness upon the evidence offered, and with a clear perception of its bearing upon the issue. He gives great latitude to the examination of witnesses, and the introduction of evidence, and sometimes it may be thought, trusts too much to the discrimination of the Jury in estimating the weight and character of the testimony before them.

The Judge has always been one of the foremost of those, who readily fall in with what are called the improvements in the law. And at this day, when there is an inclination to walk over the ancient ways of the law, where they are thought not to lead to the gates of justice—to introduce Chancery Principles where there are no Chancery Courts—to blend the principles of Equity and Law—it may be thought by some, that he is too ready to strain a legal principle to embrace an equitable result. He sometimes makes the law presume a good deal more than less liberal interpreters would feel authorized to do, and often rests his opinions upon very narrow, if not doubtful grounds of distinction between the settled rules of law and the apparent claims of justice. It is a difficult task to discharge satisfactorily the functions of a Law and Equity judge, at the same time—to sit in Chancery in the morning and in a Court of Law in the afternoon. The duties must be ultimately separated and kept distinct, or the popular jurisdiction of one side of the Court will destroy the powers of the other.

Judge Richardson has always been a popular man with the Bar and in his State. He is easy, affable and full of humor. The younger members of the Bar, in an especial manner, will always feel grateful to him for the kindness which has encouraged them to hope for success and helped many of them to attain eminence in their profession. The men, who began with him are gone or are fast dropping away from his Court. But those who have already taken, or may hereafter take their places, will cherish the recollection of his faithful services and his cheerful and happy temper, long after his labors shall be finished, and his voice has ceased to be heard on the circuits.

AMERICAN JURIST.

The 7th number of this work has just been issued from the press of Messrs Freeman & Bolles. We think it one of the best numbers of that able and interesting Periodical. It contains 230 pages of matter, and many of the articles are written with much attention and ability. There are eight regular articles, besides a digest of the 5th of Greenleaf and 7th of Pickering, and several notices, short reviews, and analyses of new works, with a quarterly list of publications.

We are glad that the conductors of that work meet with sufficient encouragement from the public, to induce them to devote so much labor and learning to its contents.

SALEM MURDER.

The Court met at 9 o'clock on Tuesday the 3d inst. pursuant to adjournment and proceeded in the trial of John F. Knapp, who is indicted as principal in the murder of Capt. White.

Evidence was introduced to prove the murder and the state of the body on examination. J. J. Knapp, Jr. was placed on the witnesses' stand and asked if he would be sworn, which he declined, and the pledge of the Government was recalled. Benjamin Leighton testified to conversation overheard by him at Wenham, between the Knapps, which had a tendency to connect them with the murder. On Wednesday, Mr Colman was examined as to the finding of the bludgeon, &c. He was asked as to the confessions of the prisoner, but the Court ruled them out as being obtained under expectations of favor.

J. R. C. Palmer was released from his arrest, and examined as to certain facts which went to show a conspiracy to murder Capt. White as early as the 2d of April. The acts and sayings of the conspirators were admitted as evidence to affect the case of the prisoner on trial. Other witnesses were examined as to the prisoner's visits to Danvers previous to the murder, and the letters which were addressed to the Committee of Vigilance and to Mr Stephen White. It is thought it will take the whole week to finish the trial of J. F. Knapp. The result of his case will be important in its bearing upon the others.

New Publications.

ENGLISH.

Brady's Instructions to Executors. 3d edition, 8vo.—8s. boards.

Statutes 8vo. 10 Geo. IV.—15s. boards.

Shaw's Constable's Guide. 12mo.—4s. boards.

Penraddock's Criminal Law. 8vo.—5s. boards.

Atkinson's Conveyancers Manual. 8vo.—12s. boards.

Seton's forms of Decrees in Equity. Royal 8vo.—£1 1s.

Tucker's select cases from the Records of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland. 8vo—15s. boards.

Atkinson's Forms in Conveyancing. 8vo.

Hall's Rights of the crown on the Sea and Shores of the Realm. Royal 8vo.—12s. boards.

Petersdorf's Reports, vol. xiii.

Sturgeon's Bankrupt Act. 12mo.—6s. boards.

NEW LAW BOOKS.—JOHN GRIGG, No. 9 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia, has just published the following valuable works.

CONDENSED REPORTS of CASES decided in the SUPREME COURT of the United States, from the organization of the Court at August term 1791, to January term 1828. Edited by Richard Peters, Counsellor at Law, and Reporter of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

This work is intended to contain the opinions of the Supreme Court, in the language of the Judges, in every case decided in that court from the establishment of the Government of the United States, to the commencement of Mr Peters's Reports at January term 1828. The reported decisions in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, upon similar points, are also collected and digested in the work, as notes; and abstracts of those Cases, and also of the collateral decisions of the Supreme Court are given, so that the Professional Gentleman and the Student will be in possession of all the adjudicated Law of all the Courts of the United States, in an authoritative, condensed, and arranged form.

The work will be contained in not more than six volumes; the first volume is now published; the second volume will be published about the 1st of August, and the balance of the work during the present year and 1831.

Those who wish to possess this work will do well to make an early application as the greatest portion of the edition is taken up by subscription. They are for sale by the principal Booksellers in the United States, with J. Griggs's other law publications.

Price six dollars to those who subscribe, and seven dollars to non-subscribers, payable on delivery of each volume.

PETERS' REPORTS.—Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Supreme Court of the United States, by Richard Peters, Esquire, Reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, 4 vols. royal 8vo.

FONBLANQUE'S Celebrated TREATISE ON EQUITY. A new edition, with considerable additions, from the last London edition, by a distinguished Member of the Philadelphia Bar, in 1 vol. royal 8vo.

CHITTY ON CONTRACTS. A new and Practical Treatise on the Law of Contracts not under Seal, and upon the usual Defences to Actions thereon, with Corrections and Additional References. By a member of the Massachusetts Bar, in 1 vol. 8vo.

SAUNDER'S REPORTS, in 3 vols. 8vo. The 4th American, from the 5th considerably enlarged London edition.

Say's Political Economy, new edition.

TOLLER'S LAW OF EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS. With notes and references to American Authorities, by E. D. Ingraham, Esq. new edition, in 1 vol. 8vo.

Sugden on the Law of Vendors in 1 vol. 8vo.

Jones on Bailments in 1 vol. 8vo.

CHANCERY REPORTS. JOHN GRIGG, has in press the Decisions of the English Chancery Reports, upon the plan which has been adopted and successfully executed with the 'English Common Law Reports.' The work will comprehend, in a condensed form, all the Reports which have not been republished in the United States; and it will be continued, so as to present to the profession, annually, the Chancery Reports as they shall hereafter appear in Great Britain.

The work will also contain references to the decisions of the chancery courts of the United States, and of the several states. July 10.

---

NOW PUBLISHING, BY CARTER & HENDEE, A SERIES OF SCIENTIFIC TRACTS, designed for Instruction and Entertainment, and adapted to Schools, Lyceums and Families. Conducted by Josiah Holbrook and others.

The whole Series will contain simple and clear outlines of the various sciences, and their principal division, with their application to the common purposes of life.

TERMS.—Not lest than 24 numbers of a 12mo size, containing 24 pages each, will be published in a year, at $1,50, payable in advance. July 10.

---

CARPENTERS' CATECHISM. THIS DAY PUBLISHED, By GRAY & BOWEN, An Introductory Catechism. By Dr CARPENTER; and also a Catechism of Scripture Names, by Dr Watts. Intended for the use of Sunday Schools and Families. July 10.

---

PROPOSALS for publishing by subscription an ANALYTICAL DIGEST OF ALL THE AMERICAN REPORTS. By WILLIAM HILLIARD, Jr. Counsellor at Law. Revised by BENJAMIN RAND, Counsellor at Law.

The study of American Jurisprudence will always form an essential part of the education of every accomplished American Lawyer. And to the practitioner, as well as to the jurist, the decisions of the various Courts of Law and Equity in the United States, are daily becoming more important. The Jurisprudence of the several States, with a single exception, is founded upon the Common Law of England. On most subjects of general importance, there is a great similarity in the legislative enactments of the several States. And the judicial decisions of the Courts of the several States, are often cited and respected as authorities in the Courts of other States than those in which they were pronounced. The decisions upon local or statutory law, merely, are comparatively few, and even in these, from the similarity in the statutes and usages of the several States, precedents and analogies may be found, of general application. Few, perhaps, are aware of the number of volumes of American Reports, which now exceeds two hundred and fifty. It is believed that an Analytical Digest of these Reports, upon the plan of Mr Jeremy's consolidated Digest of the English Reports, is a desideratum. The advantages of such a digest, judiciously arranged, so as to bring into one view all the adjudications of all the Courts in the United States, upon each particular subject, will be duly appreciated by every practical lawyer. It is intended that the work shall contain all the reported cases to the time of publication, without any exceptions; and a Supplement containing the subsequent decisions will be published annually.

The work will be published with despatch.

---

The work will be printed on a beautiful small type, and good paper, and will be comprised in four or five volumes, (probably not exceeding four,) royal octavo size, each volume to contain about 1000 pages; and will be delivered to subscribers at $5 per volume, in good law sheep binding, which is a very low price for a law work embracing so great a quantity of matter.

After publication the price of the work will be raised to $6 per volume.

---

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From Hon. JOSEPH STORY, Judge of the Supreme Court of the U. S.; and Hon. ISAAC PARKER, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts.

The proposal of Mr Hilliard, to publish a uniform Digest of all the American Reports, upon the plan of the English Digest of Mr Jeremy, appears to me to be entitled to the patronage of the profession. No work of this kind, sufficiently accurate and extensive for general practice, at present exists. The want of one cannot but be felt by every lawyer, whose inquiries reach beyond the limits of the local law of his own State. Such a compilation, executed with the care, fidelity and ability, which so important a task demands, would be so highly useful, that it could scarcely fail of general approbation. As far as I have had the means of comprehending the plan of Mr Hilliard, from a personal communication with him, it appears to me entirely satisfactory. And the assistance and supervision of so distinguished a lawyer as Mr Rand, cannot but ensure an accuracy and completeness in the execution of the plan, correspondent with his just claims on the public confidence.

JOSEPH STORY.

---

I have no doubt the Digest proposed by Mr Hilliard will be highly useful, and that it will have a tendency to relieve the profession from the great labor of looking through hundreds of volumes, or of indices, to ascertain whether points sought for have been treated of and decided. I also feel assured that Mr Hilliard's professional acquirements, and assiduity in legal researches, qualify him to give such a book, under the revision proposed, all the usefulness which the plan itself suggests.

ISAAC PARKER.

---

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. Will shortly be published a Digest of Pickering's Reports by Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law, being a continuation of his Digest of Massachusetts Reports. It will be printed and bound to match that work. For further information apply to HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. July 10.

---

PICKERING'S REPORTS, No. 1, Vol. 8th, this day published by HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. July 10.

---

GRAY & BOWEN have received by late arrivals the following valuable Foreign Books, which they will sell at low prices.

Dibdin's Library Companion, second edition, one large 8vo. vol.

Bowring's Poetry of the Magyars.

Moore's Byron. Splendid quarto edition.

Belzoni's Researches in Egypt and Nubia.

Description of the Ruins of an Ancient City in South America, with plates.

Memoires de M. De Bourrienne, 10 vols.

Histoire De France. Par M. Bignon, 4 vols.

Dictionnaire de Maximes. Par J. L. Malire, 1 vol.

Histoire du Congress de Vienne, 3 vols. 8vo.

Lafayette en Amerique, with Plates, 2 vols. 8vo.

The Works of Lope de Vega, 21 vols. quarto, fine edition.

Obras de Quevedo, 11 vols.

Don Quixotte, 5 vols.

Las Eroticas Villegas, 2 vols.

Trabajos de Persiles y Sigismunda, 2 vols.

Teatro Italiano Antico, 8 vols. July 10.

---

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. Complete sets of this work (thirty volumes in all) can now be had, on application to the Publishers, on liberal terms. The number and variety of the topics discussed in this work, and the high reputation it enjoys both in this country and Europe, render it a most valuable addition to the library of literary men. A General Index of the first twentyfive volumes has also been published, in a style to match with the current volumes of the work.

Subscribers and others whose sets may be deficient, can be supplied with the missing numbers. Subscriptions to commence at any period, received at $5 per annum. GRAY & BOWEN.

July 10.

---

PETER PARLEY'S TALES ABOUT AFRICA—PETER PARLEY'S TALES ABOUT ASIA.—These works are now in press, and will be shortly published by GRAY & BOWEN. They will be executed in the neatest style, and embellished by maps and numerous engravings, many of them from original designs. The object of these works is to communicate to children, in an amusing manner, the outlines of Geography and History. The Tales about America and Europe have been before the public some time, and have had a sale beyond any other publication of the kind.

PETER PARLEY'S TALES OF THE SUN, MOON, AND STARS.—This work will be published in a short time. It is designed to follow the books mentioned above, with a more particular reference, however, to its use in schools. It will embrace a view of the more simple parts of Astronomy, and be so prepared and illustrated by engravings as to bring this subject easily within the grasp of the juvenile mind. A work of this kind is evidently needed, as there is now no book before the public which pretends to give a familiar view of Astronomy suited to children.

---

WORCESTER ON THE ATONEMENT.—Just published and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Atoning Sacrifice, a Display of Love—Not of Wrath. By Noah Worcester. Second Edition. July 10.

---

ENCYCLOPEDIA AMERICANA. CARTER AND HENDEE have just received Vol. III. of the Encyclopedia Americana. A popular Dictionary of Arts, Sciences, Literature, History, Politics and Biography, brought down to the present time, including a copious collection of original articles in American Biography; on the basis of the seventh edition of the German Conversations-Lexicon. Edited by Francis Lieber, assisted by E. Wigglesworth.

C. and H. are Agents for the above work, for the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and receive subscriptions for the same at their store, corner of Washington and School Streets, Boston. July 10.

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 14, 1830. NO. III.

MERCANTILE LAW.—No. II.

[Continued.]

Stimulated by wealth, adventure, and the thirst of gain, commerce rapidly extends itself. Lands more and more remote are sought, either as a vent for the superfluities of a busy and over-stocked community, or for the gratifications which they are able to minister to its real or artificial wants. Colonies are formed; plantations established; and the whole civilized world becomes at length a general mart, each country contributing to the common stock either the choicer productions of its soil, or the works of its superior skill. The juice of a leaf gathered in the remotest nation of the East, and sweetened by the pith of a reed grown in the islands of the western ocean, now forms the ordinary beverage of overy class in England, On the other hand, the cotton cloths manufactured here are worn by the inhabitants of the tropics; the woollens by men who border on the arctic regions. The material out of which the former is fabricated is fetched from Brazil, from the East Indies, and from the islands of the Spanish main. It is dyed by the juice of an herb * which flourishes in Bengal, and the blood of an insect † which is reared in Mexico. Experience, indeed, has shewn that the transmission of commodities by sea is both easier, cheaper, and more expeditious than that by land; and thus the ocean, which seemed the barrier to social intercourse, serves rather to connect and unite the families of the earth. The interest and magnitude of the topic will be an excuse for this brief digression. But our limits forbid us to extend it; and we return. The owners of ships, by the medium of which this wide and beneficial intercourse is carried on, constituting the last, the most numerous, and the most important class of public carriers. Immediately connected with these is another and highly influential body of men, who are designated par excellence by the name of merchants. Originally, of course, the ship-owner and the merchant were one; but the separation must have taken place at a very early period. The adventurer who had brought home a cargo of foreign products would soon learn to release himself from the risk, the trouble and delay of dealing them out in small portions, by disposing of the whole at a much inferior rate to some one who was willing for the profit to submit to the inconvenience. This latter, if the speculation answered, would then employ the owner of the vessel to procure and bring over for him another cargo of the same or like commodities. His next step would be to establish on his own account a connexion in the foreign market, to purchase the goods and supply the funds himself, and, in short, to take upon him the whole risk of the adventure, hiring merely, for a stipulated reward, the services of the ship-owner in transporting the cargo. The same observations will apply mutatis mutandis to the export trade. There, also, the merchant would by degrees step in between the grower or manufacturer and the ship-owner, would take the risk and profit of the sale in the foreign market, and employ the proprietor of the vessel simply as his carrier. At this day, therefore, ship-owners, whether engaged in the coasting or the foreign trade, are, in effect, public carriers by water. The same general principles, therefore, which apply to carriers by land, equally govern them. There are, however, many and very important regulations arising out of the relation of the ship-owner and the merchant, which form a peculiar code affecting them alone. The engagements which they enter into are, for the most part, the subject of special contracts, attested by formal instruments called charter-parties. Sometimes the whole vessel is taken into the service of the merchant for a definite period, or a particular voyage. In this case, he either takes entirely upon himself the temporary control and ownership, or leaving the possession to the proprietor, has merely the use and benefit of it for the stowage of his goods. In the former case he is called the charterer or hirer; in the latter, the freighter of the ship. Sometimes, again, he stipulates merely for the use of a part of the vessel, agreeing to pay for the freight or carriage of his goods after the rate of their tonnage. In this case no charter-party is executed; but when the goods are put on board, an instrument, termed a bill of lading, is tendered by the shipper to the commander for his signature. By this document the latter acknowledges the receipt of the goods on board, and engages to carry them safely and deliver them in good order to the person to whom they are consigned. A counterpart of the bill of lading is immediately transmitted to the consignee, another is delivered to the master of the vessel, and the original remains with the shipper, each of the other parts being void on fulfilment of the terms of one. The property in the goods specified may be transferred by the indorsement and delivery of this instrument, and the first bona fide indorsee has the priority of claim. Without entering farther into details, which would be manifestly inconsistent with our present design, we may content ourselves with observing, what indeed is sufficiently obvious, that in transactions so extensive many difficult and important questions are involved. Nor is this all. The proprietor of the vessel, for the most part, delegates the command, and the conduct of the voyage, to some professional seaman; and hence new relations spring up—between the owner and commander, and between the commander and the subordinate officers and crew—also governed by peculiar rules and usages, or forming the subject of express agreements. When to this we add the regulations as to the registry and transfer of ships, pilots, ports, docks, customs and other dues, the usages of foreign countries to which ours must in some degree be accommodated, and the rules which relate to partial losses and expenses of necessary repair, with the assessment of the proportionate contributions under the name of average; and, lastly, the raising of money for these and other purposes by the hypothecation of the vessel, called bottomry, or of the goods, called respondentia, a subject opens upon us apparently as intricate as extensive.

It has been intimated that the ship-owner contracts to convey the goods in safety. His engagement, however, is qualified with a wide exception as to the perils of the sea, and the acts of the King's enemies. For any loss which may arise from wreck, tempest or capture, he is not responsible. It is evident, therefore, that the freighter as well as the owner of the vessel, is subject to considerable risk in every voyage. The cargo of the former, and the vessel, stores, and tackle of the latter, may be lost or damaged by violence or accident; but besides this, the ship-owner is exposed to loss arising out of the fraud, wilful negligence or other misconduct of his captain and crew, for the consequences of whose acts he is also answerable to the freighter. Out of these risks and the injurious consequences which resulted from them to individuals, a practice has arisen of great and acknowledged utility. A number of persons stipulate, in consideration of a premium varying with the risk, to insure at their joint hazard both the ship-owner and the merchant against all or any of these contingencies. An instrument is drawn up attesting the contract, and called a policy of insurance, at the foot of which those who are willing to take part in the speculation subscribe their names, and are thence called underwriters. At what period this most valuable usage sprung up does not exactly appear. It has, however, an undoubted claim to great antiquity; for we find honorable mention made of it in the preamble to the stat. 43 Eliz. c. 12. 'By means of policies of insurance,' says the legislature of that day, 'it cometh to pass upon the loss or perishing of any ship there followeth not the undoing of any man, but the loss lighteth rather easily upon many than heavily upon few, and rather upon them that adventure not, than those that do adventure; whereby all merchants, especially of the younger sort, are allured to venture more willingly and more freely.' But in order to entitle himself to these advantages, the party insured must act towards the insurer with perfectly good faith. He must make no false representations—conceal no defects. The vessel must be in every respect fit for sailing, or, as it is technically termed, seaworthy. She must enter upon the voyage specified in the policy, and no other. There must be no intentional deviation from the line of that voyage. In short, no risk must be incurred which might not fairly be contemplated by those who bind themselves to the indemnification. When these conditions are fulfilled, nothing can release the insurers from the liability which they have voluntarily incurred; and it is matter of honest pride to this country, that the scrupulous punctuality with which these engagements have generally been fulfilled, has been an inducement to foreign traders to effect their policies by preference in England.

* Indigo. † Cochineal.

The fiscal regulations of this country as to the duties imposed on goods imported for home consumption, and remitted as to goods which are again exported, have led to a practice now prevailing to a great extent, and which it is necessary in the prosecution of our plan to advert to—we mean the system of warehousing. But, without entering into particulars, it is enough for the present to state, that payment of the duty on specified articles is not exacted at the time of importation—that upon a bond given by the importer in double the value of the duty for payment, if required, at the expiration of a definite period, he receives from the officer of the customs or excise a warrant permitting him to land the goods (which are specifically enumerated in the instrument) and to deposit them in the warehouses attached to the dock. They are then said to be in bond. The importer, though he has not actual possession of the goods, has access to them for the purpose of inspection or sale, and the warrant serves as the symbol of his property. By the indorsement and delivery of this document he may effect as valid and complete a sale, as by the actual corporeal delivery of the goods for which it is substituted. Before we quit this subject it may be as well to mention that besides these public warehouses, there are others belonging to individuals, who derive a profit, as warehousemen, from permitting the deposit, and undertaking the safe custody of goods, which it may not be convenient for the owner immediately to dispose of.

The incidents which belong to the transfer and delivery of commodities, with the various mercantile occupations thence arising, have now been noticed as accurately as the narrow limits of an article permit. It follows that we glance as cursorily over those which relate to the payment. The basis of traffic being, as we have said, reciprocity of advantage, it might be expected that no one would be willing to part with the possession of his goods without securing an immediate equivalent. It was on this natural supposition that money was introduced; and without doubt the invariable practice anciently was, as the general rule still is, that payment should be contemporaneous with delivery. Variouscauses, however, of which it is enough to particularize competition, and the insufficiency of the actual currency for the increasing transactions of trade, gradually introduced the system of credit—and it has now become in many branches of trade, an established usage, in all it is a frequent practice, to allow an interval between payment and delivery, either fixed by the terms of the bargain or the understood cause of dealing, or left in some degree to the discretion of the parties.

SIR JAMES SCARLET.

From the Dublin Literary Gazette.

It is a difficult task to portray a character like that of the English Attorney General, presenting nothing striking or uncommon, none of those lofty attributes that single out an individual from the vulgar herd, and hand him down to posterity and fame. There is no prominent feature in Scarlet's character which you can lay hold of; like a smooth and polished globe, it eludes your grasp; perhaps I am wrong, and many doubtless will be ready to exclaim: 'impossible that he could have attained such professional eminance without the aid of high abilities and extensive learning'—this is worth investigation. To me the most remarkable circumstances concerning the gentleman in question is, that there is nothing remarkable about him. Whatever merit he possesses lies in this, that he has reached the top of an arduous profession, without appearing to take the slightest trouble about the matter. Anxious to hear and see the man who succeeded Erskine in the King's Bench, I paid an early visit to that court. In the centre of the seat appropriated to King's council, behind a pile of briefs, sat Mr Scarlet, a portly, comfortable-looking personage with a red face, who seemed to live well and to have a keen relish for all the good things of this world—an admirable subject for an alderman, but exhibiting not the slightest symptom of that lassitude and debility which not unfrequently results from laborious occupation, or from long and painful study. It would be impossible to place in juxtaposition two individuals more dissimilar in mind and person, than Messrs Brougham and Scarlet; the former looks, and generally is, buried in profound thought, and is, moreover, as thin as though he lived on the oaten cakes of his own dear Scotland; while the Attorney General's plump and ruddy cheeks amply testify that he has shared in the luxuries of London, and afford ground for inferring that he is one of those easy minded individuals who has never thought long or deeply on any subject. I watched him attentively—he had brief in every motion—with self possession bordering on nonchalance, with a subdued tone, and in an easy, colloquial, and rather familiar manner, he addressed the court, obtained what he wanted, opened another brief, and so on, till he got through the entire bundle, and when he had concluded, looked just as fresh as when he began. I confess I then thought him a very commonplace sort of a person, and was astonished that this was the man deemed fit to succeed Erskine, and as some said to eclipse him. I felt indignant at the idea of a comparison so derogatory to that great man; but, then, thought I, this is term, the business of which requires legal argument and practical knowledge, but affords no scope for the display of brilliant eloquence and wit, or of those shining qualities of mind, the exertion of which trials at Nisi Prius more frequently and appropriately elicit and require. Throughout term, however, Scarlet was, as I have endeavored to describe, going through his vast business without the slightest bustle or confusion, stating facts and dates, and citing cases with the most marvellous accuracy. His eyes constitute the only peculiarity in his features; they are small and sharp, never more than half open, and in a perpetual twinkle.—These are lawyer's eyes, quick and knowing; and these the subject of this sketch transfers with infinite address, from the cosy Justice Parke, at one end of the bench, to Justice Bayley, cast by nature into a lawyer, at the other; with these winching eyes he reads the well known countenances of the judges, anticipates every objection, and meets Justice Bailey half way, with volume, case, and page. Justice Littledale, when he has finished his little bag of dry toast, sometimes ventures upon a gentle admonition, suggesting his modest opinion in a quiet, unpretending way: while Lord Tenterden rarely interrupts 'Sir James' in the progress of his argument, but listens with complacency and attention. When the sittings at Nisi Prius commenced, I frequented the King's bench every day, and had ample opportunity of observing the habits and peculiarities of this wily advocate. The extent of his practice in this branch of his profession is enormous; the labor, also, of senior counsel in Westminster in each individual case, is infinitely greater than in Dublin; the leader accomplishes everything—states the case, examines, cross-examines, and finally speaks to evidence; a junior can find no opportunity to show off; he may open the pleadings or suggest a case in point to his leader in a modest whisper, and there his exertions must end. At first I was almost disgusted at the uniformity of Scarlet's manner. He seemed incapable of excitement—breach of promise, seduction, defamation, assault, insurance and bills of exchange, succeeded one another, and were by him disposed of in the same easy manner; he never either rose or sunk—never employed a passionate expression—never evinced the slightest emotion—never indulged in tenderness of speech—never attempted to stir the sympathies, or reach the hearts of jurors: yet strange to say, invariably obtained large damages.—Thenceforward I admired him as a skilful and successful advocate; my admiration was confirmed by contrasting him with his legal brethren. Denman and Brougham are staggered by a point of law, and will at times come to a full stop from a break in their evidence—even the eagle-eyed Gurney fails in the management of a rotten case, from a too palpable anxiety and a suspicious earnestness. In cases of such a description it is, that Scarlet stands unrivalled, not only among his contemporaries, but above all the lawyers that ever lived.—Nothing can disconcert him even for an instant; no unlucky accident disturbs, no unexpected evidence discourages him, the presence of mind he displays on these critical occasions is truly wonderful. By an uninitiated spectator his tact is neither seen nor understood, simply because it is the very consummation of art; but the attorneys understood it—they knew full well, that, where any other man would meet a nonsuit, Scarlet will gain a verdict. He treads on dangerous ground with softness, and handles every fact with cunning dexterity. In the mildest manner, and with his professional smile, he assures his Lordship that his learned friend, Mr Brougham, is totally mistaken with respect to the case cited from Barnwell and Creswell. Lord Tenterden doubts Sir James' law—he gently perseveres, and having at last persuaded that most learned and most honest judge that there is a point to go to the jury, his triumph is complete. He has got over the scruples of the judge—the scruples of the jury he can easily satisfy. He coils himself into the details of his case—explains just what he thinks necessary for the jury to know—glosses over all the rest—anticipates their verdict, because 'he well knows they are rational, sober minded men'—communes with them as an old friend in the most unembarrassed strain imaginable: and they, imposed upon by the plausibility, and apparent frankness of his manner, find according as he bids them. No one forming his notions of a Nisi Prius lawyer on the model of Wallace, O'Connell, or Goold, can have a conception of Scarlet. Take the opposite of Goold in every particular, and it might give you some slight idea of his manner. He is sly and calm, as Goold is loud and overbearing. How our lawyers do shout and storm at a witness—this may sometimes do; but I am convinced Scarlet's method is infinitely more efficacious. He throws a witness completely off his guard by his mildness—elicits all his case requires, and not a scintilla more. In his replies he excels; it is here the sagacity and craft of the lawyer produce the most decisive effect. He culls out, on the moment, all that is material, from the confused evidence of a host of witnesses, never wading through wearisome and useless details; he converts suspicions into certainties, and connects the minutest circumstance which can illustrate or assist his case, evincing a tenacity of memory which is perfectly surprising. His action is peculiar: he never gesticulates, nor does he, Wallace like, excite clouds of dust by striking the table with vehemence and fury. He employs his right hand in a little circle, never extending his arm to its full length, as ever and anon he beckons the jury with two fingers, as if he wished to speak with them behind the door. Such I have observed to be his invariable action. Now that I have endeavored to enumerate those qualities which he does possess, I ought to mention those which he does not possess. Well then—he has neither fire, nor energy, nor eloquence, nor passion, nor wit, nor humor, nor pathos. His excellence consists in fact in the management of causes. It is vain to expect from Scarlet a single observation calculated to instruct the understanding, to delight the fancy, or to touch the heart. Even though the subjects admitted, he could not indulge in wide, enlightened, or philosophical reflection. He thinks—he can think only of plaintiff and defendant; he wants a verdict, and nothing but a verdict. He is entirely the same; his sympathies seem deadened within him; the misfortunes and suffering of his client cannot divert him from his accustomed course; the exposure of unexampled villany cannot fire him with honest indignation. He is a composition of art—there is nothing natural about him. His voice is measured within a certain compass, his action tutored; and sooner might one expect melodious music from an owl, than an ebullition of natural feeling from the lips of Scarlet.

The highest and only praise then which can be given to the subject of this sketch, is, that of being a consummate legal tactician. Outside Westminster Hall, he is merely nobody; while the other great lawyers of the day, after discharging zealously their duty to their clients, hasten to discharge the still higher duty they have imposed upon themselves towards the public and mankind, Scarlet posts away to chambers to count his guineas and to hug his briefs. As a preliminary speaker, he is contemptible; his artificial habits totally unfitting him for a popular assembly.

LORD REDESDALE.

Within the last quarter, the death of Lord Redesdale and the resignation of Mr Justice Burrough have occurred. Our notice, in this place, of such a life as that of the former, can contain little more than an enumeration of the appointments which he filled; indeed only one or two particulars have reached us which our readers are not acquainted with already. John Freeman Mitford was born Aug. 18, 1748; not 1741, as all the papers have stated; neither was he, we learn from pretty good authority, intended from the first for the bar. He was a clerk in the Six Clerks' Office before he resolved on devoting himself to the higher branch of the profession; and, in this particular, the early part of his life coincides with that of Sir Samuel Romilly. He entered at Lincoln's Inn, and devoted himself to the Court of Chancery; and in 1782 he published 'A Treatise on Pleadings in Suits in the Court of Chancery by English Bill.' We are not aware what extent of practice he possessed before the publication of this admirable work, but we find him enjoying a first-rate practice soon after it appeared, and, jointly with Lord Eldon, leading in the Court of Chancery. We shall leap over the intervening space, during which he became successively King's Counsel, Welsh Judge, Member of Parliament (1789), and Solicitor General (Feb. 1792), and come at once to the prosecution of Horne Tooke for high treason in 1794, when Lord Eldon, (then Sir John Scott) as Attorney General, and Lord Redesdale, (then Sir John Mitford) as Solicitor General, conducted the case for the crown. On this occasion Lord Redesdale distinguished himself not only for his forensic exertions, but by a singular display of sympathetic emotion. Tooke had been making some pretty strong insinuations against the Attorney General's integrity, which the party assailed thought it necessary to repel. He accordingly expiated at some length on the value of character, and the excellence of his own: 'He could endure anything but an attack on his good name; it was the little patrimony he had to leave to his children; and, with God's help, he would leave it unimpaired.' Here his voice faltered, and he burst into tears; and, to the surprise of every one, the Solicitor General became equally affected, and wept as profusely as his friend. 'Do you know,' said Tooke, in a loud wisper to a bystander, on finding this bit of pathos likely to tell against him,—do you know what Mitford is crying about? He is crying to think of the little patrimony Scott's children are likely to get.'

We have nothing else to tell about this trial which is not probably well known, or much too long to repeat; neither can we venture to particularise the more celebrated speeches which he made in support of Mr Pitt's administration; a long list of which might easily be formed from the Debates. He was named Attorney General in the summer of 1799, on Lord Eldon's being raised to the peerage and named Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. Under Lord Sidmouth's administration (in 1801) he filled the situation of Speaker of the House of Commons; and in 1802 succeeded Lord Clare as Chancellor of Ireland, and was elevated to the peerage by the title which he held at the time of his death. It seems, according to the somewhat apocryphal authority of Barrington, that his Lordship was rather out of his element on his arrival among the wits of the Irish bar; and a humorous account is given of his efforts, at the first dinner party, to chime in with the tone of the company. 'His Lordship had obviously got together some of his best bar remarks (for of wit he was totally guiltless, if not inapprehensive), to repeat to his company, as occasion might offer; and if he could not be humorous, determined at least to be entertaining. The first of his Lordship's observations after dinner, was the telling us that he had been a Welsh judge, and had found great difficulty in pronouncing two double consonants which occur in the Welsh proper names. 'After much trial,' continued his Lordship, 'I found that the difficulty was mastered by moving the tongue alternately from one dog tooth to another.' Toler seemed quite delighted with this discovery; and requested to know his Lordship's dentist as he had lost one of his dog teeth, and would immediately get another in place of it. This went off flatly enough—no laugh being gained on either side. Lord Redesdale's next remark was,—that when he was a lad, cock-fighting was the fashion; and that both ladies and gentlemen went full dressed to the cock-pit, the ladies being in hoops. 'I see now, my Lord,' said Toler-'it was then that the term cock-a-hoop was invented.' A general laugh now burst forth, which rather discomposed the learned Lord Chancellor. He sat for awhile silent; until skating became a subject of conversation, when his Lordship rallied—and with an air of triumph said, that in his boyhood all danger was avoided; for, before they began to skait they always put blown bladders under their arms; and so if the ice happened to break they were buoyant and saved. 'Ay, my Lord!' said Toler that 's what we call blatheram-skate in Ireland.'—These do no discredit to Sir Jonah's invention; but there is a much better, and (if that be material) a well authenticated story of his Lordship's inaptitude for joking: 'A cause was argued in Chancery, wherein the plaintiff prayed that the defendant should be restrained from suing him on certain bills of exchange, as they were nothing but kites.—'Kites?' exclaimed Lord Redesdale: Kites, Mr Plunkett? Kites never could amount to the value of those securities? I don't understand this statement at all, Mr Plunkett.' It is not to be expected that you should, my Lord,' answered Plunkett: 'In England and in Ireland, kites are very different things. In England, the wind raises the kites; but in Ireland, the kites raise the wind.' 'I do not feel any way better informed yet, Mr Plunkett, said the matter-of-fact Chancellor.—His Lordship continued in the Irish Chancellorship about seven years; his decisions are contained in the Reports of Messrs. Schoales and Lefroy; a book, we need hardly add, of high authority in the courts both of England and Ireland. His chef-d' œuvre in legislation is commonly supposed to have been the introduction of the insolvent laws, which this, assuredly, is not the place to discuss. The principle may be good, but it has hitherto been most injuriously applied; and nothing can be more vague and unsatisfactory than the last act upon the subject. His Lordship died January 23, 1830, and was succeeded in his title and estates by his son. Our readers are aware that he was the brother of the historian of Greece; a memoir of whom, by Lord Redesdale, appeared in the last edition of the History.—Law Magazine for Jan. 1830.

ENGLISH CASES.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS—APRIL.

Sittings at Guildhall, before Chief Justice Tindal and a Special Jury.

Catherine Simpson v. Barrow and another.

Mr Sergeant Taddy, (with whom were Mr Sergeant Andrews and Mr Patterson) stated that this was an action upon a policy of insurance. The defendant was one of the Directors of the Globe Insurance Office. The amount of the policy was 1,500*l*, and was effected upon the life of a Miss Lydia Jane Simpson. It was dated the 10th of September, 1828, for the term of seven years. In March 1829, Miss Simpson died, and her body was submitted to a post-mortem examination, but nothing appeared to show the cause of her death. She had previously been in good health, and there did not seem to be any latent disease likely to shorten her life. He was not at all aware what defence the opposite side would rely upon; perhaps it might be said that she had been guilty of imprudence in her early years, or her sanity might be impeached because she wished this policy to be effected in order to obtain money to set up a school. However these points might be disposed of, he should prove that her's was an insurable life, and, having done so, he would be entitled to a verdict in favour of the plaintiff.

The policy was then put in and read. It was dated on the 10th of September, 1828, and was effected to the amount of 1,500*l*. on a declaration made on the 6th of the same month. After the usual words respecting the person going beyond sea, the grounds for the policy's not becoming void were, that the person insured was not afflicted with gout, rheumatism, or other disorder, or any disease tending to shorten life.

Mr Thomas Edwards—I live at Kennington. I knew Miss Jane Simpson. Her mother married my brother. Her daughter was the child of a second marriage. Miss Jane was the eldest of eight children. Her mother lately lived at Plymouth. I knew Miss Jane at a very early age. She came to join my family at Christmas, 1827. She was then in a fair state of health. She had been living at Wantage, in Berkshire. She died in February, 1829. My family consisted of my wife, my daughter, and myself. Miss Jane had been at the house of her half-brother when she was taken ill. She had sometimes before complained of what we call determination of blood to the head. Mr Edwards, her half-brother, lived in Brunswick square. When she came back, she complained that she could keep nothing on her stomach. She was attended by Mr Edwards and Mr Handy, of Stamford street. She died in a week or ten days. In the first instance her illness created no alarm in my mind. On the Friday I began to be alarmed. I had understood that Mr Handy did not apprehend the least danger. I did not know, until after her death, that any policy had been effected on her life. In September 1828, she was in general good health. She complained of nothing, except occasionally of those little pains in her head.

Cross-examined—When Miss Jane Simpson came to my house she was under 20 years of age. I had not seen her for seven years before. I never heard of her living with a Mrs Bradberry. The lady with whom she lived at Wantage was Mrs Pearce. That lady kept a school. She came at once from Mrs Pearce's to my house. She had been there nearly two years. I understood she had been subject to those little complaints in the head. They used to come and go. I never heard of her fainting in consequence of these complaints. She was a pale and weakly looking person. I understood she had a very severe illness at Wantage; an illness of some continuance. She had no illness whilst at my house, except those headaches. She occasionally took pills, and I understood that leeches were sometimes applied to her head, but that never occurred at my house. She was so treated while she was away. When absent from my house, she was always at Mr Henry Edwards'. I know of no other place where she visited. I think that it was not long after she came to my house that I heard of those pains in her head. I never heard her mention the quantity of blood she had lost at any one time. I never heard from Mrs Simpson that policies had been effected on Miss Simpson's life to the amount of 8,000*l*, nor that Mr Henry Edwards had effected a policy on her life. We were very intimate with Mrs Simpson before she went to Plymouth. We had no communication afterwards until she came to town. I was on good terms with Mr Henry Edwards during 1827 and 1828. I received 15s. a week for Miss Simpson's board and lodging. It was paid regularly each quarter from Mr Henry Edwards. I received also a few pounds for teaching her music. It was not until after her death that I was made acquainted with the fact of her having had a child. Her brother, who had been apprenticed to Mr Henry Edwards, was a year or two younger than she was. Mr Henry Edwards was 30 years of age. I never heard that he had been a refiner. I heard he had once been a stereotype printer, and afterwards became a medical man. He had a chemist's shop in St John street, at which George Thomas Simpson, the brother of the deceased, attended. Miss Simpson was not in the constant habit of taking pills. She was sometimes a little flushed after walking, and could not take any great exercise.

Mrs Edwards, the wife of the last witness, confirmed his statement.

In her cross-examination she said that Miss Jane Simpson was always delicate. Her appearance was always very pale—rather cadaverous, perhaps. She was moderately strong; but could not bear walking well. She frequently took medicine, but always by the order of Mr Edwards. In February, 1828, she had been bled and leeched for a determination of blood to the head, as she thought; but I don't believe it. We used to smile at her idea of that complaint, and sometimes she would smile at it herself. She was bled at her brother's. I don't know any thing of the quantity of blood she lost at any one time.

Miss Edwards, the daughter of the last witness, gave similar evidence.

Cross examined—Miss Jane Simpson did not constantly take medicine while she resided in my father's house. She took a draught occasionally. I was not at home when she first came to the house. When I returned she was taking tonic medicines, and continued them for a fortnight. She took a draught occasionally in March. She was not in the habit of taking pills, but she took blue pills occasionally. Did not analyse them. She never took medicine three times a day. When I left her in the beginning of September her health was as good as it ever was. I used to say she was sometimes a little fanciful about her health. I considered it a little affection of the nerves. She was not perpetually complaining of being ill. She was recovering from some illness when I first saw her. She was never free from occasional complaints afterwards, but they were very slight during that time. She occasionally complained of headache, but it passed off without taking medicine. She always looked pale.

Re-examined—Her illness did not appear of a serious character.

Mr Handy—I am a surgeon, and live in Stamford street. I knew Mr Edwards' family slightly. I became acquainted with Lydia Jane Simpson in 1825, and knew her until her death. I saw her at various times during that period. I was introduced to her whilst I was taking a tour in the West of England. She was a person of delicate complexion, but rather plump in her person. I had no reason to suppose, from what I saw, but that she was a very healthy young woman. I attended on the Monday, 9th of February, preceding her death. I think I saw her in the January previous, in Brunswick square, and she said, 'What do you think of me? I have walked to Hampstead and back.' When I saw her at Mr Edwards', of Kennington, she complained of great nervous debility, of sickness in her stomach, and general excitement (fever). I should say her stomach was principally affected—there was pain, and irritation. I gave her calomel, opium, and some James's powder, and applied a blister to her stomach. I saw her on the next day; the sickness continued, her pulse was exceedingly quick, she was bled, the pills were repeated, and Seidlitz powders were added. She was in much the same state on the Wednesday, and the medicines were repeated. On the Thursday her head was affected in consequence of the medicines not having had the effect. I ordered her head to be shaved, and an evaporating lotion to be applied to allay the pain. I ordered the same medicine, and that she should be kept very quiet. On Friday she appeared better. On the Saturday she complained of great debility of the stomach. I then ordered slight tonics, and a smaller quantity of calomel. During all that time I did not consider her in danger, save that on the Friday I wished to have another opinion, and I drove up the Kennington road to Dr Wilmot. On the Monday I did not call on him, as I thought there was a chance of her getting completely well, in consequence of the medicines acting sufficiently; but when I saw her on the Sunday morning, her head was very much affected. I ordered a blister to the neck, an evaporating lotion to the head, and a fever mixture to be taken every four hours. I saw her again between seven and eight in the evening; she was then dead. I expressed the greatest surprise, and wished for a post-mortem examination, not being satisfied with the cause of her death, it being so unexpected. Her family consented. Mr Franks, a surgeon, was called, and he brought Dr Wilmot with him. The examination took place on the Tuesday morning. I found nothing particular in the stomach but biliary secretions.

There was nothing unhealthy about it. The head was opened. I found nothing that we call unhealthy, but great congestion of the vessels. We were at least an hour and a half examining the body, and the result did not lead me in any degree to suppose that she was affected with any disease like to shorten life.

Cross-examined—I had not been on very intimate terms with the family at Kennington, but I was particularly intimate with Mr Edwards, of Brunswick square, who is a surgeon. He attended her for two days, and bled her. On one occasion, as I was labouring under nervous affection, I was dining at Mr Henry Edwards', and called at my sister's on my return. Whilst there, Mr George Simpson came to the house, and called Mr Edwards out of the room. In a few moments after Mr Edwards called me out, and said, 'George has informed me Jane is much worse, and he does not think she will live.' I said, 'It is no such thing; he is a young man, and, not having seen so much disease as I have, cannot be so good a judge.' Upon that they sat down to dinner, and, after taking three or four glasses of wine, I proceeded to my own house, and thence to Kennington, where I found her dead. Mr Henry Edwards had been with me on the Monday and the Tuesday, but I believe he had seen her between the Tuesday and the Sunday. The deceased told me so. Mr Edwards and I had no dispute about her life. I have been 25 years in the profession. I certainly said to him, 'Harry, how came you to insure this girl's life?' I made use of the remark, from thinking her so well. I can't say, when I used that expression, but it was on the occasion of being applied to by one of the insurance offices. His answer was, certainly not that he considered her health bad, and that she could not live, but he said to the effect that she was not so good a life. He also said something about having advanced a great deal of money. I had some conversation with Mr Freshfield afterwards. My opinion of her being a good life was confirmed by the post-mortem examination; and I remarked to Mr Edwards that I was right in my opinion. It often happens on post-mortem examination that the cause of death cannot be accounted for. The document produced is in Mr Edwards' handwriting. When I first saw Miss Simpson at Trowbridge, I remarked how plump she was; but I had then no idea of her being pregnant, but I was told so in a few days after by Mr Henry Edwards, who said that a most dreadful occurrence had happened. I saw the deceased several times at Brunswick square, in 1828, but I can't say how early it was in that year that I first met her. She came often to my house about that period. If I had my diary I could tell every day I saw her at that time. The conversation I had with Mr Edwards about her life was over a glass of wine, and the subject was not afterwards renewed. I have no recollection of having seen the answer Mr Edwards sent to the office, or of his having seen the one I sent. I did not attend the deceased in her confinement, which took place about the latter end of 1825, I was afterwards informed that the child died. I did not learn who was the father of the child. There was no conversation at the post-mortem examination of a cancer of the uterus. He never heard of the deceased being ill but once, when she was at school at Wantage. I was not aware of her having taken any medicine in 1828. I have not often been referred to by insurance offices. The letter produced is the one from the office to which I sent an answer. I was referred to by two offices, but certainly by not more than three. I can't recollect the names of the offices—I think the Globe was one, and am confident the West of England was another. I answered that I had no objection to be referred to. I never heard that this young lady had unfortunately been twice in the family way.

Re-examined—I have not the slightest interest in the insurance effected upon the young woman's life. I have no doubt of the correctness of the answers sent to the offices.

Dr Wilmot—I reside at Kennington. I attended at the post-mortem examination of the body of Jane Simpson. Mr Franks, a surgeon, and myself, operated on the body. Mr Handy was present. The examination lasted four hours. I think Mr Handy was there during the whole time. I don't recollect an accident happening to any gentleman during the operation. I observed nothing that could lead me to judge of the cause of the young woman's death. There were no appearances sufficient to account for it. I saw nothing to make me believe that the deceased was afflicted with any disorder to shorten life. The fact of the deceased's having had a child would not have furnished a cause for accelerating her death.

Cross-examined—I have not often been applied to by insurance offices. If applied to, I should not particularly think it necessary to inquire if a female had a child. I should judge from the actual state of her health. I have never paid particular attention to that subject. If I had been applied to by an insurance office, and was aware that a young woman had had a child, I should think it material to state that fact.

Mr Franks—I am apothecary to the South London Dispensary. I attended the post-mortem examination of the deceased. I observed nothing remarkable in the state of the stomach. No part of the body appeared unhealthy. I saw no apparent cause of death, nor any appearances to make me think that the deceased had any disorder to shorten life.

Cross-examined—I principally conducted the operation. I am a surgeon by the diploma from Apothecaries' Hall; but I have not been admitted at Surgeon's Hall. I took no minutes of the examination. I have been present at many; but very rarely take any minutes, except occasionally, when the case had been under my own care. A Mr Edwards was present during the examination.

Re-examined—I was satisfied there was no disease of the uterus.

This was the plaintiff's case.

Mr Sergeant Wilde addressed the Jury for the defendant, and observed that there were some cases which came before them, in which the parties had a greater stake than the mere verdict. He had the honor of appearing for the Globe Insurance Office; and his duty was not limited to obtaining a verdict in this case, knowing the character of the gentlemen whom he represented, and who, if it could not be obtained with perfect honor and integrity, would not wish for one moment to prevent the plaintiff from having the full benefit of the policy in question. Their object was not to resist a just and fair demand; but the defence he had to submit on their behalf was, that the case on the part of Henry Edwards was one of the grossest fraud and conspiracy. The Learned Sergeant then proceeded to detail the facts on which he meant to resist the present action, and said he should principally rely upon letters written by Miss Jane Simpson herself, shortly before and after the insurance was effected, and detailing the state of her health, which she considered very bad. These letters were addressed by Miss Simpson to a schoolfellow, to whom she stated that 'her health was entirely gone, and her constitution quite undermined.'

Here the Chief Justice interposed, and asked Mr Sergeant Taddy if he thought he could get over the declarations in these letters if they were authenticated? and also the fact of Mr Henry Edwards concealing the circumstance of Miss Simpson's having had a child, of which he was aware?

Mr Sergeant Taddy said that if the letters were proved he did not see how he could carry the case any farther.

After a few observations from the Counsel on both sides, Mr Sergeant Taddy submitted to a nonsuit.

CHANCELLOR KENT'S OPINION,

UPON THE CITY RAIL ROAD.

Question. Can the Legislature of Massachusetts constitutionally grant authority to the city of Boston to subscribe to the stock of a company, to be created by an act of the legislatue, for constructing and establishing a railway or road from Boston to the western borders of the State; and to be continued, if it should be deemed expedient, into one or more adjoining States, with the consent of the legislature thereof, and with such rates of toll to be levied on behalf and for the use of the company as may be authorized by the said legislatures?

This question has been submitted to me for my professional opinion; and with it the constitution of Massachusetts as it now exists, and the act for establishing the city of Boston, have been laid before me.

I have examined these documents with a view to the question. The Legislature of Massachusetts possesses all the plenary and sovereign powers of legislation which belongs to every free and independent state, except so far as those powers are restrained or limited by the constitution of the State or by the constitution of the United States. It has power to erect city governments, and to grant to the inhabitants thereof such powers, not repugnant to the constitution, as it shall deem necessary or expedient for the regulation and government thereof.

It has power to make new laws as the common good shall require. It has full power aud authority to make all manner of wholesome laws not repugnant to the constitution, and which shall be judged to be for the good and welfare of the Commonwealth.

Under this general authority it would appear to me that the legislature may, in its discretion, vest the inhabitants of the city of Boston in their corporate capacity, with power to subscribe to the stock of a company to be created for the construction of a railway terminating in the city, and extending indefinitely to and beyond the bounds of the state. It is sufficient that such a grant of power shall have appeared to the legislature to be for the welfare and common good of the city, and that it is to be exercised with the assent of the inhabitants of the city duly and legally declared.

There is nothing which I have perceived in the constitution which restrains the general court from the grant of such a power.

It is embraced in the general delegation of legislative authority, and it falls so naturally, and indeed, so necessarily, within the inherent character of legislative sovreignty, that it would require some very explicit exception in the constitution, to induce us to say it was withheld.

It may be said that neither the municipal authorities of a city, nor even the inhabitants, by a regular vote of the majority, can, or ought to be permitted, to raise moneys by tax or assessment, for any other, than municipal objects and purposes. But it rests with the legislature of the state to determine and define what are such objects and purposes, and they may extend to improvements that bear upon those objects indirectly as well as directly.

A railway, or a turnpike road, or a canal, or an acqueduct, may become fairly an object of municipal effort, and necessary to the well being and prosperity of the city, though one of the termini of such an undertaking should extend to other towns and counties, and should even reach the extremity of the states. The descretion to judge and determine on the fitness of the means to the end, must be reposed somewhere; and I have no doubt it does, and ought to rest in the first instance, with the legislature of the state in granting the capacity to the city to decide, and then with the people of the city lawfully convened by themselves or their representatives, under the provisions of their charter, to deliberate and either to adopt or reject the proposed measure.

If the legislature should authorize, and the city of Boston should consent, to a subscription in the name and on behalf of the city to the stock of a railway company, the object would be directly and essentially the benefit of Boston, and indirectly and consequentially the benefit of the commonwealth. The tolls would go directly into the city treasury, in a ratio to the amount of its stock.

The object would be therefore the pecuniary emolument and commercial prosperity of the city, and whether the calculation of the advantage be well or ill founded, it will not effect the question of right and power.

The legislature have most assuredly a right to grant to the city of Boston such municipal powers, as it shall from time to time deem for its good, provided they be not inconsistant with the constitution.

The legislature have a right to authorize the city to borrow money for city purposes, and to raise money by tax and assessment for city purposes, and if the legislature, in its wisdom and discretion, should deem a rail road to be one of those purposes, their decision would be binding and conclusive.

There is nothing in the constitution to control the legislative discretion on this subject. When it is said that the legislature are to impose and levy proportionate and reasonable assessments, rates and taxes upon all the inhabitants of, and estates laying within the commonwealth, this general direction applies only to the actual assessment of general taxes, and it leaves the legislative discretion as it existed before, in respect to the objects and purposes for which assessments are to be made and levied.

If this constitutional advice be applicable to this case, it is only when the local authorities of Boston come to assess the tax for the subscription to the railway upon the inhabitants and their estates; and in the exercise of this and of all other powers of taxation, depending on popular vote, the assessment should be proportionate to every man's taxable ability and estate. This is a principle of universal justice and equity as well as of constitutional injunction.

I have not met with any judicial decision in the reports of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, that has much bearing on the question. In the case of Stetson vs. Kempton (13 Mss. Repts. page 272) it was decided that the inhabitants of a town had no authority to raise money to give additional wages to the militia for the purposes of defence. But this opinion was founded upon the construction of the act of 1785, authorizing towns to grant and vote moneys for the support of the ministry, schools, the poor, and other necessary charges arising within the town. The assessment in question was held to be, not for a town, but for a public and general purpose, and it seemed to be assumed throughout the case, that there was no statute authority for the assessment, and that such an authority was 'a question for the legislature.' If the city of Boston were to undertake to subscribe to such a stock as that of a railway company, and to vote and raise moneys by an act of the majority of the votes, to meet such a subscription, the doctrine of the case would then be applicable, so far as to bring into consideration the power of the city under its charter, and without any special statute provision, to raise moneys for such a purpose. Such a question is not submitted to me.

The point now is, whether it is not within the constitutional competence of the legislature to confer the power in this case upon the city of Boston, and I see no good reason for a serious doubt on the subject.

Even if the question was susceptible of doubt on a strict construction of the constitution, yet in all doubtful cases the conclusion would be in favor of the general legislative discretion. All exceptions to the general delegation of legislative power under the State Constitutions are to be taken strictly. JAMES KENT.

New York, July 23, 1830.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 14, 1830.

We occupy our usual Editorial space this week, with a part of the debate upon an important question of evidence which arose in the course of the trial of J. F. Knapp for the murder of Capt. White. The point was one of great interest and importance, in the case, and was discussed with much ability. The trial has been full of nice and difficult questions, the discussion of which has added even to the intense interest created by the development of the facts. The case in its origin, disclosures, development, trial, and, if we mistake not altogether, we may say in its issue and termination, is one of the most extraordinary in the history of Jurisprudence.

SALEM MURDER.

The evidence on the part of the prisoner was closed on Tuesday last at 3, P. M. when Mr Dexter commenced his argument and concluded at half past eleven A. M. on Wednesday. Mr Webster shortly after began to address the Jury in behalf of the government and finished at eleven on Thursday, having occupied about eight hours in his argument. Judge Putnam then gave the case to the Jury in a charge of two hours, and the Court was thereupon adjourned to 3 o'clock, P. M. The Court met and again adjourned pro forma to Friday morning at 9 o'clock. At 3 o'clock yesterday, the Jury had not agreed, and were discharged. It is understood that the difficulty lies in the proof of the presence necessary to constitute the prisoner a principal in the murder.

The Prisoner's defence has been conducted throughout with great skill and talent. Every effort has been made in his behalf which industry and learning could bring to the case. Mr Dexter's argument was cool, dispassionate, logical and persuasive. He arranged, compared and enforced the testimony with great clearness and ingenuity. The duty which rested upon him, was one of great moment and it was discharged in a manner which not only did ample justice to the Prisoner's case, but has gained for the Advocate a high and enduring reputation. The occasion called for great research, judgment—discrimination and independence. Mr Dexter fearlessly and fully responded to the call. The horrible event which has so long occupied the public attention has, from first to last, drawn after it disaster upon disaster—and in its consequences, has destroyed life, reputation, happiness—everything on which it has been made to bear. The tragedy has been bloody and terrific in all its acts and developments. The sentiment of the whole community had turned the full pressure of all the horror, fear, and passions, which were naturally excited at the event, upon the Prisoners. It required strength and boldness to meet that pressure. It was an occasion beyond most others for a great failure or a great triumph. The case was to be taken up and borne off with the strength of confident talent, or it would crush the adventurer at once beneath its oppressive weight. He who has no fear to stand against the shock of such an occasion, and can come out with honor from such a contest, need shrink from no collision with talents found any where or on any occasion.

Mr Gardner's opening to the Jury we had not the pleasure of hearing.—It is highly spoken of.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

SPECIAL TERM.

Commonwealth vs. John Francis Knapp.

On Thursday, 5th inst., the counsel for the Government offered Mr Colman as a witness. He was sworn and stated that he with N. P. Knapp, Esq. went from the cell of Jos. J. Knapp to that of J. F. Knapp—that N. Phippen Knapp in his hearing there said to J. Francis Knapp—'well, Frank, Joseph has concluded to make a confession and we want you to consent to it.' To this the Prisoner answered, 'that it was hard or not fair—that his brother Joseph should have the advantage or benefit of a confession, as the thing was done for his benefit. He said he told Joseph when he first proposed it, that it was a silly business and woul l get them into difficulty. N. Phippen Knapp said to Prisoner, if Joseph was convicted there was no chance for him, but if he (Francis) was convicted there was some chance for a pardon—and appealed to Mr Colman and asked him if he did not think so—to which he replied 'I don't know—I am unwilling to hold out any improper encouragement.'

He, Mr Colman, was asked then to state what further confession Francis, the Prisoner, made at that time. To this the Prisoner's Counsel objected, on the ground that whatever confessions were made, were made under the promise or expectation of favor. After a short discussion the witness was called again, and stated that no promise was made or expectation of favor held out to the Prisoner, other than what was contained in the language above stated. The Court after consultation decided, (Judge Putnam dissenting) that the language used amounted to such a promise or encouragement to the prisoner as would render any confession or disclosure he might make afterwards inadmissible evidence. And the trial proceeded. Mr Webster afterwards gave notice that when the government had finished their other testimony, he should move a reconsideration of the judgment of the Court and ask to be heard thereon. Accordingly, on Friday, Mr Webster made his motion, accompanied with a request that the Solicitor General might be permitted to argue the question. The Court expressed their willingness to hear an argument, but thought it not proper at that time to make any new arrangements as to Counsel.

Mr Webster then proceeded in the argument.

He was unexpectedly called upon to take a part in a most important discussion,—one of the most important of any in his life. The decision of the question now addressed to the consideration of the Court would be followed by the most important consequences.

This was a trial for murder. In the progress of it the government had offered Mr Colman as a witness. He had testified that he knew the Prisoner and the other persons indicted. He states that he went to J. F. Knapp's cell in the prison, and what took place there. The Court had his words. They called upon the witness to state the further conversations or confessions of the Prisoner, but the Court forbad them. It was not necessary for him to make any suggestions upon the great importance of the evidence or of the subject before the Court. Nothing which he could say would make it more manifest or augment its importance. He felt it to be his duty in the present state of the case to bring the question again before the Court, and submit to their consideration such views of it as occurred to his mind.

The question arose suddenly and unexpectedly to them. There was a disposition to make all convenient despatch. The question was hastily considered and decided without consulting authorities or books. No case had been produced—their researches had disappointed them. They did not think any authority could be shown. A great principle of law was submitted to the consideration of the Court. Matters of life and death hung on both sides. No eye could see the consequences. It might happen that the perpetrators of a m urder unequalled in our time, or all times, guilty, by confession, would escape the retributions of the law. The lives of the innocent as well as the accused were endangered. It was an all important question in criminal law.

Another consideration. They might be allowed to presume it to be a doubtful question. What course should the Court pursue? Would they decide now in such a way as that they might reverse their decision, if wrong, hereafter; or decide now and put it out of their power to correct their judgment. It could work no injury to the Prisoner. It touched not a hair of his head—endangered not his life.

If there were any inducement, it was so small that no eye could see it, so light that no scruple could weigh it. The Court could not.

On the other hand, if the Prisoner and his associates are acquitted, this whole band of conspirators would be sent abroad again upon the community. The government could not move a new trial. There could be but one trial. Whether the law were given wrong by omission, mistake or inattention, the Prisoners would escape. They thought, if the Court had any doubt upon the admissibility of the evidence, they should admit it, and let the Prisoner have the advantage of a revision of the opinion hereafter. But if, on the other hand, they had no doubt, it should be at once ruled out.

They did hope, as the trial was not yet through, and as this was a special term of the Court created for the purpose of these trials, the Court would not think it unreasonable to reconsider their opinion and leave the question open to argument.

Mr Dexter remarked that it would not be necessary for him to say much at this time. He had considered the question settled. They had acted upon the opinion of the Court although an intimation had been given yesterday, that this motion would be made. They were bound to take their course upon that decision. The position assumed by the government was that if the question be doubtful, the Court should admit the evidence. They denied that to be law. They supposed all doubts were to weigh for the Prisoner. What was more strange, the revision was urged on the ground and presumption of guilt. They stood by the law, that every person was regarded as innocent until proved guilty. They did not abandon that presumption. The Prisoner was innocent of the charge alleged. The Court had ample time for deliberation and decided the point upon argument. He would now refer the Court to a single authority—9 Cowen, People vs. Whipple.

Mr Webster said he would make a single remark. He agreed that all reasonable doubts should go in favor of the Prisoner. The Counsel could not go farther than he did on that point or give to the accused more fully the benefit of all doubts which might arise upon consideration after verdict. The case should, however, be fully heard and deliberately decided. It was the common practice to reserve questions in this mode in England. One half the cases in criminal law were made up of points ruled and saved in this way. Look at Chitty, McNally, and others. They are full of cases ruled against prisoners and heard at Seargent's Hall upon points or questions sewed at the Assizes. If the Court could say there was no doubt, then they would not hear an argument. If not and their opinion was to settle this case perhaps, and afford a precedent to future time, he thought the Court would open their judgment to reconsideration. The case of the People vs. Whipple was not before the full Court, but come up on trial at a Court of Oyer and Terminer.

Mr Dexter here said, there was not a case in Great Britain where a prisoner had been convicted upon the ruling of the Court against the accused to get the opinion of the twelve Judges. These questions went then only when the Judge at the trial gave his opinion against the Prisoner and the question was saved for a full Court. He had taken pains to examine the practice on this point.

Mr Webster replied in a few words.

The Court decided to hear an Argument.

Mr Webster said he shoul l contend that the confessions of the Prisoners was voluntary. There were no threats or force. The evidence had been stated.

The question was divided into two or three points. Their Honors must have observed that whatever was said which might be construed or misconstrued into threats or encouragement, applied solely to the point whether the Prisoners would consent to Joseph's disclosure. The language of the witness was on the Court's minutes. With regard to any confession of his own, no encouragement was offered him. Now this raised important questions.

1. Was the matter proposed to the Prisoner or the assent asked such as came within the general principle. If encouragement were held out upon condition of yielding his assent, merely nominal, to what he could not prevent, would a confession under such circumstances come within the rule? He held not.

Was it not as clear as the light of the sun? The whole principle was this, that the party accused disclosed something which he had a right to withhold. That he has parted with something which he had a right to retain—some secret visible only to God. This is the extent of the rule. What in this case, was asked of the Prisoner? Any thing of his? Any thing within his power to withhold? It was a mere matter of form, of courtesy, of kindness. It was a mere nullity—a legal nonentity. How was it then, one of those secrets, which he had a right to keep—was not in any way bound to disclose, according to the good old English rule? If not by that, not by any law or rule here. We have no racks, no thumb screws. The secrets of every person so situated are his own. He may keep them or open his bosom and shew them to the world. If he does disclose them he must do it voluntarily. It must be free, voluntary—mero motu. If so, the law will bring them to bear with all their weight upon his case.

[Remainder next week.]

DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. The Subscribers are publishing a Digest of Pickering's Reports, subsequent to the first volume, as a Sequel to Metcalf's Digest, and also to Bigelow's last edition of 1825. Each of those Digests includes the first volume of Pickering,—the present volume, will accordingly, be a continuation of each of them. This Digest is prepared by WILLARD PHILLIPS, Esq., with the assistance of other Gentlemen of the Profession. It is constructed, as nearly as may be, upon the plan, and according to the choice and arrangement of titles, of Metcalf's Digest. The Volume will be well printed and bound, and be delivered at a price not exceeding $4.

RICHARDSON, LORD & HOLBROOK.

Aug. 14.

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of administering and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire: and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Aug. 14.

NEW LAW BOOKS.—JOHN GRIGG, No. 9 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia, has just published the following valuable works.

CONDENSED REPORTS of CASES decided in the SUPREME COURT of the United States, from the organization of the Court at August term 1791, to January term 1828. Edited by Richard Peters, Counsellor at Law, and Reporter of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

This work is intended to contain the opinions of the Supreme Court, in the language of the Judges, in every case decided in that court from the establishment of the Government of the United States, to the commencement of Mr Peters's Reports at January term 1828. The reported decisions in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, upon similar points, are also collected and digested in the work, as notes; and abstracts of those Cases, and also of the collateral decisions of the Supreme Court are given, so that the Professional Gentleman and the Student will be in possession of all the adjudicated Law of all the Courts of the United States, in an authoritative, condensed, and arranged form.

The work will be contained in not more than six volumes; the first volume is now published; the second volume will be published about the 1st of August, and the balance of the work during the present year and 1831.

Those who wish to possess this work will do well to make an early application as the greatest portion of the edition is taken up by subscription. They are for sale by the principal Booksellers in the United States, with J. Griggs's other law publications.

Price six dollars to those who subscribe, and seven dollars to non-subscribers, payable on delivery of each volume.

PETERS' REPORTS.—Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Supreme Court of the United States, by Richard Peters, Esquire, Reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, 4 vols. royal 8vo.

FONBLANQUE'S Celebrated TREATISE ON EQUITY. A new edition, with considerable additions, from the last London edition, by a distinguished Member of the Philadelphia Bar, in 1 vol. royal 8vo.

CHITTY ON CONTRACTS. A new and Practical Treatise on the Law of Contracts not under Seal, and upon the usual Defences to Actions thereon, with Corrections and Additional References. By a member of the Massachusetts Bar, in 1 vol. 8vo.

SAUNDER'S REPORTS, in 3 vols. 8vo. The 4th American, from the 5th considerably enlarged London edition.

Say's Political Economy, new edition.

TOLLER'S LAW OF EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS. With notes and references to American Authorities, by E. D. Ingraham, Esq. new edition, in 1 vol. 8vo.

Sugden on the Law of Vendors in 1 vol. 8vo.

Jones on Bailments in 1 vol. 8vo.

CHANCERY REPORTS. JOHN GRIGG, has in press the Decisions of the English Chancery Reports, upon the plan which has been adopted and successfully executed with the 'English Common Law Reports.' The work will comprehend, in a condensed form, all the Reports which have not been republished in the United States; and it will be continued, so as to present to the profession, annually, the Chancery Reports as they shall hereafter appear in Great Britain.

The work will also contain references to the decisions of the chancery courts of the United States, and of the several states. July 10.

NOW PUBLISHING, BY CARTER & HENDEE, A SERIES OF SCIENTIFIC TRACTS, designed for Instruction and Entertainment, and adapted to Schools, Lyceums and Families. Conducted by Josiah Holbrook and others.

The whole Series will contain simple and clear outlines of the various sciences, and their principal division, with their application to the common purposes of life.

TERMS.—Not lest than 24 numbers of a 12mo size, containing 24 pages each, will be published in a year, at $1,50, payable in advance. July 10.

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. Will shortly be published a Digest of Pickering's Reports by Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law, being a continuation of his Digest of Massachusetts Reports. It will be printed and bound to match that work. For further information apply to HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. July 10.

PICKERING'S REPORTS, No. 1, Vol. 8th, this day published by HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. July 10.

PROPOSALS for publishing by subscription an ANALYTICAL DIGEST OF ALL THE AMERICAN REPORTS. By WILLIAM HILLIARD, Jr. Counsellor at Law. Revised by BENJAMIN RAND, Counsellor at Law.

The study of American Jurisprudence will always form an essential part of the education of every accomplished American Lawyer. And to the practitioner, as well as to the jurist, the decisions of the various Courts of Law and Equity in the United States, are daily becoming more important. The Jurisprudence of the several States, with a single exception, is founded upon the Common Law of England. On most subjects of general importance, there is a great similarity in the legislative enactments of the several States. And the judicial decisions of the Courts of the several States, are often cited and respected as authorities in the Courts of other States than those in which they were pronounced. The decisions upon local or statutory law, merely, are comparatively few, and even in these, from the similarity in the statutes and usages of the several States, precedents and analogies may be found, of general application. Few, perhaps, are aware of the number of volumes of American Reports, which now exceeds two hundred and fifty. It is believed that an Analytical Digest of these Reports, upon the plan of Mr Jeremy's consolidated Digest of the English Reports, is a desideratum. The advantages of such a digest, judiciously arranged, so as to bring into one view all the adjudications of all the Courts in the United States, upon each particular subject, will be duly appreciated by every practical lawyer. It is intended that the work shall contain all the reported cases to the time of publication, without any exceptions; and a Supplement containing the subsequent decisions will be published annually.

The work will be published with despatch.

The work will be printed on a beautiful small type, and good paper, and will be comprised in four or five volumes, (probably not exceeding four,) royal octavo size, each volume to contain about 1000 pages; and will be delivered to subscribers at $5 per volume, in good law sheep binding, which is a very low price for a law work embracing so great a quantity of matter.

After publication the price of the work will be raised to $6 per volume.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From Hon. JOSEPH STORY, Judge of the Supreme Court of the U. S.; and Hon. ISAAC PARKER, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts.

The proposal of Mr Hilliard, to publish a uniform Digest of all the American Reports, upon the plan of the English Digest of Mr Jeremy, appears to me to be entitled to the patronage of the profession. No work of this kind, sufficiently accurate and extensive for general practice, at present exists. The want of one cannot but be felt by every lawyer, whose inquiries reach beyond the limits of the local law of his own State. Such a compilation, executed with the care, fidelity and ability, which so important a task demands, would be so highly useful, that it could scarcely fail of general approbation. As far as I have had the means of comprehending the plan of Mr Hilliard, from a personal communication with him, it appears to me entirely satisfactory. And the assistance and supervision of so distinguished a lawyer as Mr Rand, cannot but ensure an accuracy and completeness in the execution of the plan, correspondent with his just claims on the public confidence.

JOSEPH STORY.

I have no doubt the Digest proposed by Mr Hilliard will be highly useful, and that it will have a tendency to relieve the profession from the great labor of looking through hundreds of volumes, or of indices, to ascertain whether points sought for have been treated of and decided. I also feel assured that Mr Hilliard's professional acquirements, and assiduity in legal researches, qualify him to give such a book, under the revision proposed, all the usefulness which the plan itself suggests.

ISAAC PARKER.

CARTER AND HENDEE have in Press, SELF EDUCATION; or, THE MEANS OF MORAL PROGRESS, Translated from the French of M. Le Baron Degerando. To this work was awarded the honor of being 'crowned' by the French Academy; a distinction annually confered on one or two works, deemed the most useful that have been published during the year. And a late Review remarks; 'We have no ethical work of any living English writer to be compared with that of Degerando.'

VIEW OF THE UNITED STATES, for the use of Schools, with Maps and numerous Engravings.

INFANT SCHOOL MANUAL, or Teacher's Assistant. Second Edition. Enlarged and much improved.

SCRAP TABLE, containing Original Anecdotes and Sketches.

YOUNG LADY'S BOOK, with 700 engravings on wood, of a superior quality, intended as an Annual for 1831.

THE YOUTH'S KEEPSAKE, a Christmas and New Year's Offering for 1831.

A NEW COLLECTION OF PSALMS AND HYMNS, for Public Worship. By Rev. F. W. P. Greenwood.

COMMON PLACE BOOK OF AMERICAN POETRY. By George B. Cheever.

GRAY & BOWEN have in PRESS A DICTIONARY OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE; or, an Explanation of Words and Things connected with all the Arts and Sciences. Illustrated with numerous Wood Cuts. By GEORGE CRABB, A. M. Author of 'English Synonymes,' 'Technological Dictionary,' and 'Historical Dictionary.'

'This little volume contains definitions of all terms of art and science, with such additional explanations in some cases as serve to illustrate something more than the bare meaning of the word. It is drawn up with special regard to brevity, in order to comprehend within a convenient space all words on which the reader may wish for immediate information. Although so small in bulk, yet this book will be found to contain a vast number of words which are not to be met with in any other work whatever, the explanation of which is nevertheless highly necessary for those who are not in the constant habit of hearing them used in ordinary discourse. Of this description are the Latin phrases now adopted into our language, as "Sine quâ non," "Ne plus ultra," and the like. The historical essays on each science, which have been expressly composed for this Dictionary, serve to show the progress of the arts and sciences from the earliest periods to the present.'

The American edition will be carefully revised, and contain a large amount of new and valuable matter. It will extend to nearly four hundred 12mo pages, with about five hundred fine engravings executed on wood. It will appear very soon. July 10.

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW Complete sets of this work (thirty volumes in all) can now be had, on application to the Publishers, on liberal terms. The number and variety of the topics discussed in this work, and the high reputation it enjoys both in this country and Europe, render it a most valuable addition to the library of literary men. A General Index of the first twentyfive volumes has also been published, in a style to match with the current volumes of the work.

Subscribers and others whose sets may be deficient can be supplied with the missing numbers. Subscriptions to commence at any period, received at $5 per annum. GRAY & BOWEN.

July 10.

ENCYCLOPEDIA AMERICANA. CARTER AND HENDEE have just received Vol. III. of the Encyclopedia Americana. A popular Dictionary of Arts, Sciences, Literature, History, Politics and Biography, brought down to the present time, including a copious collection of original articles in American Biography; on the basis of the seventh edition of the German Conversations-Lexicon. Edited by Francis Lieber, assisted by E. Wigglesworth.

C. and H. are Agents for the above work, for the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and receive subscriptions for the same at their store, corner of Washington and School Streets, Boston. July 10.

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 21, 1830. NO. IV.

MERCANTILE LAW.—No. II.

[Continued.]

In giving credit the seller parts with goods, trusting in the will and ability of the buyer to pay the price of them at some future time. When, therefore, it is considered how often the will is tainted with dishonesty, and the ability affected by unforeseen contingencies, it is easy to perceive how frequent occasion must be given to the interference of municipal authority. Accordingly, we shall find that a great part of the code of mercantile jurisprudence is occupied with the various modes of enforcing payment, or obtaining in some way remuneration to the creditor. It happens, not unfrequently, that the tradesman, not considering the buyer trustworthy, refuses to give him credit, except upon the guarantee of some third person, who makes himself responsible for the debt, in case of the buyer's default. And that no undue advantage may be taken of promises hastily and incautiously made by persons, whose only interest in the transaction was, perhaps, a wish to do a friendly office, the legislature requires among other things, that this pledge, in order to bind the party giving it, shall be in writing.

It would obviously be desirable for the tradesman who had given credit for goods, to obtain from his debtor a distinct promise to pay the sum actually due, with an acknowledgment that he had received the value for it. Such a promise, reduced formally into writing, and signed by the debtor, would at once dispense with all proof of the items composing the demand, and of the price and delivery of the articles. Hence, probably, the introduction of promissory notes, the form and effect of which is precisely what we have stated. He who gives the note is called the maker: he in whose favor it is given, the payee. As to the period of payment they vary; some being due on demand, others at the expiration of a specified time from the date. But there is another advantage attending these securities, of at least equal importance with those which have been mentioned. In a trading community, where the quick return of capital is a matter of great consequence, it is evident that independently of the risk incurred by giving credit, a partial loss would be sustained by the mere delay of payment, unless it were in some way provided against. A profit may be obtained from the employment of money; and he, therefore, who advances it to another, or, which is in effect the same, forbears to call for it when due, is entitled to receive from that other such a remuneration as the use of it for the time would be worth. This remuneration, which is known by the name of interest, like the profit upon all other commodities, would vary, if left to its own operation, according to the value of money in the market. It has been found expedient, however, to limit it by law to the rate of five for the use of every 100 for one whole year. Now by means of a promissory note the creditor has it in his power to stipulate for the payment of interest as well as principal, and in general takes care so to express it in the body of the note. Even when he omits to do so, the law taking notice of the usage, assigns it as due; where the note is made payable on a day certain, from that day; where it is made payable on demand, from the time of demand. But though a good and valuable security for his debt, a promissory note was no further available to the holder for the purposes of commerce. Originally the maker was liable to none but the payee. The instrument was not transferable, and therefore not convertible into cash. Nevertheless, by degrees the practice grew up of passing it from hand to hand, and assigning over (of course in consideration of some equivalent) all its rights and liabilities to the holder for the time being—a practice which, though long discountenanced by the law, at length received a statutary sanction.

The practice of negociating promissory notes was derived from that which had always prevailed as to another and more important instrument, long introduced into commercial transactions under the name of a bill of exchange. This may be properly described as a written order or request, addressed by one person to another, directing the latter to pay on account of the former, to some third person or his order, a certain sum of money at a time therein specified. The person who gives the order, is called the drawer of the bill; he to whom it is directed, the drawee; and he in whose favor it is made, the payee. It is made payable either at sight, or at so many days or months after sight, or at so many days or months after date. It is called a foreign bill when drawn by a person resident abroad on his correspondent in England, or conversely an inland bill, when both parties reside in this country. In drawing foreign bills of exchange, it is customary to give two or three of the same tenor and date, to guard against unforeseen but probable casualties; in which case it is mentioned in the body of the bill, that it is the last, 2nd, or 3d bill of exchange, either of which being paid, the rest become void. It is generally said that bills of exchange were invented by merchants resident in different countries, for the more easy and safe remittance of money from the one to the other, and that from thence it was subsequently extended to commercial transactions within this kingdom.* Undoubtedly the method is not indigenous with us, and seems to have been borrowed from countries which preceeded us in the pursuit of commerce. Its usefulness also as a mode of remittance is sufficiently evident; for to take the instance given by Blackstone, 'If A. live in Jamaica and owe B. who lives in England 1000*l.*, now if C. be going from England to Jamaica, he may advance B. this 1000*l.*, and take a bill of exchange drawn by B. in England upon A. in Jamaica, and receive it when he comes thither: thus B. receives his debt at any distance of place by transferring it to C., who carries over his money in paper credit, without the risk of robbery or loss.'† Still it is more probable, that the practice of using bills for foreign remittance was an extension of that which already prevailed in inland transactions, than that this latter was adopted from the example of the former. Nothing could be more natural, when the system of credit was once established, than that the trader, whose available funds might not be sufficient to pay ready money for a commodity which he was desirous of purchasing, should tender to the seller an order for payment on some other on whom he had a claim to an amount covering the price of his present purchase. By this contrivance the seller had also an additional security for the payment. It was probable the drawee might honor the bill, and at its maturity, pay the money; and if he did not, the drawer would still be liable for the amount. It afforded him also an expeditious and summary remedy against the latter; for as in the case of a promissory note, so in a bill of exchange, it is unnecessary to prove the consideration for which it is given. Of course the payee would take an early opportunity of ascertaining from the drawee, whether he would undertake to satisfy the bill at the expiration of the specified time. If he consented, and signified his acceptance, either by writing upon the bill or otherwise, he was then termed the acceptor, and immediately became liable as such for the amount, not only to the payee, but to the drawer also, whose title to give the order he by this act admitted. Precisely in the same manner as the payee had been induced to take this bill or order in payment, another might be willing to accept it from him in the purchase of other commodities, and as it purported to be payable to his order as well as to himself, he signified that order by the indorsement of his name. The bill might thus be passed from hand to hand, and would increase in value by each successive transfer, inasmuch as the holder had a claim, not only upon the original parties to the bill, but also on every preceding indorser, each of whom guaranteed the payment of all who followed him, in case of default by the person primarily liable. Though the payee in general, as we have said, presents the bill for acceptance, yet where distance or other causes interfere to prevent this, any subsequent holder may do so at any time during the period of its currency. Occasionally when the drawee refuses to accept, some other person, not a party to the bill, for the credit of the drawer, or some one of the indorsers, voluntarily undertakes to pay it when at maturity; such person is termed an acceptor supra protest, or more generally an acceptor for honor, and becomes responsible to all whose claim upon the bill extends to the party for whose honor it has been accepted. Originally, perhaps, the use and operation of bills of exchange were confined to the case which we have supposed; but as the transaction was founded on a supposition that the drawee either had in his possession funds of the drawer, or was in his debt to the amount of the sum specified, it was by no strained application that it became usual in the bargains of commercial men, for the seller to draw a bill on the buyer, payable to his own order, for the price of the goods sold, which bill the latter immediately accepted. The effect of this arrangement, which is now frequently adopted, is this:—The buyer is not called upon for actual payment in cash, until the maturity of the bill; or in other words, he has credit for that time, while at the same time the seller has not only an available security for his debt, but can at any time, by endorsing his name, and thereby adding his own guarantee, dispose of the bill and convert it into value. Neither was it any great stretch of the principle of these negotiable securities, that one, who had consigned goods to another to be sold on his account, should draw, and that the consignee should accept, before the goods were disposed of, perhaps even before they were received, bills for a sum short of their estimated value, on the reasonable supposition that before they became due, the acceptor would have procured by the sale funds adequate to meet his liability. Thus far the use of bills was certainly natural, and perhaps warranted by general convenience. But the facility of negotiation has given rise of late years to practices which are not only a departure from the original purpose of these useful instruments, but which are liable also to an abuse, injurious to the real interests of trade. It has been already said that the use of money for a given period is always of some value in the market; and where, as in this country, it is plentiful, persons are always to be found who are willing to advance it for the sake of the interest. Now to give cash for a bill not due, is in effect to advance so much money, and the person cashing it is entitled to interest for the time which must elapse before it becomes due. Subject, therefore, to the deduction of this sum, which is termed the discount, the holder of a good bill may at any time obtain the value of it in specie. Thus by an easy transmission it becomes an instrument for the raising of money: for suppose A wishes to procure 100*l.* but is conscious that his own credit is not sufficient for obtaining it by loan, he applies to some friend whose credit stands higher, to accept a bill drawn by himself, payable perhaps at the end of three months, undertaking either to supply the funds necessary for paying it when due, or in the meantime to provide for it in some other way. The bill so accepted (and which, from the mode of procuring it, is called an accommodation bill,) he now takes to some monied man, who cashes it, and thereby puts him into immediate possession of the sum wanted, minus the small deduction for discount, or in other words, lends him that sum for three months upon the personal security of the acceptor and himself. This may serve as one instance out of many; for to enumerate all the purposes to which bills of exchange are made subservient would exceed our limits. Suffice it to say, that they enter into almost every transaction of trade, and are not only, as was their original intention, the ordinary instruments of payment, but the general media for the procuring of temporary loans.

* 2 Blac. Com. 460, 7. † 2 Blac. Com. 460, 7.

JUSTICE BURROUGH.

As Mr Justice Burrough has signed his resignation, though, at this present writing, ostensibly a judge, we may consider him within our jurisdiction. We do not know the place or date of his birth, but his family, we believe, are established in Hampshire. He had not the advantage of a university education; nor, indeed, was he ever remarkable for learning or literary acquirement; though this may be attributable in some measure to the close attention he paid to special pleading; a branch of practice pursued by him for several years before he was called to the bar. On being called, he attended the Hampshire sessions and western circuit; and he has been heard to say that his profits, at a single session, often exceeded one hundred guineas. He held a high rank on the western circuit, though he never arrived at the dignity of leader. In 1816, he was raised to the bench; where he continued to distinguish himself, as before, by a profound knowledge of certain branches of law, particularly of special pleading; and by the kindness and simplicity of his demeanor. It is said, that, upon his elevation, he made it his formal request to the bar, that they would not call him 'Jemmy' in court. He was, it may easily be supposed, extremely averse from the least shadow of affectation; of which some amusing instances are told. The following may pass for a specimen: a man was tried before him for stealing a pair of breeches. The prosecution was conducted by a young barrister, who, seeing a female witness in the box, and the court crowded with ladies, thought proper to speak of the stolen garment as inexpressibles. 'Inexpressibles!' said the judge, 'inexpressibles—I don't find any mention of such a thing in the indictment.' 'Why no, my lord,' simpered the counsellor; 'I thought, my lord, it might be as well'—(and here he winked and nodded, in the vain endeavor to inspire the judge with the same regard for propriety); 'the indictment mentions breeches.' 'Then why could'nt you say breeches at once; here, Mr Undersheriff, please to hand them up to the lady. Now, ma'am, are you ready to swear that those are your husband's breeches?' His mode of illustration was also remarkably quaint. We once heard him begin an address to a jury in this manner: 'Gentlemen, you have been told that the first is a consequential issue; now perhaps, you don't know what a consequential issue means; but I dare say you understand ninepins. Well, then, if you deliver your bowl so as to strike the front pin in a particular direction, down go the rest; just so it is with these counts; knock down the first, and all the rest will go to the ground; that's what we call a consequential issue.' Mr Justice Burrough was always rather popular with the bar; his chief fault being the remaining too long upon the bench; and as he is not likely to commit that fault again, we shall say nothing more about it. A facetious Ex-Baron of the Exchequer complains, that Mr Justice Burrough's conduct was rather hard upon him; as he was induced to resign by the constant allusions of the press to the improper continuance of superannuated judges on the bench, which, though they now appear to have been aimed at his learned brother, he all along considered to have been intended for himself.

Law Journal, January 1830.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Commonwealth v. J. F. Knapp.

At the Supreme Judicial Court for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, holden at Salem, on the second Tuesday in July, A. D. 1830, pursuant to an Act of the Legislature, passed June 5, 1830.

PRESENT,

HON. ISAAC PARKER, LL. D., Chief Justice.
HON. SAMUEL PUTNAM, LL. D.,
HON. SAMUEL S. WILDE, LL. D., } Justices.
HON. MARCUS MORTON, LL. D.,

The Grand Jury being empannelled and sworn, the following very lucid and impressive charge was delivered to them by his Honor Chief Justice Parker.

Gentlemen of the Grand Jury,—

This Court is convened out of its ordinary season in virtue of a special appointment of the Legislature made at its last session, and you have been summoned here by the same authority, and having had the oath administered to you, which is prescribed by law to qualify you to act in the capacity of Grand Jurors, you now have become the Grand Inquest of the Commonwealth for the body of this County of Essex, with all the power and duties which pertain to that body when attending the ordinary sessions of this Court in relation to such cases as come within the purview of the statute above referred to.

The Jurisdiction given to the Court by this Act of the Legislature, extends to all crimes and misdemeanors which may have been committed within the body of this County before the passing of this Act; such as may have occurred since that time are to be left to the usual administration of justice at the succeeding regular term of the Court.

Notwithstanding the general terms in which the jurisdiction is given, comprehending all crimes and misdemeanors, there is reason to believe that the chief purpose of the Legislature in establishing this term, was that judicial inquiry should be made into a transaction of a most afflictive nature which took place in this town some months since.

This transaction was of a nature to excite alarm and agitation, not only in the vicinity where it happened, but throughout the Commonwealth and even beyond it.

An aged and respectable citizen, living in the centre of this populous town, so long remarkable for its tranquility, peace and order, he being surrounded by all those circumstances which usually give security to the property and person, has been assassinated in his bed probably in the depth of sleep—his skull fractured by a blow from some heavy weapon—his body pierced with many wounds—and this was done with such secrecy that not a trace for a long time appeared to be left, by which the perpetrators of so horrid a deed could be discovered. No wonder that the shock felt here was so great; it has vibrated through the whole community.

Murder is under all circumstances an appalling crime, it exhibits in the perpetrator the deepest stain of depravity of which human nature is capable. But when in the stillness of night during the hours of repose, the assassin invades the quiet mansion—steals into the chamber of sleep—and converts that sleep into death by one fell blow, and as if insatiate of blood seeks the heart of the victim, which had already ceased to beat—there is no stoicism, no philosophy, hardly any religion which can repress those feelings of terror, those expressions of horror, which such a tragedy is calculated to produce.

I speak thus of the crime because it is notorious. We all feel alike about it, nor is there any occasion to suppress the feeling, but it must be regulated and kept within just bounds.

You are convened here not so much to inquire if a crime has been committed, though even that must be proved to you by legal evidence, as to seek out the perpetrators and present them, if discovered, to the bar of this Court for trial. It is the duty of the Court to warn you against suffering your indignation for the crime to affect your inquiries for the offenders. The popular voice justly cries out for vengeance, but it is only upon the guilty it ought to fall.

There is danger in all great excitements that the mind may be thrown off its balance, that the process of inquiry may be too rapid to be sure, that the suspected may readily be believed to be guilty, that prepossession may supersede proof. How apt are we all upon hearing of the commission of some great crime to listen greedily to every circumstance which has a tendency to fix the guilt upon some individual, to shut our ears against exculpatory facts, and to pass sentence of condemnation before any hearing and without any trial.

This is a state of mind which disables us from acting impartially in the office of judge or juror. We are to stand indifferent between the Commonwealth and the accused; ever to presume that he is innocent until we have proof that he is not. We are to sift and weigh all the facts produced in proof, with a hope that they may all be consistent with his innocence. A Grand Jury especially, who by the very nature of their duty are prevented from hearing the accused, or any evidence in his favor, except what may be drawn from the witnesses produced against him, and should be cautious not to act hastily, or upon slight evidence.

They ought to be satisfied before they agree upon an indictment, that the evidence as it appears before them, is sufficient to convict him of the imputed crime, for if it should not be sufficient under those circumstances, what probability is there of a conviction when the party shall be put upon his full defence, with the privilege of adducing counter evidence in his favor, and of counsel to enforce it? And no citizen ought to be exposed to the anxiety and ignominy of accusation for a capital offence if there be no probable proof of his guilt. It is a most happy characteristic of our system of criminal justice that it requires deliberate and patient investigation. Let those who complain of the slowness of its pace, consider, that it is framed for the protection of innocence as well as for the punishment of guilt, and that more rapid movements might involve in ruin those who might afterwards be found not to deserve it. Occasions like the present sometimes arise, when a just indignation at some enormous crime, pervades the whole community, and the officers of justice are loudly called upon by the public voice to hasten the exercise of their functions, and to purify the land of the blood with which it has been stained, by an early condemnation of the supposed perpetrator; but the law moves not from its course, it gives time for deliberation, for the return of sober thought which has been suspended by agitation and excitement,—it calls for proofs—it gives reasonable opportunity for defence—it proceeds warily and cautiously—and decides only when it may be presumed there is little room to doubt the rectitude of its decision, and this is all which can be attained by human tribunals, for fallibility is stamped upon everything human.

Under the guidance, however, of a wise Providence, and with a due observance of legal formalities and rules, we may trust ourselves even with the lives of our fellow beings; for the law has committed them to our charge, and if we severally discharge our duty with honest hearts and with the use of all the light bestowed upon us, we shall stand approved to our consciences and to the Great and Just Judge, whose ministers and servants we are.

There is more than common occasion for recommending the exertion of your powers to throw off all preconceived opinions, and to bring your faculties to the examination of the evidence which will be submitted to you with entire self-collectedness and impartiality. The extraordinary character of the crime has seized upon all imaginations, and pre-occupied many judgments. An unusual publicity has been given to such discoveries and disclosures as have from time to time been made.

The self-execution of one who has been an immediate agent of the supposed cruel deed, has given additional force to opinions before, perhaps, strongly conceived.

Gentlemen! It is on such great occasions that superior wisdom is called for. In the ordinary course of crime, the machinery of justice will work steadily and regularly, with only its customary superintendence. But when great and astonishing events occur, which call for judicial investigation—when the public mind is agitated and disturbed, and the popular voice is audible, crying for vengeance, it is then that those who are clothed with the robes of magistracy, or who otherwise become functionaries of the law, are to divest themselves of human passions—to elevate themselves above the dense atmosphere which surrounds them, and imitate, in their humble measure, the wisdom, and impartiality of the God of Justice!

Gentlemen! We cannot but regret the unusual publicity that has been given to the facts and circumstances which have transpired on this mournful subject. We shall see, I fear, that it will have had a tendency to impede the course of inquiry; but we trust you, who represent the country in the first stage of this solemn proceeding, will assume the attitude of impartial judges of the evidence; that you will diligently inquire and true presentment make; that you will be influenced neither by prejudice nor favor; that you will present things, truly, as they come to your knowledge, according to the best of your ability and understanding.

It is not necessary upon the present occasion to discuss the various classes of homicide, in order to distinguish that which is justifiable, as in self-defence—that which is the effect of sudden provocation, which may be manslaughter,—and that which is the effect of malice aforethought, which is murder.

If it shall turn out in evidence that the house of the deceased was entered in the night time—that he was slaughtered in his bed; whether the object of the perpetrator was plunder, revenge, or the hope of reward from others who may have incited the deed, it is murder of the deepest die in regard to those who may have given the death wound, and any who may have been present, aiding and abetting the crime.

Such is the common law, and such is the provision of the statute of this Commonwealth, which enacts that if any person shall commit the crime of wilful murder, or shall be present aiding and abetting in the commission of such crime, or not being present shall have been accessory thereto before the fact, by counselling, hiring, or otherwise procuring the same to be done, every such offender who in the Supreme Judicial Court shall be duly convicted of either of the felonies and offences aforesaid, shall suffer the punishment of death.

It may be a subject of inquiry, what constitutes presence within the meaning of the second branch of this enactment, 'present aiding and abetting in the commission of such crime.'

And the construction of this phrase, which is taken from the common law, has been settled in ancient times by wise and learned sages of the law, and that construction adopted and sanctioned by successive judicial decisions down to the time of the adoption of our Constitution, so that the Legislature which enacted this statute, without doubt referred to this construction when they framed it.

By this construction it is not required that the abettor shall be actually upon the spot when the murder is committed, or even in sight of the more immediate perpetrator or of the victim, to make him a principal.

If he be at a distance, co-operating in the act by watching to prevent relief, or to give an alarm, or to assist his confederate in escape, having knowledge of the purpose and object of the assassin,—this in the eye of the law is being present, aiding and abetting, so as to make him a principal in the murder.

The distinction between a person thus situated and one who is denominated by the statute an accessory before the fact, is, that the latter is not only in every sense absent from the scene of crime, but is not an immediate participator in it; he may not know the time when and the place where it is committed. He has previously, perhaps days or months before hired, counselled or procured the deed to be done, but he has no immediate agency in the deed.

His crime is deemed by the law to be as great as his who strikes the blow; it is often in a moral point of view greater, as it may combine a greater number of desperate and diabolical motives, without the influence of which the crime would never have been committed. It denotes the savage heart of the murderer, without his bold and daring hand. It puts in peril his own soul and the souls of others, who, but for him might have gone free from the guilt of blood. Thus the law punishes the accessory before the fact in the same manner as it punishes the actual perpetrator—they are alike murderers.

There is at the common law a difference, and it is supposed to exist also under our statute, in regard to the form and time of trial, between those who are called principals, and accessories before the fact, it being held that unless there be a conviction of a principal there can be no trial of the accessory. This difference, if it exist, is a relic of the unwise refinement of ancient times, there being no good reason why an accessory before the fact to a crime proved to have been committed, should not be tried and punished, although the principal may have escaped by death or otherwise, the punishment which awaited his crime in this world.

But if occasion should arise to examine this point, and the common law should not be found to have been varied by our statute, the legislature will probably afford a remedy for future cases.

I have thus, gentlemen, I believe, discharged all the duty of the Court, in this stage of its proceedings, in regard to the principal subject which will require your attention. If before the passing of the act under which we assemble, other offences cognizable in this Court shall have been committed, and not yet have been before a grand jury, you are authorized but not required by the statute to inquire into and present them. In regard to such cases as well as to any questions of law which may arise upon the subject on which I have given you the charge, you will have the advice and assistance of able and experienced officers of the government, whose duty it is to facilitate your investigations, and to reduce the result to such form of presentment as the nature of each case may require.

Gentlemen—Your duty and ours may be arduous and embarrassing—that it may be discharged with clear understandings and firm hearts, let us look to the Dispenser of all light and wisdom for His blessing upon our endeavors.

The Court having been opened was addressed by Franklin Dexter, Esq., of Boston, as one of the Counsel for the prisoners in the following motion:

Dexter. Before the Grand Jury go out, I would respectfully move, that they be instructed as to what evidence they should receive. This was done in a celebrated case;—that of Aaron Burr.

Chief Justice. That case is remarkable for that, and another circumstance, not known to our law, that is, the challenge of grand jurors. With us the Court never instruct the grand jury upon the nature of the evidence to be heard before them. There will be a revision of their doings and it is unnecessary to go into the inquiry before hand.

Solicitor General. It is a sufficient answer to the suggestion of the gentlemen, that in the case alluded to, Chief Justice Marshall said that 'it was usual and the best course for the Court to charge the jury generally, and to give their opinion on incidental points as they arose, when the grand jury themselves should apply to them for information.*

Dexter. It is true that the remark was made by Chief Justice Marshall, but he did send special instructions to the grand jury before the question arose. He did direct that 'no affidavits nor papers, containing distinct substantive testimony against the accused should be sent to the grand jury.'†

Chief Justice. It would be a very convenient practice. The law reposes confidence in the officers of the government; they are not supposed to procure an indictment against a man upon improper evidence.

It is the opinion of the Court that they cannot go out of the usual course. They think it would be a good rule for the officers of the government to adopt, to offer no evidence to the grand jury, which they would not be willing to offer in Court.

Dexter. Before the jury retire, I wish to inquire if the English practice does not prevail here, to endorse the names of the witnesses examined before the grand jury upon the indictment.

Solicitor General. We have a better practice, and that is, to return the names of the witnesses examined before the grand jury, and that makes a part of the record of the case.

---

* Vide Burr's Trial, Vol. i. p. 174.
† Burr's Trial, Vol. i. p. 199.

---

ENGLISH CASES.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH—MAY.

Sittings in Banco.

Doe on the Demise of Coombes v. Extance.

This was an action brought to try the validity of a will.—It was tried before Mr Justice Bosanquet, at Taunton, and a verdict had for the defendant, thereby establishing the validity.

Mr Sergeant Wilde, on the part of the plaintiff, moved for a rule to show cause why a nonsuit should not be entered, or a new trial granted. His client was the nephew of the testator, who had resided many years in Somersetshire, and who was a shrewd man, and enjoyed good health up to the year 1826, previously to which he had made a will in favor of his relatives, leaving legacies and tokens of remembrances to his sisters. About this time he had been living with some of his friends. In the year 1826 he had an attack of apoplexy, which deprived him of the use of his limbs. After this attack he removed to his former residence in Somersetshire, and sent for a servant who had previously lived with him, and by whom he had a child. He continued very feeble up to the year 1828, when he had another attack, and as he was unable to utter any other words but 'yes, yes,' and 'No, no.' He died in the month of November, 1828, leaving a will in favor of his servant. The Learned Sergeant contended that, according to the evidence given at the trial, the testator was not in a state of mind to make a will, or manage his own affairs. He was scarcely able to write his name, and this was with his left hand, and was not competent to give instructions to an attorney. The witnesses to this disputed will were a clergyman, an attorney, and a medical gentleman; the former of whom said the testator understood what he was doing, and this the witness inferred from the circumstance of his attention to religious advice, for when receiving any, he showed great feelings, and shed tears. This witness, as another instance of the testator's intelligence, said that once, upon taking some physic, he made wry faces, and shook his head; and upon another occasion, when asked by witness if he was not afraid of disobliging his sisters by the will which he made, the testator replied 'ye—d—n ye.' The Learned Sergeant did not think this sufficient evidence of sanity. It appeared also that during the testator's residence with his servant maid, and shortly before his death, this woman, whose name is Hicks, was asked if the testator had made his will, to which she replied 'no, and he is very uneasy at not having done enough for me.' When asked if he would send for an attorney, the testator replied in his usual monosylable 'ye—d—n ye;' and 'dear, dear.' Now these were the only proofs of capacity which had been brought forward; and, in his opinion, they were insufficient to warrant the defendant, who was the husband of the servant-maid Hicks. The physician's account of the testator's health was, that it was very bad, but that he thought the testator knew what he was doing. Another will had been made on the day (10th November, 1828) previously to the execution of the disputed one. The former of these gave a vested interest to his nephews and nieces in his property of 300*l.* a year; and by the second the same interest was given to them, but only in the event of their surviving Elizabeth Hicks. There was some contradictory evidence respecting the manner in which the attorney received his instructions.

Lord Tenterden said the Court would grant the rule, but he thought it a pity that the parties had not settled this dispute out of Court, as the greater part of this little property would be consumed in litigation.

Halford v. Kymer.

This was an action on a policy effected at the Asylum Insurance Office, by a father upon the life of his son. It was tried at the late Sittings after Term at Westminster, before Lord Tenterden, who directed a nonsuit, on the ground that, by the 14th of George III., no person could insure upon the life of another unless he had a legal interest in such life, and in this case there was none.

Mr Pollock now moved for a rule to set aside such nonsuit, and enter a verdict for plaintiff, on the ground that, according to the fair construction of the Act of Parliament, this case came within its provisions. The words of the Act were, 'having a pecuniary or other valuable interest in such life.' He contended that the relationship of son to father gave, in itself, a valuable interest to the latter in the life of his son. There might be a valuable and therefore a legal interest in the life of a son, although there was no pecuniary interest. The Learned Gentlemen contended that, as under an Act of Elizabeth a son was compelled, if necessary, to support a father, the father consequently had a pecuniary interest in the life of his son. The Learned Counsel proceeded at great length, and with much ingenuity, to urge arguments in support of his application, but the Court frequently intimated to the Learned Counsel that they were opposed to him in opinion; but Mr Pollock said that he had the means of ascertaining that nearly a million of money depended on the decision of this case, as he knew that so great an amount as that which he had mentioned effected on policies similar to this now disputed by the Asylum Insurance.

Mr Justice thought that was a reason why the law should be sooner known. The act of Parliament was explicit, and the plaintiff could not in law recover, as he had no pecuniary or valuable interest in the life of his son.

The Judges all agreed that the action could not be maintained.—Rule refused.

Sitting at Guildhall, before Chief Justice Tindal and a Special Jury.

Mount v. Larkins.

Mr Sergeant Taddy, Mr Sergeant Russell, and Mr Wightman, appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr Sergeant Wilde and Mr Sergeant Spankie conducted the case on behalf of the defendant.

This action was brought upon a policy of insurance effected, to the amount of 2,000*l.* upon the freight of the ship Aquilar, on a voyage from Singapore, with leave to touch at several points in her way home. The plaintiff claimed as for a total loss. It appeared, from the evidence on the part of the plaintiff, that, after leaving Singapore in 1825, being then in good repair and seaworthy, the Aquilar encountered several storms, and, in consequence of the perils of the sea, was obliged to put in at the Cape of Good Hope. It was there surveyed, and found to have sustained such considerable damage that it would be impossible to repair her at that port. The Captain, under these circumstances, abandoned the vessel, which was sold and broken up, and the usual notice was given to the underwriter.

It was contended, on behalf of the defendant, that there was no proof of any absolute necessity for abandoning the vessel at the Cape of Good Hope—and, supposing she was in the damaged state described, that was not caused by the perils of the voyage from Singapore to the above port, but ought to be attributed to the great age of the vessel (about 24 years); besides, it was proved that the Captain had been guilty of barratrous conduct, and, instead of proceeding immediately on the voyage, amused himself in building a house at Sidney, and fitting out a schooner for fishing—thereby causing a considerable delay inconsistent with the policy, and sufficient to put an end to the contract. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff was also defective, inasmuch as the very surveys at the Cape had not been produced, neither was the log-book forthcoming; and it was finally contended that, under all these circumstances, there was not the slightest evidence to support the present action.

The Chief Justice having summed up,

The Jury found for the plaintiff subject to an opinion of the Court on the same.

Sparrow v. Stapleton.

Mr Sergeant STORKS applied for a rule to show cause why the nonsuit, which had been entered in this case, should not be set aside. It was an action for money had and received. The nonsuit was founded on the Statute of Limitations. The Learned Sergeant contended that the case was taken out of that Statute by a letter from the defendant in the following terms, and addressed to the plaintiff:—

Sir,—I have received your letter, and cannot attend to its contents, owing to my inability to pay, but when I go to Cambridge I shall settle all the debts which I owe.

This was the substance of the letter, which the Learned Sergeant contended implied a promise to pay the defendant, whose debt had been proved at the trial.

Lord TENTERDEN—I suppose the defendant never went back to Cambridge?

Mr Sergeant STORKS—Never, my Lord.

The COURT were of opinion that the letter did not contain any promise sufficiently distinct to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations, and refused the rule.

MAINE.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Vol. 5, of Greenleaf's Reports contains the cases decided from May 1827, to April 1829.

Sherwood v. Marwick.

Whether an action will lie against a vender for false and fraudulent representations respecting the ownership and character of the thing sold, where the conveyance was by deed with express covenants upon those points;—quere.

Webster & al. v. Drinkwater.

Where one, appointed on the part of the United States to superintend the execution of a contract for the building of certain public vessels, through misconstruction of its terms, required the performance of more than was in fact required by the contract;—it was held that he was not personally liable for such excess.

Gilpatrick v. Sayward.

A farm being purchased, and sureties given for part of the purchase-money, the deed was made, by consent, to the sureties only, for their indemnity against the note they had signed. Afterwards they refused to give up the deed to the real purchaser, on being discharged of their suretyship, without the payment of fifty dollars to each of them; which the purchaser paid, the farm being of considerable value, without making any objection to the amount. It was held that he could not recover back the money thus paid.

Bixby v. Whitney.

If arbitrators erroneously refuse to consider a particular demand laid before them, on the mistaken ground that it is not within the submission; the bond and award are no bar to a subsequent action upon the demand thus rejected.

Clough v. Tenney.

Case, and not trespass, is the proper form of remedy, for a father, for the offence of debauching his daughter, where the injury was done in the house of another.

Moore v. Smith.

The penalty not exceeding sixteen dollars per month, provided by Stat. 1821, ch. 51, sec. 11, for not filing a will in the probate office, is incurred, and may be sued for, at the end of every month, within a year next preceding the commencement of the action.

Baylies and als. v. Bussey.

The equitable claims of a tenant in possession under the betterment act, are not affected by a judgment in a petition for partition, even though he has appeared as respondent, and pleaded to the process.

Sherwood v. Marwick.

The doctrine that a principal is answerable for the fraud of his agent or factor, does not apply to special agents.

Quimby v. Whitney.

Where B. and W. lent their names each to the other, as indorsers of accommodation notes, negotiated at a bank, and also had mutual dealings; and a third person contracted to settle the account of B. with W. 'if there should be anything due W. from him, as well for any notes W. held of his own,'—'as also for certain notes which are in the bank, which W. is responsible for, by reason of lending or exchanging each other's names as security for the other;' it was held that W. by the terms of this contract, could not claim the amount of his liabilities for B.; but only the balance of them, after deducting the amount of B's. liabilities for him.

Dingley v. Robinson.

One having fraudulently obtained goods under pretence of a purchase, the creditor pursued him for satisfaction; and a compromise was so far effected, as that, for a valuable consideration, the creditor affirmed the sale from himself, and agreed that the debtor might sell the goods to A. Afterwards, the original term of credit having expired, the creditor sued the debtor, and attached the same goods as his property; and in an action of trespass, brought by A. against the sheriff for taking these goods, it was held that the terms of the agreement did not stop the creditor from impeaching the sale to A. as fraudulent.

Perkins v. Dunlap.

Where N. contracted for the purchase of an estate from A. and paid him 1200 dollars in part, and D. advanced the residue for him, being 500 dollars, and took the conveyance directly to himself, upon a verbal agreement that he should release the land to N. on payment of the 500 dollars; and then D. died, and his heirs refused to convey;—it was held that to carry into effect the original understanding of the parties, N. might be considered as having advanced the 1200 dollars to enable D. to purchase the estate, for which the estate of the latter was liable, as for money lent to the testator.

Crane v. Roberts.

R. agreed to pay for a quantity of hay, provided L. should pronounce it merchantable; and L. pronounced it 'a fair lot, say merchantable; not quite so good as I expected; the outside of the bundles some damaged by the weather.' Held that R. was not bound.

Waterson and al. v. Getchell.

R. agreed to cut all the timber from certain lands of W., and transport it to W's. mill, to be sawed into boards, of which R. was to receive a certain proportion; and further agreed that the ownership of the timber should remain with W., till certain debts of R. were paid, and all parts of the agreement were fulfilled. It was held that this was a valid agreement; and that a sale of part of the logs, after they were taken from the land, to a purchaser having notice of the terms of the contract, conveyed no title, against the owner of the land.

Redington v. Farrer and al.

In assumpsit against two or more, the plaintiff cannot amend by striking out the name of one of the defendants.

Thompson and als. v. Prop. Andr. Bridge.

The private statute of Massachusetts of Feb. 26, 1796, incorporating the proprietors of Androscoggin bridge, gives them no right to erect a toll house on the side of the bridge; nor does it transfer to the proprietors anything more than an easement in the land over which it authorizes them to build a bridge.

Murray v. Ulmer.

An action of trespass quare clausum fregit, originally brought before a Justice of the Peace and tried upon review in the Court of Common Pleas, upon the plea of soil and freehold, may be brought by appeal into this Court, though no plea of soil and freehold was filed before the magistrate, the defendant having been accidentally defaulted.

Pierce ex parte.

An appeal does not lie from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas on a complaint against the kindred of a pauper under Stat. 1821, ch. 122, sec. 5.

Fryeburg Canal v. Frye.

Though the power of referees, appointed under Stat. 1821, ch. 78, does not extend to cases in which the title to real estate comes in question, yet a claim of damages occasioned by the making of a canal, not being of that character, is within the scope of their authority.

Graves v. Fisher and al.

It is no valid objection to a report of referees, that one of them had formed a previous opinion upon the case submitted to them, if his mind appear to have been still open to conviction, and no imputation of unfairness rest upon him.

Bixby v. Whitney.

Where two parties executed a bond, submitting to arbitration 'all debts, dues and demands heretofore subsisting between them;' and on the same day one of them gave the other a promissory note payable in specific articles at a remote day;—it was held that the note was not within the terms of the submission, it being, by intendment of law, given after the execution of the bond.

Green v. Morse.

It is not lawful to arrest a debtor, on mesne process, in any case where, after judgment, his body is not liable to be taken in execution.

Clough v. Tenney.

If one of two counts be bad, and a general verdict be rendered for the plaintiff, the court will not intend that the evidence supported the good count alone; but will arrest the judgment, on motion.

Fox v. Adams and al.

Where a general assignment of property, for the benefit of all the creditors of an insolvent debtor, was made May 25, and a further instrument was executed June 2, giving priority to a large amount of debts due to the United States; it was held that the assignment still took effect from the first date, unaffected by any events intervening between that and the second agreement.

An assignment in trust for the benefit of creditors is not vitiated by a condition that the creditors shall accept the provision made for them in full, of their respective demands.

The time limited in such assignment for creditors to become parties to it, may be so short or so long as to justify a presumption of fraud, and thus defeat its operation.

Such an assignment, by an insolvent debtor in another jurisdiction, will not be permitted to operate upon property in this State, so as to defeat the attachment of a creditor residing here.

---

A hint to Constables and others. In a case lately tried before the Superior Court, of indictment for assault and battery, against a police officer, the Judge decided that an officer arresting an individual, is bound to show his authority, when demanded; and, if it be dark, to avail himself of the most immediate convenient opportunity of obtaining light; that on his refusing or neglecting to do so, the arrest may be resisted; and that, after showing the warrant, the officer is not justifiable in using any cruelty or unnecessary severity or harshness in the execution of it, but is bound to enforce it with as much mildness and forbearance as the nature of the case will possibly admit.—Augusta Chronicle.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 21, 1830.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

SPECIAL TERM.

Commonwealth vs. John Francis Knapp.

Continued.

In such a case it comes from the prisoner to the public as a pure gift, a free donation, an unmixed and unsought gratuity. It comes like other gifts, freely and voluntarily.

Let us bring this case to the test of the principle. Was the Prisoner asked anything which it was in his power to withhold? Was he asked to part with anything he had a right to retain? Government had no occasion for anything he had. He was asked for no facts. His assent was of no consequence. It was no secret which Government wanted and which the Prisoner had power to withhold. Not at all. He would call upon the learned Counsel to explain what possible consequence it could be to Government whether he assented to the confession of Joseph or not. If so, it was no confession within any rule or principle of law. No facts were shown to prove that the Prisoner knew that the evidence obtained implicated him. He did not know what it was. The question was who should have the benefit of turning State's witness. It is said, and it is true, that a promise is extortion, and a threat is extortion in law. But who extorted any thing from the Prisoner? His Brother? Did he go to the cell of the Prisoner, to procure, to extort evidence for the Government. There had been an untrue phasis put upon the whole affair. The Government were not present in any way by its officers or agents. Was it matter of confession which could in any way criminate himself? Did it effect Joseph's confession? He put the question to the Court. No man could stand up here as a Lawyer and maintain it. If he had been hired with money, or been wrought upon by any other influences, to say what he was asked to say, it would not have rendered it inadmissible. It was in no sort such a confession as is protected by the humane and salutary maxim of law.

What is that thing, which, if obtained, must be obtained without threat or the hope of favor? Clearly something which may be used to prejudice the prisoner's case on trial. But the thing asked here could not if granted have been used, in any event, against the prisoner. It was merely an assent to a matter out of his power, and not calculated to criminate him in the least.

It could no more be used against him than if he had been asked and had answered which way the wind blew. Such an assertion, disclosure or assent, could not be regarded as coming within the protection of the law. The subject matter was not a subject matter to which the rule applied at all.

In the second place what was said to the Prisoner, if said with a view to draw only confessions, was not such a threat, encouragement or promise as the law requires to render the confessions inadmissible. The words were as he had stated them and as the Court had them. There was no threat used. There were no words of favor. Was there any promise of benefit? Whose benefit? The Prisoner's? Was there a prospect of better things offered him? Just the other way. Arguments were used to persuade him to consent to something which would be worse. It was considered as a hard case for the Prisoner. It was said there was no other chance for Joseph. He was to take his chance to save him. Favor to the Prisoner! The favor of being convicted and thrown upon the Executive clemency—and of being shut out from all other hopes this side of the Throne of Mercy. What kind of favor was this? That phrase which is found in 2 Starkie 48, contains all the humanity and all the wisdom of the law upon this subject. To render the confession inadmissible, something must have been said to induce the prisoner to believe that it would be better for him if he did or worse if he did not confess.

There is no authority to the contrary from Bracton downward. There is no dictum nor argument to be found against this position. Old Bailey does not furnish a case which is different. Although the confession may have been obtained through somewhat improper influences, still it may be admissible. Every person who confesses does it because he believes it better to confess than not to do it.

But the general impression or belief that it will be better on the whole, but not better as to the particular case will not exclude the matter confessed. The belief that it will be better for the Prisoner's distressed family, father or friends, either here or hereafter, is not enough to shut out the confessions. It must be better for him. Now there was no intimation that his chance would be better by confession. But on the other hand it was to be worse. The chance for him was put upon the ground of his youth and the secondary character of his guilt. We beseech your Honors to consider what proposition was suggested to him. As to N. P. Knapp, he went to the cell of his brother on a most important occasion to discharge a most painful duty. He discharged it with fidelity, and in all the depths of fraternal grief. He went not to hold out any hope to him from confession, but to induce him to give his assent that his brother might confess and save his life. He went to tell him that it was thought best to give Joseph the chance and leave him to the chance of the law and the favor of the Executive. That was the purpose, and the sole purpose. It was no part of the object to get Francis, the Prisoner to confess.

If the confessions were obtained on the supposition that the case was hopeless, that circumstance does not render them inadmissible. The favor of the Government had already been appropriated to another. There was nothing to hold out to the Prisoner. We say then the confessions should have been admitted.

It will be also considered that whatever favor there might have been held out, small as we think it was—too small to be seen by any eye or weighed by any scales, whatever it was, was addressed solely to the consideration of the assent to Joseph's confession—not at all to any of his own. There was none such either express or implied. What had the admission of facts made subsequently to do with the assent to Joseph's confession? The assent had no possible connexion with anything expected of the Prisoner or said by him. It was not the matter in course. We don't go upon the time but the subject. Suppose the Prisoner had written a letter to Joseph containing the facts disclosed, would it be excluded? Why strain the inducement?

Farther, the witness swears that there was no hope of favor or matter of menace addressed to him. The Prisoner did not so regard it. This is a question of law, pure law. The Court will not be inclined to carry the principle farther than it will bear. Where is there a case on this or the other side of the Atlantic, which sustains the position of the Prisoner's Counsel? Or where is the principle? When these are found and not till then will the Court rule out the testimony offered.

Mr Gardner remarked that he was surprised at the commencement of this argument to hear the motion on the part of the Government to introduce new Counsel.

The question was a very narrow one. It was almost as distinct as the construction of a written instrument. It was a question as to the meaning of words.

These words are said to relate entirely to the matter of the assent. The words used operated as a surprise upon the prisoner. They were calculated to entrap him. If so, any confession he may have made could not be used. The assent of Francis must have been thought important to the Government or it would not have been asked. It is said if conversation was had with a view merely to draw out a confession without promise or threat, though improperly, it is no objection to its admissibility. We contend that if anything was said calculated to influence the Prisoner in the slightest degree, his confession cannot be used. So is the law. He would refer the Court to the same book and page cited by the gentleman on the other side—2 Starkie 48, Hawkins, Book 2 ch. 46, Sect. 36. Did the words used alarm his fears, excite his hopes, or agitate his mind? May such an effect be fairly inferred? The Court could not measure the influence. If by any reasonable inference it could be so construed, the Court were bound so to construe it. It is said there was no inducement. How was the conversation introduced? Was not the communication itself a sufficient inducement. It was, in effect, saying if you will consent you will save both lives. You will save Joseph and save yourself. It was a great question of life and death. They stood there against the whole power of the Commonwealth officers—the Committee of Vigilance, almost the whole Essex Bar, and the distinguished gentleman who is brought in to the aid of the Government. The array was great against them, but they trusted the issue of this question to the Court and the law.

Mr Dexter remarked that there was one consideration of great importance in the discussion of this question. The Counsel for the Government suggest that if this point be ruled against the Prisoner, it may be heard hereafter and the judgment of the Court, if wrong, set right. There was no way of bringing this question again before the Court by Bill of Exceptions or otherwise. The question was now before a full Court. If settled against the Prisoner now, it is settled forever. The opinion expressed by the Court was not a hasty opinion. The Court will never decide hastily in a case of this kind. It must have anticipated many of the questions which have already and will come before them in the course of this trial. He would stand by the opinion of the Court as clearly and fully expressed. If the Court see fit to revise that opinion as to one point, he would ask them to do so in one other respect. If the confessions are admitted, the witness should be confined to the words and language used, and should not be permitted to state inferences, impressions or substance. On this point he would refer the Court to Hobart—294—2 Hawk, ch. 46, Sect. 36. Confessions are not evidence unless the words are given by the Witness. The question has been argued with great power and learning. With a degree of eloquence which he could not hope to imitate. He was almost ready to say that it would be worse for the Prisoner to have the confessions ruled out upon such an argument than to have them ruled in without it. He would endeavor to answer briefly the points made by the Government.

The true position is this—that confessions when not voluntary are not evidence, because they are not credible. It is not on the ground that the matter confessed is the property of the accused. Not on the ground that he gives to the Government a secret which he has a right to retain. If the matter confessed were the most obvious truth—a matter known to every body—as obvious as that the sun shines—it could not be evidence as a confession, if not obtained without fear, or the hope of favor. The fact may be shown otherwise, but cannot be proved as an admission or confession coming from the accused. The fact that the Government do not want it, that it may be proved aliunde, makes no difference. Nor does the circumstance of its being common—public property, vary it. The argument was strong, but the position was unsound. It was vox, he would not add et prœterea nihil, but felix audacia. It is said that the Government did not want the assent or confession of the prisoner. If so, why was the assent asked and urged? It was material to the Government. The Counsel say there were no promises. Were there no improper inducements held out? If the confession were obtained to save his brother, or the feelings of his father, they should not be used; the motives were improper. We agree that the hope or fear should apply to the particular case, but it need not apply altogether to the individual. It need not be purely—entirely selfish. The witness and N. P. Knapp went not there as the Government represents, to tell the prisoner of his inevitable fate—but to hold out to him the hopes of pardon—of escape—to urge these as the reasons and motives for yielding his assent to Joseph's disclosure. Such hope was held out to him—such expectations were indulged by the Prisoner in that hour of his affliction and alarm.

The Court will consider the circumstances of the case. They will consider whether he would have been likely to make such disclosures as are now proposed to be introduced, if no such promise had been made, or encouragement given. The thing was altogether improbable in itself. The witness himself thought at the time that the encouragement was improper. That is conclusive upon the matter. How then can the Government ask for these confessions?

Mr Webster made a short reply and the Court adjourned for deliberation.

The next morning on the opening of the Court, the judges separately gave their opinions, which were the same as on the former occasion. The confessions were ruled out accordingly.

Mr Webster then suggested that there was probably some misapprehension as to the fact of the assent of the prisoner having been given to Joseph's confession. The Court had gone upon the ground that there was evidence of such assent. There was none. He moved the witness might be called to that point. Mr Colman was then called and after examining him, the Court was of opinion that there was no such evidence, and as their opinions were formed upon that assumption, they unanimously ruled in the confessions and the witness was permitted to state them to the Jury.

TRIAL OF KNAPP.

On entering the Court House on Thursday morning, we could hardly believe that we were in the highest Judicial Tribunal of the State, in solemn session upon the life of a fellow-being. It seemed to us much more like a brilliant assemblage at the Atheneum Gallery, or in the Julien, listening to the wonderful Trumpeter, or staring at the exhibition of Maelzel's Carousal. We were on the point of exclaiming against the propriety of Ladies' appearing on such an occasion—when we were whispered that they came by invitation, and that the beautiful daughters of ———, the blithe and laughter-loving Misses ———, and the discreet and modest Mrs ——— were before us. There was no saying a word. We had nothing to do but to listen and look—and if we may judge from appearances, some of the 'good men and true,' could but now and then think of the ladies in the case. While the Government Counsel was laboring away a full hour upon constructive, some of the twelve seemed to us to have much the clearest impressions from the actual presence.

There was, and how could it be otherwise, a prolonged gentle hum from the delighted auditors the day through, occasionally only interrupted by the heavy voice of the sheriff—'Silence there, gentlemen and—Ladies too.' The Presiding Judge would ever and anon, too, give a timely admonition to those who talked too loud or too long. Both were in vain. The gallery, boxes and pit buzzed on. Not an eye moistened with a tear for the fate of the unhappy Prisoner. Not a bosom swelled with a sigh, or a heart raised a prayer for his safe deliverance. All seemed eager and impatient to swell the already impetuous current that was hurrying him onward to the gulf of his ruin. They came not to throw a mixture into the cup of his misery, or to yield a feeling of sympathy to the condition of a man hanging by a thread between life and death; but it was to witness the strength, and to inflame the ardor of the combatants. The fate and crime of the Prisoner were lost in the admiration of the power and skill with which he was attacked and defended. The shafts of the assailant were hurled with a fearful force and accuracy, while the shield of defence was held before the mark with a steady and dexterous hand. The multitude gave a smile of satisfaction or a look of disappointment as the arrows rattled on the armor of the victim, or, coming short of their aim, fell harmless at his feet.

If the Prisoner escape hanging, it will not be for the want of zeal in the prosecutors or of disposition in the public. No man ever stood at the Bar of a Court who could expect less from human pity or sympathy. Nothing can save the parties accused but the unyielding rules of law. They are called 'technicalities.' Be it so. They are such as every man is entitled to who lives under our Government. They are not to be made to yield to the exigencies of this case, to punish the guilty. If so, they will next be laid aside to endanger or destroy the innocent.

☞We learn by a gentleman who left Salem last evening, that the Jury returned a verdict of GUILTY at twenty minutes past 6. [Courier.

---

EMINENT BRITISH LAWYERS—by Henry Roscoe, Esq., Barrister at Law.

This is a very neatly executed volume from the Cabinet Cyclopædia of Dr Lardner. It contains interesting Biographical notices of some of the most distinguished English Judges and Jurists. The following Biographical Table will exhibit the Contents of this volume.

Sir Edward Coke, Lord Chief Justice, born in Norfolk, 1550—died 1634.

John Selden, born 1584, in Sussex—died 1654.

Sir Matthew Hale, Lord Chief Justice, born 1609, in Gloucester—died 1676.

Lord Guilford, Lord Keeper, born 1640 in Cambridgeshire, died 1685.

Lord Jeffries, Lord Chancellor, born 1648 in Denbigh—died 1689.

Lord Somers, Lord Chancellor, born 1650, in Worcester—died 1716.

Lord Mansfield, Lord Chief Justice, born 1704 in Perth—died 1776.

Sir J. E. Wilmot, Chief Justice Common Pleas, born 1709 in Derby—died 1792.

Sir William Blackstone, Lord Chief Justice born 1723, in Wiltshire—died 1780.

Lord Ashburton, Solicitor General, born 1731, in Devonshire—died 1783.

Lord Thurlow, Lord Chancellor, born 1736, in Suffolk—died 1806.

Sir W. Jones, Chief Justice in India, born 1746, in London—died 1794.

Lord Erskine, Lord Chancellor, born 1750, in Scotland—died 1823.

Sir Samuel Romilly, Solicitor General, born 1757 in London—died 1818.

---

New Publications.

English Common Law Reports, Vol. 16. Reports of Cases argued and determined in the English Courts of Common Law, with tables of the cases and principal matters; edited by Thomas Sergeant and John C. Lowber, Esq's. of the Philadelphia Bar, vol. 16, containing Downing and Ryland's Reports, vol 8, and the 4th and 5th vols. of Moore's Reports.

NEW LAW BOOKS.—JOHN GRIGG, No. 9 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia, has just published the following valuable works.

CONDENSED REPORTS of CASES decided in the SUPREME COURT of the United States, from the organization of the Court at August term 1791, to January term 1828. Edited by Richard Peters, Counsellor at Law, and Reporter of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

This work is intended to contain the opinions of the Supreme Court, in the language of the Judges, in every case decided in that court from the establishment of the Government of the United States, to the commencement of Mr Peters's Reports at January term 1828. The reported decisions in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, upon similar points, are also collected and digested in the work, as notes; and abstracts of those Cases, and also of the collateral decisions of the Supreme Court are given, so that the Professional Gentleman and the Student will be in possession of all the adjudicated Law of all the Courts of the United States, in an authoritative, condensed, and arranged form.

The work will be contained in not more than six volumes; the first volume is now published; the second volume will be published about the 1st of August, and the balance of the work during the present year and 1831.

Those who wish to possess this work will do well to make an early application as the greatest portion of the edition is taken up by subscription. They are for sale by the principal Booksellers in the United States, with J. Griggs's other law publications.

Price six dollars to those who subscribe, and seven dollars to non-subscribers, payable on delivery of each volume.

PETERS' REPORTS.—Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Supreme Court of the United States, by Richard Peters, Esquire, Reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, 4 vols. royal 8vo.

FONBLANQUE'S Celebrated TREATISE ON EQUITY. A new edition, with considerable additions, from the last London edition, by a distinguished Member of the Philadelphia Bar, in 1 vol. royal 8vo.

CHITTY ON CONTRACTS. A new and Practical Treatise on the Law of Contracts not under Seal, and upon the usual Defences to Actions thereon, with Corrections and Additional References. By a member of the Massachusetts Bar, in 1 vol. 8vo.

SAUNDER'S REPORTS, in 3 vols. 8vo. The 4th American, from the 5th considerably enlarged London edition.

Say's Political Economy, new edition.

TOLLER'S LAW OF EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS. With notes and references to American Authorities, by E. D. Ingrah m, Esq. new edition, in 1 vol. 8vo.

Sugden on the Law of Vendors in 1 vol. 8vo.

Jones on Bailments in 1 vol. 8vo.

CHANCERY REPORTS. JOHN GRIGG, has in press the Decisions of the English Chancery Reports, upon the plan which has been adopted and successfully executed with the 'English Common Law Reports.' The work will comprehend, in a condensed form, all the Reports which have not been republished in the United States; and it will be continued, so as to present to the profession, annually, the Chancery Reports as they shall hereafter appear in Great Britain.

The work will also contain references to the decisions of the chancery courts of the United States, and of the several states. July 10.

---

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of administering and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire: and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Price $1,25.

---

NOW PUBLISHING, BY CARTER & HENDEE, A SERIES OF SCIENTIFIC TRACTS, designed for Instructio and Entertainment, and adapted to Schools, Lyceums and Families. Conducted by Josiah Holbrook and others.

The whole Series will contain simple and clear outlines of the various sciences, and their principal division, with their application to the common purposes of life.

TERMS.—Not lest than 24 numbers of a 12mo size, containing 24 pages each, will be published in a year, at $1,50, payable in advance. July 10.

---

CARTER AND HENDEE have in Press; SELF EDUCATION; or, THE MEANS OF MORAL PROGRESS, Translated from the French of M. Le Baron Degerando. To this work was awarded the honor of being 'crowned' by the French Academy; a distinction annually confered on one or two works, deemed the most useful that have been published during the year. And a late Review remarks; 'We have no ethical work of any living English writer to be compared with that of Degerando.'

VIEW OF THE UNITED STATES, for the use of Schools, with Maps and numerous Engravings.

INFANT SCHOOL MANUAL, or Teacher's Assistant. Second Edition. Enlarged and much improved.

SCRAP TABLE, containing Original Anecdotes and Sketches.

YOUNG LADY'S BOOK, with 700 engravings on wood, of a superior quality, intended as an Annual for 1831.

THE YOUTH'S KEEPSAKE, a Christmas and New Year's Offering for 1831.

A NEW COLLECTION OF PSALMS AND HYMNS, for Public Worship. By Rev. F. W. P. Greenwood.

COMMON PLACE BOOK OF AMERICAN POETRY. By George B. Cheever.

---

GRAY & BOWEN have received by late arrivals the following valuable Foreign Books, which they will sell at low prices.

Dibdin's Library Companion, second edition, one large 8vo. vol.

Bowring's Poetry of the Magyars.

Moore's Byron. Splendid quarto edition.

Belzoni's Researches in Egypt and Nubia.

Description of the Ruins of an Ancient City in South America, with plates.

Memoires de M. De Bourrienne, 10 vols.

Histoire De France. Par M. Bignon, 4 vols.

Dictionnaire de Maximes. Par J. L. Malire, 1 vol.

Histoire du Congress de Vienne, 3 vols. 8vo.

Lafayette en Amerique, with Plates, 2 vols. 8vo.

The Works of Lope de Vega, 21 vols. quarto, fine edition.

Obras de Quevedo, 11 vols.

Don Quixotte, 5 vols.

Las Eroticas Villegas, 2 vols.

Trabajos de Persiles y Sigismunda, 2 vols.

Teatro Italiano Antico, 8 vols. July 10.

---

BOOKS published by WAIT, GREENE, & CO. and for sale at their store, 13 Court Street.

| | Price—Single. | Dozen |
|---|---|---|
| The Happy Valley, | 7 cts. | 70 cts. |
| The Happy Days, part 1, | 6 | 60 |
| The Happy Days, part 2, | 7 | 70 |
| The Warning, stitched, | 15 | $1 50 |
| The Warning, bound, | 20 | 2 12½ |
| A Sister's Gift, vol. 1, | 20 | 2 12½ |
| A Sister's Gift, vol. 2, | 20 | 2 12½ |
| The Well Spent Hours, in 12 separate Nos. | 6¼ | 50 |
| The Talisman, | 50 | 4 00 |
| William Cooper and his Family | 7 | 60 |
| Infant Lessons, | 10 | 80 |
| New Year's Day, | 10 | 80 |
| Eighteen Maxims of Neatness and Order, | 10 | 75 |
| The Juvenile Miscellany, per year, | | 2 00 |
| Channing's Sermon to Children, | 3 | 24 |
| Edward, the Sunday Scholar | 7 | 60 |
| The Well Spent Hours, in 12 Nos. bound together, | 50 | 4 50 |
| Helen and Maria, part 1, | 6¼ | 50 |
| Do. Do. " 2, | 6¼ | 50 |
| Do. Do. " 3, | 6¼ | 50 |
| Harry Hobart, | 10 | 18 |
| Sketches of the Wallington Family, | 20 | 1 50 |
| Ann Beaumont, | 6¼ | 50 |
| Ellen Sinclair, | 6¼ | 50 |
| Sketches of the Natural History of Animals, | 20 | 1 50 |
| Mary and her Sister, | 6¼ | 50 |
| Susan and her Lamb, | 3 | 25 |
| The Sunday School Hymn Book, (now in general use) | 12½ | 1 20 |
| The Sunday School Hymn Book, 1st part, | 6¼ | 50 |
| Little Edward, the Good Boy, | 6¼ | 45 |
| Story of Little John, | 6¼ | 45 |
| Story of the Little Bird Teacher, | 6¼ | 45 |
| The Little Rogue, | 6¼ | 44 |

Abbott's Sermons.

Also, Ware's three important Questions answered.

Extracts from ditto. July 10.

---

PROPOSALS for publishing by subscription an ANALYTICAL DIGEST OF ALL THE AMERICAN REPORTS. By WILLIAM HILLIARD, Jr. Counsellor at Law. Revised by BENJAMIN RAND, Counsellor at Law.

The study of American Jurisprudence will always form an essential part of the education of every accomplished American Lawyer. And to the practitioner, as well as to the jurist, the decisions of the various Courts of Law and Equity in the United States, are daily becoming more important. The Jurisprudence of the several States, with a single exception, is founded upon the Common Law of England. On most subjects of general importance, there is a great similarity in the legislative enactments of the several States. And the judicial decisions of the Courts of the several States, are often cited and respected as authorities in the Courts of other States than those in which they were pronounced. The decisions upon local or statutory law, merely, are comparatively few, and even in these, from the similarity in the statutes and usages of the several States, precedents and analogies may be found, of general application. Few, perhaps, are aware of the number of volumes of American Reports, which now exceeds two hundred and fifty. It is believed that an Analytical Digest of these Reports, upon the plan of Mr Jeremy's consolidated Digest of the English Reports, is a desideratum. The advantages of such a digest, judiciously arranged, so as to bring into one view all the adjudications of all the Courts in the United States, upon each particular subject, will be duly appreciated by every practical lawyer. It is intended that the work shall contain all the reported cases to the time of publication, without any exceptions; and a Supplement containing the subsequent decisions will be published annually.

The work will be published with despatch.

---

The work will be printed on a beautiful small type, and good paper, and will be comprised in four or five volumes, (probably not exceeding four,) royal octavo size, each volume to contain about 1000 pages; and will be delivered to subscribers at $5 per volume, in good law sheep binding, which is a very low price for a law work embracing so great a quantity of matter.

After publication the price of the work will be raised to $6 per volume.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From Hon. JOSEPH STORY, Judge of the Supreme Court of the U. S.; and Hon. ISAAC PARKER, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts.

The proposal of Mr Hilliard, to publish a uniform Digest of all the American Reports, upon the plan of the English Digest of Mr Jeremy, appears to me to be entitled to the patronage of the profession. No work of this kind, sufficiently accurate and extensive for general practice, at present exists. The want of one cannot but be felt by every lawyer, whose inquiries reach beyond the limits of the local law of his own State. Such a compilation, executed with the care, fidelity and ability, which so important a task demands, would be so highly useful, that it could scarcely fail of general approbation. As far as I have had the means of comprehending the plan of Mr Hilliard, from a personal communication with him, it appears to me entirely satisfactory. And the assistance and supervision of so distinguished a lawyer as Mr Rand, cannot but ensure an accuracy and completeness in the execution of the plan, correspondent with his just claims on the public confidence.

JOSEPH STORY.

---

I have no doubt the Digest proposed by Mr Hilliard will be highly useful, and that it will have a tendency to relieve the profession from the great labor of looking through hundreds of volumes, or of indices, to ascertain whether points sought for have been treated of and decided. I also feel assured that Mr Hilliard's professional acquirements, and assiduity in legal researches, qualify him to give such a book, under the revision proposed, all the usefulness which the plan itself suggests.

ISAAC PARKER.

---

PICKERING'S REPORTS, No. 1, Vol. 8th, this day published by HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. July 10.

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 28, 1830. NO. V.

MERCANTILE LAW.—No. II.

[Continued.]

Bills may of course be cashed by all who have money at command. There, is, however, a distinct class of men, whose peculiar business it is to deal with money as an article of profit. The origin of bankers seems to have been twofold. In the insecurity of property which prevails in countries imperfectly civilized, it was a natural and very common practice for those who had accumulated a sum of money to place it for safe custody in the hands of some opulent tradesman of undoubted credit. Of course he would not suffer the money to be idle, but would employ it as capital in trade, taking care to retain in his hands sufficient to answer the calls of the owner. At the same time the extravagance and necessities of the landed proprietors continually compelled them to borrow from the wealthy tradesman, even at an exorbitant rate of interest. By degrees also the monied men found it equally advantageous, without embarking in trade themselves, to lend out capital to others who were willing to do so, upon such terms as might enable both to derive a profit from the employment of it. A separation thus took place of the tradesman and the monied capitalist, and the receiving of deposits and advancing of money on security, which the latter began publicly to profess, became a distinct and lucrative business. Again, in the infancy of foreign commerce, it was usual for the merchants of different countries to repair in person to the great fairs and markets, where the principal transactions were carried on. At that time payments were made in specie, and each merchant having only the money current in his own country or uncoined metal, there was a difficulty in effecting the exchange. Hence it became a gainful trade to give the current money of the place, or such other money as the merchant might wish for, in exchange for foreign coin or bullion, and the person who carried on this traffic, having stalls or benches (banques) upon the places of commercial resort, were thence called bankers. Of course, if a substantial and well-known merchant applied to them for money, these men would not hesitate for an adequate consideration to furnish him with it in the way of loan, and thus by degrees the practice grew up among them of making advances on mercantile securities. But whatever might be the origin of the system, the bankers of this day form a very important section of the mercantile community. Their profit, as we have seen, is derived from the advantageous employment of capital in the way of loan; and these loans are made either on personal security by bond, grant of annuity, promissory note or bill, or on security of land by mortgage, or of goods by pledge. But the most extensive and perhaps the most profitable mode in which bankers employ their capital, is in the discounting of bills. A sketch of the mode of dealing between a London banker and his customer will at once illustrate the mutual advantages of the system, and convey the requisite information to the reader. A tradesman makes a deposit with a banker, who thereupon enters his name in his books, or as it is technically termed, opens an account with him. Each day the tradesman sends to the bank whatever cash or bills are received in the course of his business. These are placed to his credit in account, the bills, if not at maturity, being entered short, i. e. in a column short of that in which the cash receipts are entered, to be carried into this latter column if subsequently paid. On the other hand, the customer makes no payment but through the medium of his banker. If bills are brought him to accept he makes them payable at his banker's; if payment is required in cash, he gives a cheque or order upon his banker for the amount. These, when presented at the bank, are immediately honored, and the sums paid upon them are debited to the customer in account. Again, if the latter wants cash for a bill, he sends it to the bank, where it is immediately discounted. If his credit be good, the banker will even permit him occasionally to over-draw his account, taking his promissory note or bill for the balance. These securities again he will renew, when at maturity, by taking a fresh note or bill, with this difference only, that this latter he cashes, and debiting his customer with the bill due, he places to his credit the sum for which the substituted bill is drawn minus the discount, which constitutes his profit in the transaction. When, however, the balance is considerable, he requires further and more effectual security, either by mortgage, or more generally by pledge. Thus it is that the holder of a bill of lading a dock-warrant, or other instrument of a like nature, frequently deposits it with his banker on account of advances either made or to be made; for as the property which these documents represent cannot be transferred without the possession of them, they are an effectual security for repayment to the amount which that property is worth. Thus the banker has the use of the floating balance, when it is in his favor, and the profit to be obtained by discounting: the customer, besides the regular keeping of his accounts, has the advantage of safe custody for his money, the convenience of remittance, and a ready means of obtaining cash when he is in want of it. The transactions of London bankers, though necessarily much complicated, are carried on with great punctuality and exactness. They are also considerably simplified by a method which they have by common consent adopted, called clearing, which method is this:—At half past three o'clock a clerk from each banker attends at a place called the clearing-house, where he brings all the drafts on the other bankers, which have been paid in his house that day, and he deposits them into their proper drawers (a drawer being here allotted to each banker); he then credits their accounts separately with the articles which they have against him, as found in the drawer. Balances are then struck from all the accounts, and the claims transferred from one to another, until they are so wound up and cancelled that each clerk has only to settle with two or three others, and their balances are immediately paid. Such drafts as are paid into a banker's too late for clearing, are sent to the houses on which they are drawn, to be marked, which is understood as an engagement that they will be paid the next day.

The course of dealing among country bankers (for there are banks established in almost every provincial capital and trading town) is somewhat different; with them it is not an uncommon practice to allow an interest upon deposits, and on the other hand to charge a commission for their trouble. Again, many instead of cash issue their promissory notes payable at sight. By this contrivance (the operation of which is sufficiently obvious) they are enabled to make large advances to their customers, and by extending their dealings beyond their actual capital, to obtain sometimes an exorbitant profit. But besides all these, there is a national bank, called the Bank of England; to understand the working of which, it is necessary to premise that the government of this country is indebted to a certain number of its subjects, in a vast sum of money, advanced at different times, to meet the public exigencies. The greater part of this debt is funded, that is, certain annual funds, to be raised by taxes upon the people, are assigned in perpetuity to pay the interest of it. It is through the medium of the Bank of England that this interest, or, as it is generally termed, the dividends upon these funds, are paid to the public creditors, in proportion to their respective shares in the stock. The shares are transferable, and consequently whoever is desirous of investing a sum of money in government security for the sake of the interest which it bears may do so by purchasing from a proprietor of stock such share as he may want, at the price which it is then worth in the market. Of course the value of a share fluctuates with the state of the security, and is consequently affected by political incidents. Hence it has become a practice to traffic in the buying and selling of shares,—a practice which has received the appropriate name of stock-jobbing. The wants of government in their ordinary expenditure also not unfrequently anticipate the annual income. In the interval, therefore, between the voting and the raising of the supplies, money is procured, when necessary, upon the faith of the funds assigned, by an issue of exchequer bills, i. e. of orders upon the Treasury, to be paid when the money raised from the taxes is brought in. For these bills the Bank of England gives cash, deducting a discount, calculated upon the probable period which will intervene before payment. But its transactions are not confined to dealings with the government. It has private accounts also with individuals of unquestionable credit, and for such does not refuse to discount ordinary bills of exchange. Its chief profit, however, arises from its large issue of promissory notes; and such is the universal confidence in the stability of the institution, that these are everywhere received as readily as specie, and form a very considerable part of the circulation of the country. We have no space for details, which might be carried to an almost indefinite extent; and here therefore we shall conclude this short and necessarily imperfect account of the modes and instruments by which payments are made, and money transactions in general carried on in this great and busy commonwealth.

[To be continued.]

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Commonwealth v. J. F. Knapp.

INDICTMENT.

The first Count in the Indictment charges, John F. Knapp with the murder of Joseph White with a bludgeon—and Jos. J. Knapp and George Crowninshield as accessaries before the fact.

The second charges the said John Francis Knapp with the murder of Joseph White with a dirk, and Jos. J. Knapp and George Crowninshield as accessaries before the fact.

The third charges Richard Crowninshield, Jr, with the murder with a bludgeon, and John F. Knapp as being present, aiding and abetting. Alleges the suicide of the said Richard, and that Jos. J. Knapp and George Crowninshield were accessaries before the fact.

The fourth is the same as the third in every respect, except that it charges the murder to have been committed with a dirk.

The fifth charges John F. Knapp, and some person unknown, with the murder. That the person unknown gave the blow with a bludgeon, and that the said Knapp was present, aiding and abetting.

It also charges Jos. J. Knapp, and George Crowninshield, as accessaries before the fact.

The sixth is the same as the fifth in every respect, but as to the weapon, which is alleged to be a dirk instead of a bludgeon.

—

CONCLUSION OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S ADDRESS TO THE JURY.

The Counsel for the Government do not confidently expect that the evidence which will be given you, will justify the belief that the prisoner at the bar actually gave the blow on the head, or the stabs in the heart of the deceased, for he, who, it will appear, did the deed, wretched man, like his great prototype, who betrayed the Saviour of the world for thirty pieces of silver, smitten with the stings of conscience, has gone and hanged himself; though less scrupulous than Judas, he has never returned the wages of his iniquity.

It is, however, altogether immaterial, whether the prisoner at the bar, actually gave the mortal blows, provided he was present, aiding and abetting the person, who inflicted them. He is charged both ways.

And this naturally brings us to the consideration of the law of abetments.

By the very ancient common law, before the reign of Henry IV, of England, he alone who gave the stroke was considered as the principal offender, and those who stood by in aid and assistance of him who actually committed the felony, were held to be only accessaries; and these aiders and abettors at the time of the felony, had the same right, that accessaries before the fact now have, that of not being tried till he that struck the blow should be tried and convicted; so that if he who actually committed the murder, died before he was tried and convicted, those who were present, aiding and assisting, could never be tried, and of course escaped punishment. But this principle was found to be so repugnant to the common understanding of mankind, that in the time of Henry 4th, all the judges of both benches concurred in altering that principle of the ancient common law, and settled it more conformably to reason and morality, common sense and public justice, by making the abettor at the fact a principal.

Had these judges advanced one step further towards common sense, and decided, that when he that gave the blow, and he that abetted him had died, or was otherwise not capable of being tried and convicted, the accessary before the fact, (the felony or murder being proved,) should be amenable to justice, as for a substantial offence, they would have left their common law much more perfect on this subject than it now is; for in moral turpitude the guilt of him who hires the assassin to do the deed, and absents himself, is of a darker grade, in my apprehension, than his who has the courage to do it.

The celebrated Mr Peel, in the bill which he brought before the House of Commons, contemplating amendments or alterations of some of the rules of the common law, makes this very case one of the amendments, and constitutes the offence of an accessary before the fact in felony a substantive crime, and triable independently of the principal, under certain conditions.

Whether our statute against murder will not be ruled by this Court to have altered the common law in this respect, as was suggested to be possible in the opening Charge of our lamented Chief Justice at this term, whose afflicting death is so deeply felt, will be tested, if it should ever become necessary in these trials. Permit me here to read his lucid opinion on this point. [See No. iv. pages 26 and 27 of this paper.]

But at present we are considering the case under the principles of the common law, as it now stands, and from the time of Henry 4th, to the present day, the common law is settled, that, as Lord Hale observes,* 'all that are present, aiding and assisting, are equally principals with him that gave the stroke, whereof the party died; for though one gave the stroke, yet in interpretation of law, it is the stroke of every person that was present, aiding and assisting, and though they are called principals in the second degree, yet they are principals; and therefore if there be an indictment of murder against A., that he feloniously struck B., whereof he died, and that C. and D. were present, aiding and abetting to A. in the felony and murder aforesaid, and A. appears not, but C. and D. appear, they shall be arraigned, and receive their judgment, if convict, though A. neither appears, nor be outlawed. And he further says, if A. be indicted as having given the mortal stroke, and B. and C. as present, aiding and assisting, and upon the evidence it appears that B. gave the stroke, and A. and C. were only aiding and assisting, it maintains the indictment, judgment shall be given against them all, for it is only a circumstantial variance, for it is the stroke of all that were present, aiding and abetting; he cites Mackally's case.

I will read also from 1 East. P. C., 350, 351, to the same point:

'In appeal where several are present at the fact, and one only actually does it, and the others abet him, the Plaintiff may either elect to suppose in his declaration that all did the fact, or show the special matter. For in these cases all the parties are principals, and the blow of one is in law the blow of all. For which reason an indictment that A. gave the mortal blow, and B., C., and D. were present and abetting, is sustained by evidence, that B. gave the blow, and A., C., and D. were present and abetting. Upon the like indictment, evidence that E. though not named therein, gave the blow, and that A., B., C., and D. were present and abetting, would be sufficient; or even that a person unknown gave the blow.' And 1 Hale, 440.

You perceive, therefore, Gentlemen, that it is altogether immaterial in law, whether the prisoner now on trial gave the mortal blow, or was only aiding and abetting to him who gave it—and that the indictment may charge him either way.

There are three kinds of abetments to felonies. —The first is an abetment at the time the felony is committed, that is, being present, aiding, and assisting or consenting to him who actually commits the felony; and this constitutes a principal offender.

The second is an abetment before the felony is committed, by counselling, hiring, and procuring the felony to be done, and being absent when it is committed, and this constitutes an accessary before the fact.

The third is an abetment after the felony is committed, and that is harboring, concealing or maintaining the principal offenders or their accessaries before the fact; and this constitutes an accessary after the fact.

The prisoner at the bar stands indicted of the first kind of these abetments, that is as a principal offender, and if he be not convicted, by the common law as it now stands in England, the accessaries before the fact cannot be tried, and must escape punishment.

It is therefore necessary to consider what, in law, constitutes an abettor at the time the murder is committed; and according to Lord Hale, to make an abettor to a murder a principal in the felony, two things are requisite.

The first is, he must be present.

The second is, he must be aiding and abetting. I will read you the authorities on both these points. As to the first, being present—

'As to the first: if divers persons come to make an affray, &c, and are of the same party, and come into the same house, but are in several rooms of the same house, and one be killed in one of the rooms, those that are of that party, and that came for that purpose, though in other rooms of the same house, shall be said to be present.—Dalt. cap. 93 p. 241.

The Lord Dacre and divers others came to steal deer in the park of one Pelham. Rayden, one of the company, killed the keeper in the park, the lord Dacre and the rest of the company being in other parts of the park, it was ruled, that it was murder in them all, and they died for it.—Crompi. 25. a. Dalt. ubi supra, 34 H. 8. B. Coron. 172.

The like in case burglary: though some stood at the lane's end or field-gate to watch if any came to disturb them, Co. P. C. p. 64. 11 H. 4. 13. b., yet they are said to be burglars, because present, aiding and assisting to the burglary.

So if A. being present, commands B. to kill C., and he doth it, both are principals.—13 H. 7. 10. a.

If many be present, and one only give the stroke, whereof the party dies, they are all principals, if they came for that purpose.—21 E. 4. 71. a.'—1 Lord Hale, 439. 4 Hawk. 201, 202.

As to the second point:—

'And consonant to this is Mr Dalton, p. 241, in these words: 'Note also, that if divers persons come in one company, to do any unlawful thing, as to kill, rob, or beat a man, or to commit a riot, or to do any other trespass, and one of them, in doing thereof, kill a man, this shall be adjudged murder in them all that are present, of that party, abetting him, and consenting to the act, or ready to aid him, although they did but look on.'—1 Hale, 441.

* 1 Hale, P. C. 437.

'When the law requireth the presence of the accomplicate at the perpetration of the fact, in order to render him a principal, it doth not require a strict actual immediate presence, such a presence, as would make him an eye or ear-witness of what passeth.

'Several persons set out together, or in small parties, upon one common design, be it murder or other felony, or for any other purpose unlawful in itself, and each taketh the part assigned him; some to commit the fact, others to watch at proper distances and stations, to prevent a surprise, or to favor, if need be, the escape of those who are more immediately engaged. They are all, provided the fact be committed, in the eye of the law present at it. For it was made a common case with them, each man operated in his station at one and the same instant towards the same common end; and the part each man took tended to give countenance, encouragement, and protection to the whole gang, and to insure the success of their common enterprise.'—Foster, 349.

Which is, if he be consenting to the felony, or ready to aid him who does it, although he does but look on. If they have the same object in view, if they came for the same purpose. It is the intention of the mind therefore, that constitutes the abettor to a felony, if he be present in contemplation of law, though he do nothing.

And now, gentlemen, let us hearken to the testimony; and the government are first bound to prove the corpus delicti, that is, that the deceased Mr White came to his death by the hand of external violence.

Having proved the death by the hand of external violence, we shall then proceed to prove to you that the death was effected by a wicked conspiracy and combination of individuals, of which the prisoner at the bar was one, to destroy the life of the deceased, and to this point, we shall offer Joseph Jenkins Knapp, jr, to redeem the pledge of the Government given for his protection, on condition of his testifying the whole truth aud nothing but the truth on this trial. He refuses to testify. And now, Gentlemen, every one must be satisfied that the pledge of the Government, given for his protection, is fully redeemed; he has now forfeited that proffered protection, and stands accused as an accessary before the fact to this murder—he has an unquestionable right to take the stand he has, for the Constitution of the Commonwealth provides, that no subject shall be compelled to accuse, or furnish evidence for himself.

As we cannot prove this vile conspiracy and combination to murder the deceased by the disclosure of this accomplice in the crime, by the blessing of God we will prove it by other testimony in the case.

And, if in the opinion of the Court we shall be able to shew that such a conspiracy existed, another principle of law will be relied on, that when a conspiracy to do an unlawful act is proved, the acts of any one of the conspirators, done in effecting the object of their combination may be given in evidence against any other of the conspirators. Phillips on Evidence, [76.]

Evidence and opinion of the Court as to confessions of the Prisoner, in relation to the club; and the proof of a conspiracy.

The Court direct Mr Colman to state all that was said in relation to encouragement.

Early in the interview, Phippen said that Joseph had decided to make a confession, &c, (as above,) and afterwards repeated this, and appealed to me. Frank then asked me to use my influence, or interest, for him. I told him that I could promise nothing, but that I thought his youth would be in his favor.

I have stated all the encouragement that was given. There was not the least encouragement given to him, either by me or in my hearing, to relate facts within his own knowledge. Soon after this interview, I found the club under the North steps of the Church, in Howard-street. I went there on the 20th of May, about 1 o'clock, with Dr Barstow and Mr Fettyplace. The steps are of wood—under the lower one there is a rat-hole—in it I found this club.

Webster. Who told you it was there?

Dexter. I object to this question. The finding of the club is all that can be given in evidence. This question is introduced to criminate the prisoner and therefore it is not admissible; for it is criminating him by his confession of that fact, and no part of the confession is evidence. (Cites Leach, Cr. Law, 300.) I call the attention of the Court to the principle, which is to give his confession against him, which has already been ruled out. (Cites, Phill. 83.) In this passage is the origin of the doctrine.—(Leach, 300. 2 Stark. 50.) The case cited by Starkie does not support him and it is against the principle.

Court. We are very clear that it is competent for the Government to prove that this club was found in consequence of information from the prisoner.

Webster. We now expect to prove a conspiracy, between the two Knapps and the two Crowninshields, to commit this murder; having done that, we propose to prove acts done by all, in pursuance of the common design.

Gardiner objects to this course, because it is never pursued except in conspiracy and treason. [6 T. R. 527.]

Webster cites Stark. 210 and 6 T. R. 527.

The Court. We are satisfied with the course pursued by the Government.

Evidence as to a pretended Robbery.

Stephen C. Phillips, sworn. I was one of the Committee of Vigilance. The two Knapps came before the Committee at their request to give an account of a robbery, said to have been attempted upon them at Wenham.

Dexter. I object to any proof of this robbery.

Webster. It is always competent to prove, what persons under suspicion do, to divert that suspicion. I cite to this point. 1 Stark. 492-493.

Dexter. Such evidence is just as if that of a generally bad character was given to the Jury—besides, it is not within the rule laid down by the Court in relation to anonymous letters. This is, also, a distinct crime.

By Court.—It is now proposed, by the Counsel for the Government, to prove that the prisoner got up a fictitious robbery. This is objected to, on the other part, because it is a distinct offence, and has no relation to the crime now charged.

It is now clear, that the Government may prove that the Defendant took measures to divert suspicion from himself, and it would seem to follow, that any evidence which tends to this point is admissible. The Court will take care in charging the the Jury to give such evidence its proper direction, and its weight will be left to them.

Mr Gardiner distinguished the several classes of offenders connected with the crime of murder. First, he who strikes the blow, being the principal in the first degree. Second, he who is aiding and abetting, being the principal in the second degree. Third, he who hires and procures, and is considered the accessory before the fact. All these are subjected to the same punishment. How was the prisoner charged in the Indictment? First, as the person who struck the blow—next as being present, aiding and abetting the person who struck the blow. This person, in some of the counts, is alleged to be Richard Crowninshield, Jr, in others a person unknown. This is the distinction of the Common Law. He who is a principal in the second degree, in England, is, under the Statute, an accessory before the fact. The Government was bound to prove, that the prisoner gave the blow, or was present, aiding and abetting the murderer. He thought the real inquiry was, whether the prisoner was there, aiding and abetting the murderer. The evidence which the Government had produced is of a very weak nature, and is liable to great error. They first attempt to prove a conspiracy; then, in support of that, they show you, that the murder was committed—that three men were in the vicinity of the murder, at the time it was committed. They also shew a combination of a great number of facts. But all these avail nothing, unless they bring you irresistibly to the conclusion, that the prisoner gave the blow, or was present aiding and abetting the murderer. He stated that these circumstances are so connected together in this conspiracy, if the Jury should come to the conclusion that one is untrue, the whole case must fall to the ground.

He then referred to one or two cases of circumstantial evidence, as illustrating this principle. (The case of the uncle mentioned by Lord Coke. 1 Stark. 502—3 and 5.) Even when a party has confessed, there are cases which show that innocent men have been executed upon their own confession.—(2 Starkie, 43, and notes. 4 Bl. 357.]

The whole evidence of the conspiracy rests on two conversations. One, overheard by Leighton, between the prisoner and his brother, at Wenham, the other heard by Palmer, between the Crowninshields. So far as these conversations tend to anything, it is to disprove the charge. As to the weight of this testimony, he intended to show that these witnessess were not entitled to credit. The Government having proved a conspiracy, they prove the murder, and ask you to infer, that it was done in pursuance of a conspiracy. Their whole evidence, if it proves anything, shows the prisoner to have been an accessory before the fact. The circumstances of the club and dirk might have been communicated by others to the prisoner. All the other circumstances in the case afford no presumptiom that he was aiding and abetting. As to evidence, relating to personal identity, he referred to Crow's case, in the Appendix to Phillips's Evidence, p. 78. Sir———Davenport's case in State Trials.

The only question is, was John Francis Knapp constructively present? Even if he were in Brown-street, he was not present, except by a mere fiction of law. To make a man liable as constructively present, he must be in a capacity to render assistance, and must be there for that purpose, and must actually assist. To show that the man in Brown-street could not be considered in law, as present, he referred to some cases in the books, relating to the subject of constructive presence.

He stated, that no person, knowing a felony, can be said to be present, at the commitment of felony, unless he be where he can aid, with the intent and ability concurring, and is actually aiding, at the fact. In this, as in other questions of law that have arisen, there is not so much difficulty in ascertaining the principle, as in applying it. (He cited 2 Stark. 7, 8. Charge of Chief Justice Parker. Foster, 350. 1 Hale, c. 34, p. 439. Hawkins, b. 2. c. 29. Russel, 29, 627, 1025.)

Lord Dacre's case is better reported by Moore, p. 86. 2 Stark. Ev. 7, 8, and cases there cited. 1 Hale, 533. 1 Hawkins, 34. Russell, 1025. 1 Hale 463. Russell, 325. 2 Hawkins (442) b. 2, c. 29. S. 10. Aaron Burr's. 4 Cranch, 490. Trial 426.

The whole tendency of modern cases on this subject has been to narrow the principle. Russell and Ryan, 343 and 25. King vs. Sowers. Same 99. The King vs. White. Same 113, 363. The King vs. Stewart & Dickens, 421. The King vs. Kelley. Russell, 22 new ed.

Mr Gardiner went on to state that they proposed to introduce evidence to shew that the man, seen in Brown street, was not the prisoner at the bar, but some other person; that the prisoner was in a different place during the evening; and that Brown street was not a situation in which aid and assistance could be given to the murderer.

Mr Dexter stated that there was one question which he wished to present to the Court, and that was whether principals in the second degree at the common law, were not made accessories before the fact, by our Statute of 1784, c. 65, and entitled to all the privileges of accessories before the fact, in the form and time of trial. This Statute is entitled 'An Act against accessories to crimes and felonious assaulters,' and describes principals in the second degree at the common law, and declares that they shall be considered as accessories before the fact. He cited Stat. 184, c. 123. This Statute is not repealed by the general repealing Act of 1805, c. 88. And the law does not favor repeals by implication, 2 Cranch, 23, 386. 3 Wheat. 631. 5 Wheat. 96. 6 Dane, 588.

The Act of 1804, above cited is consistent with that of 1784; and the law does not favor repeals by implication. Note to Stat. of 1784, c. 65. Russell 30, n. 31. 3 Mass. R. 253. 17 M. R. 92. 1 Paine 400.

The Attorney General and Mr Webster said the Statute of 1784 was virtually repealed by the Statute of 1804, and that if it were not, the description of accessories before the fact, in that Statute, was not the common law definition of a principal in the second degree. The words 'being present' are not used in that Statute. 6 Dane, 588—9.

The Act of 1784, c. 65, means being absent. As the law stood when that Act was passed, a man who should hire, procure, abet or assist, was an accessory. A man should abet, &c. 'being present,' was a principal in the second degree.

ENGLISH CASES.

ADMIRALTY COURT,—MAY.

Before Sir C. Robinson.

The General Palmer.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Commissioners under the Salvage Act.

The King's Advocate and Dr Jenner appeared for the owners; and Drs. Dodson and Adams for the salvors.

It appeared that the General Palmer East Indiaman, homeward bound, was, on the 23d of November last, lying off Margate, when a gale sprung up, which gradually increased until she parted her small bower anchor; he then let go her best bower, and finding that she was still riding hard, he made Lloyd's signal No. 71, for an anchor and cable. Two boats, the Liberty and the King George, put off to board her. The Liberty actually boarded, but the King George having ascertained the size and weight of the cable and anchor required, returned to procure it. When it was procured, it was found to be so large that in such a sea the King George could not carry it without great danger of sinking, and the Queen lugger was therefore employed for that purpose. The crews of three vessels then assisted, and the gale continuing, it was deemed advisable to run for Whitstable Bay, about twenty miles distant, where she was run on the mud, and got off the following day at high water. For this service they claimed salvage on the vessel and cargo, which was admitted to be worth 30,000*l*, and the commissioners who sat at Margate awarded then 1,000*l*. The owners objected to this decision as being too much for the service performed, the ship having only made a signal for a cable and anchor, though it was subsequently resolved to run for Whitstable Bay. They made a tender of 500*l* which was refused by the salvers, being 21 in number, the latter contending that the service performed was attended with risk and peril, and that it was by no means inadequate to the sum awarded by the Commissioners.

Sir C. Robinson, in giving judgment, thought, he said, that the services of the salvers had been exaggerated, for the only danger they had risked was from the high sea. Under all the circumstances, he thought the justice of the case would be amply satisfied by awarding 500*l*, to be divided between the crew of the three vessels, and 100*l* additional to be divided amongst the crew of the Liberty alone.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS—MAY.

Burton v. Horne and Another.

Mr Sergeant Wilde said, that the action in this case was brought against the defendants, who were coach proprietors, to recover the amount of a parcel, which had been forwarded to their care, to be sent by coach to Coventry. The Jury found a verdict for the defendants. He (the Learned Sergeant) now moved for leave to set aside the verdict, and that a new trial be granted, on the ground that the evidence of one of the witnesses for the defence could be contradicted as to a material point. The affidavit upon which the present application was made, stated that at the moment the witness alluded to was giving his evidence at Guildhall, he was under the care of a constable upon a charge of embezzling money belonging to the defendants, his employers; and that after he gave his evidence he was taken before the magistrates at Guildhall, and was liberated upon the charge of embezzlement, although his employers had a letter of his, in which he admitted his guilt and pleaded distress; the book-keeper told the magistrates that it was not the intention of the defendants to prosecute. This witness swore upon the trial that he had frequently delivered parcels to a Mr Giles in the street; but that gentleman in his affidavit positively denied having ever received parcels from him in that manner. It was such a witness as that who was put into the box, with a heavy charge hanging over his head, and whose interest of course it was to free himself from the consequences of such a transaction. Besides, he should contend that there was sufficient proof of gross negligenc in this case, as it appeared that the parcel in question, which contained Bank notes, had never been put into the coach; and that they were actually changed in London before the coach reached Coventry. In a case in which it appeared that a lost parcel had been put into one coach instead of another, the Jury found that the defendant was guilty of gross negligence; and there could be no doubt that not sending a parcel at all was equally as gross a neglect.

The Chief Justice observed, that if the affidavit now produced were unanswered, it was one which very nearly impeached the administration of justice.

The Court granted a rule Nisi.

Sittings before the Chief Justice and a Special Jury,

Dalton v Irvine.

Mr Sergeant Taddy and Mr Hutchinson appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr Sergeant Wilde and Mr Richards for the defendant.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, a broker in the City, to recover from the defendant, the owner of the ship Albion, a sum of money which he claimed as commission for procuring a charterparty for that vessel. It appeared that the defendant had, in the usual manner, employed the plaintiff to procure employment for his ship, and that the plaintiff had entered into a charterparty with a third person, by whom the vessel was to be freighted. One of the articles of the charter party mentioned that a quantity of logwood, not exceeding twenty tons, should form part of her cargo; and for the freight of this logwood the sum of one guinea per ton was stipulated to be paid. The defendant, on observing this stipulation in the charterparty, insisted upon its being altered, and said that, unless 6*l*. per ton were paid for the logwood, he would not sign the charterparty. The plaintiff remonstrated with him, and said that the sum charged in the charterparty was that which was usually demanded, and that he was convinced the freighter would not pay more. The defendant insisted on his getting that part of the charterparty altered, and the plaintiff accordingly applied to the freighter, who would not agree to the proposed alteration, and the defendent then definitely refused to sign the charterparty; as he also refused to make any payment to the plaintiff on account of having procured the charterparty, the present action, in the nature of a claim for commission, was brought. The facts already stated were proved; but other evidence was given to show that the custom of the trade, in business of this kind, was to pay the commission when the charterparty had been regularly signed by both parties, and not till then. The defence was, that by this custom no commission could be claimed, for the charterparty had not been signed, and the defendant had derived no benefit from the plaintiff's services. It was contended that the advantage of the trade required the strict enforcement of this custom, and that a broker was bound to make such a charterparty as would secure to the shipowner a beneficial employment of his vessel. As the plaintiff had not done this, he was not entitled to claim his commission. In reply, it was urged that it was quite sufficient if a broker made such a charterparty as usual in the trade, and that a shipowner had no right to reject a charterparty merely because one of its stipulations (though quite usual in the trade) was not sufficiently profitable to please him. It was then argued, that if the plaintiff could not maintain his action for the commission, he was at least entitled to recover a reasonable compensation for his work and labor: but to this it was answered that the claim here was for commission, and that the evidence went to show there was no other mode of payment but that of commission, which only became due on the signing of the charterparty.

The CHIEF JUSTICE left it to the Jury to say what was the custom under which both parties must be supposed to have acted; and the Jury, after a short consultation, returned a verdict for the defendant.

DIGEST OF RECENT ENGLISH REPORTS.

On an indictment for administering a drug to a woman to procure abortion, she not being quick with child, if it appear that the woman was not with child at all, the prisoner must be acquitted.—Rex v. Scudder, 3 Carr & Payne. 605.

Where a person agrees to make an article of certain materials for a stipulated price, but uses materials of a better kind, he cannot therefore charge more than the stipulated price, or require the article to be returned, because the buyer will not pay the increased price.—Wilmot v. Smith, 3 Carr & Payne, 453.

The custom of London, which allows a man to build to any height upon ancient foundations, although he may darken his neighbor's lights thereby, must be confined to cases where all the four walls belong to the party; and will not justify him in raising an obstruction by means of three walls of his, so as to darken the lights in a fourth wall belonging to his neighbor.—Shadwell v. Hutchinson, 3 Carr & Payne, 615.

If an apprentice absent himself from his master, and his master take him back, and an action be afterwards brought for such absenting, the taking back, to constitute a defence, must be pleaded specially. Wright v. Gillon, 3 Carr & Payne 583.

A sheriff's officer having a warrant to arrest a party for debt, went to the party and read his warrant to him, and then having taken a fee, proceeded to the party's attorney, to let him know that bail might be put in: afterwards the officer returned that he had arrested the party: By Lord Tenterden, C. J., this is no arrest.—George v. Radford, 3 Carr. & Payne, 464.

By the terms of a reference under a judge's order, the award was to be made by the first day of Trinity Term, or such further day as the arbitrator should appoint by indorsement on the order. The arbitrator enlarged the time once by endorsement, but the enlarged period being nearly elapsed, another judge's order was obtained (afterwards made a rule of Court,) authorising a further extension of the time. The arbitrator made his award beyond the time of the first, but within the time of the second enlargement, but without any further indorsement: Held that the award was good.—Leggett v. Finlay, 2 Bing. 255.

[Gaselee, J. 'I was disposed to think at first that this enlargement was made without authority; but upon hearing the circumstances of the case, I think a sufficient authority has been shewn.']

The declaration stated, that two persons had been appointed arbitrators, with power to appoint an umpire in cases of difference; that not agreeing, they appointed one; and that the arbitrator and umpire awarded. It appeared, that the umpire was appointed before the arbitrators had inquired into the matters referred, or differed in opinion, and the award ran thus: 'We the said arbitrators do award,' &c.—it was signed, however, by the umpire, as well as by the arbitrators. These several matters were made grounds of objection; but the objections were overruled; and it was also decided, that although the award was in substance the award of the umpire, the misdescription in the declaration was immaterial.—Bates v. Cooke, 9 Barn. & Cress. 407.

By an order at Nisi Prius an action at law, a suit in equity, and all matters in difference between the parties, were submitted to a barrister. The arbitrator adjudicated upon the action by ordering the defendants to pay a sum of money; and upon the suit in equity, by ordering the bill to be dismissed, and each party to pay his own costs: Held that he thereby decided on the matters included both in the action and the suit, and that the award was good.—Pearse v Pearse, 9 Barn. & Cress. 484.

If it appear on the trial that a witness for the defence is one of the bail, the judge will make an order for striking his name out of the bail-piece, on the sum sworn to and an additional sum for costs being deposited with the associate, so as to render him a competent witness.—Bailey v. Hale, 3 Carr & Payne, 560.

A. draws, and B. accepts, a bill for the accomodation of C., the first indorsee. Neither A. nor C. has any effects in the hands of B., yet this does not supersede the necessity of notice of dishonor to the drawer from a subsequent indorsee, who was ignorant of the concoction of the bill.—Norton v. Pickering, 1 Danson & Loyd, 210.

When the acceptor of a bill positively refuses payment, notice of dishonor may be given during the same day on which the bill becomes due.—Clowes v.——, 1 Danson & Loyd, 212.

A bill accepted for differences on time bargains in stock, is valid in the hands of an indorsee without notice.—Greenland v. Dyer, 2 Man. & Ryl. 422.

A writing obligatory, whereby the lender's money is secured to him though the ship be lost, is not a bottomry contract, though so understood and treated as such by the parties; and the lender's interest being described as on bottomry in a policy of insurance on the risk, the misdescription was held to be fatal.—Simonds v. Hodgson, 6 Bing.114.

In an action for money had and received, being the amount of cheques fraudulently obtained from the plaintiff, by the person from whom the defendants received them; Held that it must be left to a jury to say, whether the defendants exercised reasonable caution; and per Lord Tenterden: 'It cannot be laid down as matter of law, that a party taking a cheque after any fixed time from its date, does so at his peril.' And per Littledale, J.: 'Though the rule of law (that a party taking a negotiable instrument has it with no better title than the person from whom he takes it,) is so with respect to bills of exchange and promissory notes, I think it cannot be applied to cheques.'—Rothschild v. Corney, 9 Barn. and Cres. 388; 1 Danson, and Loyd, 325.

[In Bayley on Bills, 4 Edit. 124, the rule is said to be, in general, applicable to cheques; and it was so laid down by Lord Kenyon, 7 T. R. 423.]

A. and B. were sureties for C., a collector of taxes, who became a defaulter: the obligees sued A. and recovered: Held that in an action for contribution by A. against B., A. could only recover half the amount of the verdict against him, and neither half of the taxed costs of the plaintiffs in the former action, nor half of his costs of defending such action: Held also, that the half of sums received by A. after the verdict against him, from C., must be taken in reduction of the amount of that verdict, and could not be applied in payment of the costs.—Knight v. Hughes, 3 Carr and Payne, 467.

Where the jury, in returning a verdict, say that they find for the plaintiff as to one part of the declaration, he will not be allowed the expenses of witnesses called to support a different part, although the verdict be entered for him generally.—Cocks v. Peachey, 1 Man. and Ryl. 420.

Where a right is vested in a particular person or corporation, the withholding of that right and thereby compelling the party to sue for it, is an injury for which damages may be recovered; and if damages may be recovered, costs will follow. Thus the President and College of Physic are entitled to costs if they succeed in an action for the penalty imposed by 10 Hen. 8., on persons practising without license in the City of London; and under 4 Jac. 1. c. 3. which gives costs to defendants in all cases in which a plaintiff is entitled if he succeed,) the defendant in such an action is entitled to costs in case the action fails.—The College of Physicians v. Harrison, 9 B. and C. 524.

MAINE.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Vol. 5, of Greenleaf's Reports contains the cases decided from May 1827, to April 1829.

Chapman & al. v. Shaw.

Where a note, payable in twelve months, was given as the consideration for a written engagement of the payee to convey certain goods to the maker at a future day, and the payee forthwith indorsed and sold the note for its amount in money, after which the original contract was rescinded; it was held that the maker of the note might recover the amount of the payee, though the twelve months had not elapsed.

Webster & al. v. Drinkwater.

The party committing a tort, cannot be charged as on an implied contract, the tort being waived, unless some benefit has actually accrued to him.

Gardiner Man. Co. v. Heald.

One tenant in common may have assumpsit against his co-tenant, who has sold the common property, and received all the money.

Smith v. Sayward & als.

Where one was employed as the agent of certain others, to purchase for them a piece of land, and take the conveyance to himself, concealing his principals; and a third person, at the request of the principals, became surety for the agent in a promissory note for the purchase money; which note the surety paid; it was held that the surety alone might have assumpsit against the principals, for the money thus paid.

Held also, that this was an original undertaking, and not within the statute of frauds.

Held also, that the benefit accruing to the principals was a sufficient consideration to support the promise.

Crosby v. Allyn.

An actual entry, by the officer, on real estate, seems not to be necessary to constitute a valid attachment.

An attachment of 'all the debtor's right, title and interest in any real estate in the town of B,' is a good attachment of his tenancy in common in a particular tract in that town.

The lien created by attachment of a tenancy in common follows the estate, if it be changed from common to several property pending the attachment.

Holbrook v. Baker.

A chattel mortgaged, is not liable to be attached or seized in execution for the debt of the mortgagor, the money due to the mortgagee not having been paid, nor legally tendered.

Strout & al. v. Bradbury & al.

Property lawfully in the possession of a deputy sheriff by attachment, cannot be taken out of his possession by another deputy of the same sheriff, under another writ.

Fryeburgh Canal v. Frye.

A proprietors' committee having in their behalf entered into a submission of demands to referees, under the statute, representing themselves as duly authorized so to do, and the proprietors having been heard upon the merits before the referees, making no objection to the submission;—upon error brought by them to reverse a judgment rendered upon the award, the Court presumed that the committee had due authority, though the want of it was assigned for error.

Titcomb v. Thomas.

A bill of exchange payable to the order of the drawer, and not indorsed, may be assigned, for a valuable consideration, by delivery only; and for the benefit of the assignee an action lies against the acceptor, in the name of the drawer, as on a bill payable to himself.

The interest of one of several joint assignees of such bill may be transferred to others by delivery of the bill, and payment by them of his share of the money due upon it.

Bangor Bank v. Hook.

The damages on a protested bill of exchange are not given as a liquidated arbitrary mulct; but as a compensation to the holder, for the expense of remitting the money to the place where the bill ought to have been paid. And therefore if the holder receive part of the money of the acceptor, this diminishes the damages, pro rata.

The indorser of a bill of exchange is not liable for the costs of a suit commenced by the holder against the acceptor; nor for any commissions paid on the collection of part of the money of him.

Saco v. Osgood.

Where one gave bond to a town, conditioned to support its paupers for five years, and to save the town harmless from all damages, cost and expenses which might happen or accrue for on account of the liability of the town to be called upon to support or provide for poor persons; and after the expiration of the five years, a suit was commenced against the town, for supplies furnished to a pauper by another town, accruing partly before and partly after the expiration of the term; in which suit the defendants prevailed;—it was held that the obligor was liable for his proportional part of the expenses of defending this suit, within the condition of the bond.

Baker v. Haley & als.

Bonds for ease and favor being those only which are given to purchase an indulgence not authorized by law; a bond given for the debtor's liberties, under Stat. 1824, ch. 281, is good, though it does not strictly conform to the rules indicated in the statute.

Such bond may properly be taken to the officer making the arrest.

Given & ux. v. Simpson & al.

The language of the Stat. 1821, ch. 50, giving to this court equity jurisdiction in 'all cases of trust arising under deeds, wills, or in the settlement of estates,' is applicable only to express trusts, arising from the written contracts of the deceased; and not to those implied by law, or growing out of the official character or situation of the executor or administrator.

Lewiston v. N. Yarmouth.

The Resolve of March 19, 1821, rendering valid a certain class of marriages, so far as it has a bearing upon questions of settlement under the pauper laws for expenses incurred subsequent to its passage, is constitutional.

Allen v. Sayward.

The word 'give,' in a deed of bargain and sale, in this State, does not import a covenant of warranty.

Emery v. Chase.

By a grant of land by deed of feoffment, 'reserving' to the grantor 'the improvement of the one half of the premises, with necessary wood for family use, during his own natural life, and the life of his wife'—it was held that the estate passed, one moiety to the use of the grantee and his heirs in fee, and the other moiety to the use of the grantor and his wife for their lives, and the life of the survivor of them, with remainder in fee to the grantee and his heirs.

Graves v. Fisher & al.

If a lot be granted fronting on, and bounded by a river, the side lines are to be continued to the main stream, though they thereby cross a point formed by the junction of one of its branches with the principal river.

Cutts v. King.

By the use of the term 'about,' in describing the length of line in a deed of conveyance, it is understood that exact precision was not intended; but if the place where the monument stood, by which the distance was controlled and determined, cannot be ascertained, the grantee must be limited to the number of rods or feet given.

O'Brien v. Dunlap.

Where several issues are made up and tried in the same cause, some of which are found against the 'party prevailing,' he is still entitled to his full costs upon all the issues, by the provisions of Stat. 1821, ch. 59, sec. 17.

Gibson v. Waterhouse.

If judgment is arrested for one bad count, the defendant is entitled to his full costs on all the issues, as the party prevailing.

Hathorne v. Cate.

If in assumpsit the defendant files his account in offset, in consequence of which the plaintiff's damages are reduced below twenty dollars, the plaintiff is still entitled to full costs; this case not being within the intent of Stat. 1821, ch. 59, sec. 30.

Bean v. Mayo & al.

A covenant in a deed that the land is free from incumbrance, is broken by the existence of a mortgage previously given by the grantor to the grantee.

But in such case, the condition of the mortgage not being broken, nor the mortgage discharged by the grantee, the damages are but nominal.

Scott & al. v. Whipple & als.

An indenture, in which several persons are represented as parties of the one part, is the deed of as many persons of that part as execute and deliver it, though it is not signed by them all.

Ross v. Gould.

A mere mistake of the party in possession of land, as it will not constitute a disseisin, so it will not be construed into an abandonment of the possession; especially where it was caused by the owner of the fee.

---

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

SUPERIOR COURT OF JUDICATURE.

Vol. 4 contains the cases decided from January, 1827, to May, 1827.

Moses vs. Norris.

A carrier is answerable for all losses happening otherwise than by inevitable accident.

But trover will not lie against a carrier for goods which have been lost, the proper remedy being an action on the contract and not trover.

Barron vs. Davis.

Pine timber, which has been put into Connecticut river and suffered to float down in such manner as to be liable to forfeiture under the statute of June 10, 1808, cannot be lawfully seized as forfeited, after the owner has regained the possesaion of it and has it in his custody.

Dow vs. Norris.

Where a statute gives a penalty incurred under it to an individual, the right of an individual to a penalty incurred under the statute is a civil cause within the meaning of the clause in the bill of rights which prohibits the passing of retrospective laws for the decision of civil causes.

And such right of an individual cannot be taken away by a repeal of the statute under which the penalty was incurred.

The power of the Legislature to raise taxes under the constitution and to authorize guardians to sell the land of their wards.

Sabin vs. Philbrick.

Where judgment was rendered in a cause in the court of common pleas in favor of the plaintiff by an agreement in which it was stated that this was done merely for the purpose of bringing the cause to this court; and it was here agreed that the plaintiff should have judgment for the same sum he recovered in the common pleas, it was held that plaintiff was entitled to double costs on the appeal.

Roby vs. Marsh.

When a plaintiff appeals from a judgment of the court of common pleas in a personal action, and recovers in this court less than $50, he is entitled to the costs of the court below, and the defendant to the costs of the appeal.

Rumney vs. Ellsworth.

In actions of assumpsit commenced in the court of common pleas, if the amount of the sum in controversy between the parties exceeds the sum of thirteen dollars and thirtythree cents and the plaintiff recovers more than six dollars, he is entitled to full costs.

But if in such a case the amount of the sum in controversy appears upon the face of the declaration, or by the proof to be less than thirteen dollars thirtythree cents, the suit will be deemed vexatious and the costs will be limited under the statute of June 29, 1819.

Swasey vs. Wilmot.

In assumpsit on a promissory note for $55,11, the defendant filed a set-off in the court of common pleas, where the cause was tried and judgment rendered for the defendant, from which judgment the plaintiff appealed to this court where the cause was again tried and a verdict returned in favor of the plaintiff with $25,54 damages. It was held that the defendant was entitled to the costs of the appeal.

Barron vs. Ashley.

Where a plaintiff brought an action of trespass for taking and carrying away a large number of logs from Connecticut river and its banks, and it appeared upon trial that all the logs taken had been put into the river under such circumstances as to be forfeited to any person who should take them, with the exception of one log for which the plaintiff recovered $2, it was held that he was not entitled to full costs.

In such a case the plaintiff could not have had that reasonable expectation of recovering more than $6, which was intended by the statute.

Pritchard vs. Atkinson.

A justice of the peace has no jurisdiction to try an action of covenant broken, founded on a covenant, that land is conveyed free of incumbrances, when a public highway is assigned as a breach of the covenant.

In such cases, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to full costs, however small may be the amount of the damages assessed.

Webster vs. Atkinson.

No parol evidence of an expressed intention nor of the acts of the parties can be admitted to explain a patent ambiguity in a deed.

But in some cases to aid in giving a construction to an instrument, parol evidence is admissible to show the situation and circumstances of any person or thing to which the instrument relates.

When a grant of a third part of a tract of land is made without any limitation of the same third in severalty, the grantor and grantee will hold their parts in common.

It is not necessary, however, in order to convey a part in severalty, that the limitation should be in express terms; but it may be collected by implication from the language used.

The construction of a deed must be made upon the entire instrument and be such that the whole deed and every part of it may take effect, and one part must be construed by another so that all the parts may agree.

Emerson vs. Murray.

An endorsement made upon an instrument before it is executed may be parcel of the obligation. But before an endorsement can be considered as parcel of a deed, it must be shown affirmatively to have been upon the instrument when executed.

---

Lemuel Shaw, Esq. of this city, has been put in nomination by the Governor for the vacant office of Chief Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of this Commonwealth. His nomination will probably be confirmed.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 28, 1830.

Greenleaf's Reports.—While Maine constituted a part of Massachusetts, it furnished its full proportion of talent in the Profession, and some of the best Judges on the bench of the Supreme Court.

The County of Cumberland in an especial manner, has for many years been distinguished for its eminent men. Upon the separation, unlike other new States, Maine started with a Judicial System, already organised in fact, and a practice established and matured. There was also a body of law in the Reports of Massachusetts, which could easily be adopted to the exigences of its new condition and which would be of essential aid in explaining its own laws, and illustrating the principles of its Government. Up to the year of the separation, the decisions in the Reports may be regarded as the law of Maine, excepting in those cases where the new Constitution and legislative enactments have varied it. Those cases are comparatively few.

Maine may then be considered as having not merely the Cases in Greenleaf's Reports, but the whole series of decisions in the first 16 Vols. of the Mass. Reports, to make up her Judicial Learning.

Greenleaf's Reports may properly enough be regarded as a New Series, and whoever is desirous of keeping up his acquaintance with N. England Decisions, and more especially is disposed to follow out the cases reported in the Mass. Reports, in all their applications and illustrations, will find great aid from the Reports of Mr Greenleaf. He is not merely a reporter. He has long been an eminent Lawyer in his state, and now stands in the first ranks of his profession. He has a full and perfect knowledge of the cases which he reports; and his legal discrimination and judgment, enable him to give the points decided, their full and just statement.

We cannot better conclude this short notice of these reports, than in the language of the Jurist for July, 1830.

'The volume before us, like those which preceded it, bears ample testimony to the correct judgment and sound learning of the judges who preside in the Supreme Court of Maine. The opinions delivered, are generally clear and logical, and show a faithful and attentive examination of the questions presented for consideration.

The court is fortunate in having so accomplished a reporter as Mr Greenleaf, who is familiar with law both theoretically and practically, and who comprehends the full effect and bearing of the arguments and decisions which he records. Without this extensive legal skill and sagacity, there is always danger that a reporter will misrepresent the opinions advanced by counsel and the court, that his statements of cases will be clogged with a load of irrelevant matter, while important particulars are omitted, and that his abstracts will be inaccurate and unsatisfactory.

Mr Greenleaf appears to have aimed throughout his volume to present cases in as condensed a form as was consistent with rendering them clear and intelligible. The statements of facts are carefully confined to those circumstances which relate to the questions of law presented to the court; and we are never troubled with those repetitions of which we have sometimes had occasion to complain in other reporters. Indeed, in a very few instances, Mr Greenleaf's study of brevity has led him to omit in his statements circumstances which would have rendered the cases more easily and readily intelligible.

The arguments of counsel, where they are given, are usually stated with sufficient clearness and precision.

The abstracts are, in most instances, well made, presenting the points decided by the court, with great brevity and accuracy. In some few instances, however, the reporter has neglected points which were raised at the bar, and decided by the court. We question the expediency of such omissions, for although the points thus neglected are usually of familiar principles, yet it is often convenient, especially for the younger members of the profession, to be able to find from the index, that certain principles have been recognised by the judges under whom they are practising.'

---

COVENTRY AND HUGHES' DIGEST.

This digest published in England in 1827, begins to appear in our libraries. This and Harrison's index include a complete series of legal reports down to Hilary term, 1829. The work of Coventry and Hughes is entitled 'An Analytical Digested Index to the Common Law Reports from the time of Henry III. to the Commencement of the reign of Geo. III. with tables of the Names and Titles of Laws.' The work is in two volumes of 1666 pages, and imported from England, costs twenty dollars or over. The compilers say, in their preface, 'To render the work more extensively useful, the whole of the modern matter to be found in the valuable notes to many of the reports, has been faithfully embodied, and references have also been made to cotemporaneous Reports in the Courts of Equity, and also to important recent decisions and statutes, showing the alterations which have been made in particular branches of law.'

These volumes include the following eightyseven sets of reports, namely:

Alleyn, Anderson, Andrews, Barnard, Barnadison, Barnes, Bendloe, Bailee and Dalison, W. Blackstone, J. Bridgman, Orl. Bridgman, Brownlowe, and Goldesborough, Bulstrode, Bunbury, Burrow, Burrow's Settlement Cases, Carter, Carthew, Cases Temt. Hardwicke, Cases of Practice in C.P., Clayton, Coke, Comberback, Comyns, Cooke, Croke, Cunningham, Davies, Dyer, Fitzgibbon, Foley, Fortescue, Foster, Freeman, Gilbert, Godbolt, Gouldsborough, Hardress, Hetley, Hobart, Holt, Hutton, Jenkins, Sir Th. Jones, Sir Wm. Jones, Keble, Keilwey, J. Kelyng, Sir Wm. Kelynge, Kenyon, Latch, Leonard, Levinz, Ley, Lilly, Littleton, Lutwyche, March, Modern, Moore, Noy, Owen, Palmer, Parker, Plowden, Pollexfen, Popham, Practical Cases in K. B., T. Raymond, Ld. Raymond Ridgeway, Rolle, Salkeld, Saunders, Saville, Sayer, Shower, Siderfin, Skinner, Strange, Styles, Vaughan, Ventris, Willes, Wilson, Winch, Year Books, Yelverton.—Jurist.

---

New Publications.

A Sermon on the Decease of Hon. Isaac Parker, Chief Justice of Massachusetts. By J. G. Palfrey, A. M.

MR PALFREY'S SERMON. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN, No. 141, Washington Street, a Sermon preached in Brattle Square Church, Boston, August 1st, 1830; the Lord's Day after the decease of the Hon. Isaac Parker, Chief Justice of Massachusetts. By J. G. Palfrey, A. M. Pastor of the Church in Brattle Square. Aug. 28.

PROPOSALS for publishing by subscription an ANALYTICAL DIGEST OF ALL THE AMERICAN REPORTS. By William Hilliard, Jr. Counsellor at Law. Revised by Benjamin Rand, Counsellor at Law.

The study of American Jurisprudence will always form an essential part of the education of every accomplished American Lawyer. And to the practitioner, as well as to the jurist, the decisions of the various Courts of Law and Equity in the United States, are daily becoming more important. The Jurisprudence of the several States, with a single exception, is founded upon the Common Law of England. On most subjects of general importance, there is a great similarity in the legislative enactments of the several States. And the judicial decisions of the Courts of the several States, are often cited and respected as authorities in the Courts of other States than those in which they were pronounced. The decisions upon local or statutory law, merely, are comparatively few, and even in these, from the similarity in the statutes and usages of the several States, precedents and analogies may be found, of general application. Few, perhaps, are aware of the number of volumes of American Reports, which now exceeds two hundred and fifty. It is believed that an Analytical Digest of these Reports, upon the plan of Mr Jeremy's consolidated Digest of the English Reports, is a desideratum. The advantages of such a digest, judiciously arranged, so as to bring into one view all the adjudications of all the Courts in the United States, upon each particular subject, will be duly appreciated by every practical lawyer. It is intended that the work shall contain all the reported cases to the time of publication, without any exceptions; and a Supplement containing the subsequent decisions will be published annually.

The work will be published with despatch.

The work will be printed on a beautiful small type, and good paper, and will be comprised in four or five volumes, (probably not exceeding four,) royal octavo size, each volume to contain about 1000 pages; and will be delivered to subscribers at $5 per volume, in good law sheep binding, which is a very low price for a law work embracing so great a quantity of matter.

After publication the price of the work will be raised to $6 per volume.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From Hon. Joseph Story, Judge of the Supreme Court of the U. S.; and Hon. Isaac Parker, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts.

The proposal of Mr Hilliard, to publish a uniform Digest of all the American Reports, upon the plan of the English Digest of Mr Jeremy, appears to me to be entitled to the patronage of the profession. No work of this kind, sufficiently accurate and extensive for general practice, at present exists. The want of one cannot but be felt by every lawyer, whose inquiries reach beyond the limits of the local law of his own State. Such a compilation, executed with the care, fidelity and ability, which so important a task demands, would be so highly useful, that it could scarcely fail of general approbation. As far as I have had the means of comprehending the plan of Mr Hilliard, from a personal communication with him, it appears to me entirely satisfactory. And the assistance and supervision of so distinguished a lawyer as Mr Rand, cannot but ensure an accuracy and completeness in the execution of the plan, correspondent with his just claims on the public confidence.

JOSEPH STORY.

I have no doubt the Digest proposed by Mr Hilliard will be highly useful, and that it will have a tendency to relieve the profession from the great labor of looking through hundreds of volumes, or of indices, to ascertain whether points sought for have been treated of and decided. I also feel assured that Mr Hilliard's professional acquirements, and assiduity in legal researches, qualify him to give such a book, under the revision proposed, all the usefulness which the plan itself suggests.

ISAAC PARKER.

PICKERING'S REPORTS, No. 1, Vol. 8th, this day published by HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. July 10.

GRAY & BOWEN have in press A DICTIONARY OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE; or, an Explanation of Words and Things connected with all the Arts and Sciences. Illustrated with numerous Wood Cuts. By George Crabb, A. M. Author of 'English Synonymes,' 'Technological Dictionary,' and 'Historical Dictionary.'

'This little volume contains definitions of all terms of art and science, with such additional explanations in some cases as serve to illustrate something more than the bare meaning of the word. It is drawn up with special regard to brevity, in order to comprehend within a convenient space all words on which the reader may wish for immediate information. Although so small in bulk, yet this book will be found to contain a vast number of words which are not to be met with in any other works whatever, the explanation of which is nevertheless highly necessary for those who are not in the constant habit of hearing them used in ordinary discourse. Of this description are the Latin phrases now adopted into our language, as "Sine quâ non," "Ne plus ultra," and the like. The historical essays on each science, which have been expressly composed for this Dictionary, serve to show the progress of the arts and sciences from the earliest periods to the present.'

The American edition will be carefully revised, and contain a large amount of new and valuable matter. It will extend to nearly four hundred 12mo pages, with about five hundred fine engravings executed on wood It will appear very soon. July 10.

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. Will shortly be published a Digest of Pickering's Reports by Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law, being a continuation of his Digest of Massachusetts Reports. It will be printed and bound to match that work. For further information apply to HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. July 10.

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of administering and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire: and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Price $1,25.

NOW PUBLISHING, BY CARTER & HENDEE, A Series of Scientific Tracts, designed for Instruction and Entertainment, and adapted to Schools, Lyceums and Families. Conducted by Josiah Holbrook and others.

The whole Series will contain simple and clear outlines of the various sciences, and their principal division, with their application to the common purposes of life.

Terms.—Not less than 24 numbers of a 12mo size, containing 24 pages each, will be published in a year, at $1,50, payable in advance. July 10.

CARTER AND HENDEE have in Press, SELF EDUCATION; or, The Means of Moral Progress, Translated from the French of M. Le Baron Degerando. To this work was awarded the honor of being 'crowned' by the French Academy; a distinction annually confered on one or two works, deemed the most useful that have been published during the year. And a late Review remarks; 'We have no ethical work of any living English writer to be compared with that of Degerando.'

View of the United States, for the use of Schools, with Maps and numerous Engravings.

Infant School Manual, or Teacher's Assistant. Second Edition. Enlarged and much improved.

Scrap Table, containing Original Anecdotes and Sketches.

Young Lady's Book, with 700 engravings on wood, of a superior quality, intended as an Annual for 1831.

The Youth's Keepsake, a Christmas and New Year's Offering for 1831.

A New Collection of Psalms and Hymns, for Public Worship. By Rev. F. W. P. Greenwood.

Common Place Book of American Poetry. By George B. Cheever.

THIS DAY PUBLISHED,— By GRAY & BOWEN, a second, and cheap edition of 'British Opinions on the Protecting System, being a Reply to Strictures on that System, which have appeared in several recent British Publications.' Reprinted with a few alterations from an article in the North American Review, for January, 1830.

NEW LAW BOOKS.— JOHN GRIGG, No. 9 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia, has just published the following valuable works.

CONDENSED REPORTS of CASES decided in the SUPREME COURT of the United States, from the organization of the Court at August term 1791, to January term 1828. Edited by Richard Peters, Counsellor at Law, and Reporter of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

This work is intended to contain the opinions of the Supreme Court, in the language of the Judges, in every case decided in that court from the establishment of the Government of the United States, to the commencement of Mr Peters's Reports at January term 1828. The reported decisions in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, upon similar points, are also collected and digested in the work, as notes; and abstracts of those Cases, and also of the collateral decisions of the Supreme Court are given, so that the Professional Gentleman and the Student will be in possession of all the adjudicated Law of all the Courts of the United States, in an authoritative, condensed, and arranged form.

The work will be contained in not more than six volumes; the first volume is now published; the second volume will be published about the 1st of August, and the balance of the work during the present year and 1831.

Those who wish to possess this work will do well to make an early application as the greatest portion of the edition is taken up by subscription. They are for sale by the principal Booksellers in the United States, with J. Griggs's other law publications.

Price six dollars to those who subscribe, and seven dollars to non-subscribers, payable on delivery of each volume.

PETERS' REPORTS.—Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Supreme Court of the United States, by Richard Peters, Esquire, Reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, 4 vols. royal 8vo.

FONBLANQUE'S Celebrated TREATISE ON EQUITY. A new edition, with considerable additions, from the last London edition, by a distinguished Member of the Philadelphia Bar, in 1 vol. royal 8vo.

CHITTY ON CONTRACTS. A new and Practical Treatise on the Law of Contracts not under Seal, and upon the usual Defences to Actions thereon, with Corrections and Additional References. By a member of the Massachusetts Bar, in 1 vol. 8vo.

SAUNDER'S REPORTS, in 3 vols. 8vo. The 4th American, from the 5th considerably enlarged London edition.

Say's Political Economy, new edition.

TOLLER'S LAW OF EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS. With notes and references to American Authorities, by E. D. Ingraham, Esq. new edition, in 1 vol. 8vo.

Sugden on the Law of Vendors in 1 vol. 8vo.

Jones on Bailments in 1 vol. 8vo.

CHANCERY REPORTS. JOHN GRIGG, has in press the Decisions of the English Chancery Reports, upon the plan which has been adopted and successfully executed with the 'English Common Law Reports.' The work will comprehend, in a condensed form, all the Reports which have not been republished in the United States; and it will be continued, so as to present to the profession, annually, the Chancery Reports as they shall hereafter appear in Great Britain.

The work will also contain references to the decisions of the chancery courts of the United States, and of the several states. July 10.

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. Complete sets of this work (thirty volumes in all) can now be had, on application to the Publishers, on liberal terms. The number and variety of the topics discussed in this work, and the high reputation it enjoys both in this country and Europe, render it a most valuable addition to the library of literary men. A General Index of the first twentyfive volumes has also been published, in a style to match with the current volumes of the work.

Subscribers and others whose sets may be deficient, can be supplied with the missing numbers. Subscriptions to commence at any period, received at $5 per annum. GRAY & BOWEN.

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1830. NO. VI.

MERCANTILE LAW.—No. II.

[Continued.]

For the sake of distinctness, we have all along supposed these various negotiations to be carried on immediately between the parties directly interested. It must, however, have been obvious that transactions so extensive between persons removed at great distances from each other, could not be managed either so conveniently or so beneficially without the intervention of some third party between the principals in the contract. To conclude bargains with advantage, it is necessary to be always on the spot, to catch the favorable turns in the market; while on the other hand the superintendence of a large establishment forbids the frequent absence of the proprietor. Again, in foreign trade it is desirable, if not indispensably requisite, to have agents resident abroad, to receive consignments of goods exported, to dispose of them advantageously for the owner, to purchase and ship off such foreign commodities as he may want in return, and to make and receive the necessary payments and remittances. It may readily be supposed, therefore, that mercantile agents have long constituted a separate and important class. These, under the general name of brokers, comprehend several distinct kinds. Those who are concerned in the sale and purchase of commodities, are either brokers specifically so termed, or factors. The former have not the possession of goods, but simply conclude the bargain in the name, and on the account of some other person. When the agreement for sale or purchase has been made, the broker gives to the seller a memorandum of the sale, to the buyer a memorandum of the purchase, and the delivery of these notes (which are called bought and sold notes) at once binds the bargain, and confers on the principal the same rights and liabilities, as if the transaction had been carried on by himself in person. Factors are contradistinguished from these, principally by having possession of the goods, and dealing with them as their own, and in their own names. They are persons specially appointed to receive and make consignments of goods, on account of merchants residing either in another country, or in some distant part of the same country. In the former case they are called foreign, in the latter home factors. The direct profit of brokers and factors consists generally in a commission of so much per cent, on the amount of their sales or purchases. Occasionally, however, they render themselves answerable to their principal for the credit of the person to whom the sales are made, and are then said to act under a commission of del credere or guarantee, in which case an additional premium is stipulated for in consideration of the self-imposed liability. In London the brokers are licensed by the lord mayor, who administers to them an oath, and takes a bond for the due performance of their office. In addition to these, there are ship and insurance brokers—a body of men engaged in the buying, selling, and chartering of ships, the procuring of freight, and the negotiating of insurances;—bill brokers, who undertake all transactions relating to the purchase or discounting of bills of exchange, whose business it is to be perfectly acquainted with the course and rate of exchange between different countries, and to facilitate the remittance of money beyond sea, by procuring in return for cash or otherwise, bills payable in the country to which the remittance is to be made;—and, lastly, there are stock and share brokers, employed, as the name imports, in the transfer of shares in the public funds, or the joint stock of a company.

We have more than once had occasion to mention the importance of capital in trade; indeed it may almost be said that the chance of profit increases in a geometric ratio to the amount of capital. It follows, therefore, that if two or more agree in investing each a particular sum in a common trade or adventure, the profit of each will be greater than if he had pursued it separately on his own individual account. Again, the management of an extensive establishment requires a combination of skill and attention; and as common sense points out that those who have a direct interest in the success of an undertaking will be more zealous in their endeavors, it seems a natural and obvious expedient to secure this union of efforts by a community of profit and loss. From these two considerations undoubtedly arose the practice of partnerships in trade; and so beneficial and even necessary has the system been found, that there are now few trading establishments of any magnitude in this country carried on by single individuals. A partnership, then, is a voluntary contract between two or more persons for joining together their money, goods, labor, skill, or all or either of them, upon an agreement that the gain or loss shall be divided proportionably among them. In general all the partners appear ostensibly to the world, and constitute what is called the house or firm. It is, however, by no means uncommon for monied capitalists to embark considerable sums in trade, without taking any part in the management of the concern, or suffering their names to appear. Such persons are called dormant or sleeping partners, and when discovered are liable in common with the rest to the creditors of the firm. There are also special partnerships formed for a single adventure, and the consequences and liabilities of these are confined to the transactions thence arising. The number of partners of course is regulated for the most part by the amount of capital, and the degree of active exertion required. Hence, when undertakings have been projected of such magnitude as to call for an extensive combination of means, large partnerships have been formed, under the name of companies, for the prosecution of the design. In this way it is that great public works, alike useful to the community, and profitable to the adventurers, have been planned and executed, not, as in other countries, by the act of government, but by the voluntary efforts of individuals. It is to these that we are indebted for our admirable canals, magnificent bridges, roads, docks, piers, and other monuments of the wealth and greatness of England. By companies lands have been colonized, dominions acquired, and commerce spread into the remotest corners of the earth. But we are warned to withdraw from a topic, on the advantages and abuses of which we could gladly dwell. It is time we should hasten to a close; and we shall therefore content ourselves with observing, that of these companies some are formed and regulated by deed entered into by the parties, and are in fact no other than extensive partnerships; and that others are incorporated either by act of parliament or royal charter. Of the former are most of the companies established for the working of mines, whether in England or abroad, or for other speculations of a like nature. As instances of the latter, it will be sufficient to mention the different dock companies, the Bank of England, and the East India Company. It would be impossible here to enumerate the details of management and the different privileges of each of these important bodies. Thus much, however, is common to all. The capital in all is divided into a certain number of shares, in general transferable, whereof each partner may hold one or more, up to a specified limit, and in all the management of the company's affairs is committed to a body of directors chosen periodically from the proprietors at large.

We have now completed the sketch which we promised of the progress and operations of trade; and though in a subject so comprehensive, much has necessarily been omitted, and much left imperfect, yet upon the whole, perhaps it will be found sufficient for the purpose which we have had in view, of conveying to the student a clear and accurate notion of the connexion and principles of the whole.

---

JOHN SELDEN.

If a reputation for learning be one of the most difficult to acquire, it is certainly the most easy to retain. Men are very well disposed to take on trust the merits of the most renowned in this respect; and thus, while the names of Selden and others are scarcely ever mentioned without some addition indicative of their vast acquirements, their works are to be found only in a few well-stored libraries slumbering beneath the accumulated dust that checks with reverential dread the approaches of the curious. 'The great dictator of learning,' as his contemporaries styled him, is perhaps more neglected than any of his compeers, on account of the uninteresting nature of his subjects and the terrific titles he has conferred on them. The 'History of Tithes' might be important as disproving the divine right of the clergy thereunto, at a time when those opinions were general, now peculiar to Sir Harcourt Lees and Mr Fletcher: the Titles of Honor may still instruct a herald or amuse a maiden lady of good family; but we should be at a loss to conceive how ponderous volumes of elaborate inquiry into all the antiquities of Syria and Palestine, and minute chronicles of the traditions, customs, laws and manners of the Hebrew nation, could ever please any number of readers, unless remembering that the days are not so long gone by when it was held as important to ascertain how beards were worn or nails cut in some country, in some century A. C., as to discover the deepest truths in morals or the soundest principles in legislation. The few works of Selden, too, that bear legal titles, are purely historical, and breathe only an antiquarian spirit. The student, who is anxious to learn the opinion of so celebrated a man from his 'Discourse,' touching the office of Lord Chancellor in England, feels disappointed at finding under that title a mere tracing of its existence from early Saxon times until the dignities of Lord Chancellor and Lord Keeper were united by statutes in the 28th Henry III. The tracts on testaments and intestates' goods, are framed on a similar principle, so that his services to future members of his profession may be summed up in his notes to Fleta, Fortescue, and Hengham. Yet Selden was a lawyer of the profoundest knowledge, and an advocate of the first ability; his speeches in parliament, and his vindication of the personal liberty of the subject, first clearly defined the bounds of royal prerogative on many points; and if, as Clarendon says, he was far more distinguished as a speaker than a writer, we may venture also to affirm, that, notwithstanding his entire devotion to literary labors, his life will be found far more instructive than his works. His biography has been undertaken by many hands, yet none seem to have clearly understood his character. He has been called by one party an infidel, a time-server, a bitter foe to church and king; by the other, a profound philosopher, a willing martyr. He was none of these. His chief characteristic was moderation; his sole defect was love of ease. But Selden's nature will be easily developed by referring to the chief events of his life.

John Selden was born at Terrington, in Sussex, at the end of the year 1585. He passed the common routine of education in those times at Oxford and the Temple. Learning alone, we may safely conclude, did not procure him in early youth the illustrious friendships of Cotton, Spelman, Camden, Usher, Drayton, and old Ben, but he appears throughout a prolonged life to have been a man of that happy moral constitution, whom to know was to admire and love. His History of Tithes first introduced him, at the age of 33, upon the perilous arena of public life, where a thousand symptoms told already of a fast coming and a fearful conflict. This result was probably neither expected nor desired by the author. There is an honest earnestness and mild simplicity in every page of this somewhat tedious work, that clearly indicates his object was to elicit truth rather than to provoke controversy. His after life demonstrated that he was in inmost heart a friend to the established church; and the vindicative malice of his antigonists only proves how completely that Romish spirit still prevailed in England, which recognized no difference between friend or foe when an unlicensed hand was stretched forth to strengthen or to shake the fabric of ecclesiastical dominion. That Selden recanted and made submission for his offensive publication before the high commissioners is certainly on record, but his repentance was expressed rather for publishing than holding such opinions; and we may in common charity believe that so gentle and amiable a person was grieved in very truth at having awakened so much ill-feeling in those critical times. Who can doubt the pure intentions of the writer, who reads the following extract from his preface, where he seems for a moment to escape from the trammels his idolatrous veneration for antiquity had cast around him, to catch a glimpse of the real and essential truth beyond the mists of prejudice and time, and to kindle with a more sound and profitable philosophy than he could gather from his Rabbins or his Eutychius. After contending for the right of the laity to give opinions on church matters, he goes on.

'If it be clear then, as I hope none hath the impudence to deny it, that neither the divine, nor civilian, nor canonist, by the course of their own appropreed studies, can come to what is necessary in the knowledge of the 'History of Tithes,' it will be as clear that none of them could challenge the meddling with it as a right especially belonging to any of their profession. But neither, indeed, is it proper to any one alone of those that are most commonly made professions. The truth is, both it and not a few other inquiries of subjects too much unknown, fall only under a far more general study; that is, of true philology, the only fit wife that could be found for the most learned of the gods. She being well attended in her ἐγκύκλια διακονήματα or daily services of inquiry by her two handmaids, curious diligence and watchful industry, discovers to us often from her raised tower of judgment many hidden truths that on the level of any one restrained profession can never be discerned. And every profession takes from her to itself, as was long since observed, some necessary part not elsewhere to be sought for, not much otherwise than as the subaltern sciences do from their superiors, or as they all do from that universality or first philosophy which is but the more real part of true philology and establishes principles to every faculty that could not of itself alone know how to get them.' v. 3. p. 1073. Ed. 1726. If philology, a term often applied to researches of little use into idioms and forms of construction, be here received in the extended sense the author means it, the ideas conveyed in this passage are still finer than the language that clothes them.

A dispute about a herring fishery first introduced Selden to the notice of king James I. He himself modestly attributes the favorable reception he experienced to the influence of the all powerful Buckingham, with whom Jonson had interceded in his behalf. But James was probably annoyed so much by the publication of the Mare Liberum of Grotius to vindicate the right of the Dutch and other nations to use the sea round Britain, that on hearing Selden had in part prepared a reply, he was willing to overlook his delinquencies on the tithe question, although he forbade peremptorily any further contention on the subject with Mountague, then engaged in confuting the 'History.' 'Quod confutationis futuræ puto non exiguæ per se confutationis instar fuit,' says Selden with some triumph, in his Vindiciæ. The Mare Clausum, such was the title of the vindication of our maritime dominion, was not, however, published for some years. It is characteristic of the meanness and weakness of James, that he took the author with him to his closet with the design of affixing his imprimatur to the work, when he paused suddenly, 'remembering,' as he said, 'that some things were therein spoken of the North Sea, which might, perhaps, displease his brother the King of Denmark, which he should be unwilling to do just now, when he already owed him a power of money and was shortly about to beg the loan of more.'

In 1621 Selden was employed by the commons, though not yet a member of that house, to draw up the famous protestation in favor of their liberties and privileges. For this offence he was imprisoned by the king. This short durance of five weeks would scarcely deserve notice, were it not that a letter still exists, sent in his excuse to Buckingham by Archbishop Williams, wherein the writer speaks of an inclosure, in Selden's hand, disavowing any disapprobation of that power and judicature lately usurped by the commons. Much outcry has been raised at this apparent tergiversation and poltroonery, but it must be remembered that he had drawn up the protestation as a hired advocate only, that he had not then intermeddled with political disputes, and may at least be supposed at that time to have adopted no decided opinions on the state of public affairs. When his attention was once turned to these matters, we shall see how resolutely he adopted the cause of the people. His quiet neutrality during the session that he sat in parliament for Lancaster, at once evinces his love of ease, and his then undecided state of feeling.

But the time at length came for his displaying to an admiring nation qualities hitherto concealed. The zealous patriotism that distinguished all his actions in the first parliaments of Charles the First, and the undaunted resolution that he manifested beneath the royal displeasure, must insure him the gratitude and admiration of all ages. In 1627 he defended in the most able and conclusive argument the cause of Sir Edward Hampden, one of the gentlemen imprisoned for refusing to submit to the imposition of forced loans. In 1628 he was employed by parliament to search their records previous to drawing up their four resolutions respecting the freedom of the person, and the necessity of their co-operation for imposing taxes on the subject. On the dissolution of 1629, he shared the imprisonment of those members whom the rash and most unfortunate Charles esteemed most seditious and refractory. Selden's conduct on this occasion marks it as the most brilliant epoch of his life. Inspired by the magnitude of the occasion, he seems for a time to have cast off his habitual love of ease, and by his dignified yet powerful remonstrances he confounded argument and silenced insolence, while, in refusing to accept of bail or to make any humiliating submissions to the judges whom he deemed unjust, he carried the spirit of uncompromising heroism even farther than any of his follow-sufferers. The cause of his final release after three years' imprisonment is most curious. It was effected by the Earls of Arundel and Pembroke, who, being involved in a dispute about the title to an enormous property, thought no other man in England capable of managing their cause. With his habitual love of literary labor, he had availed himself of the time spent in bondage to complete some of his most elaborate works.

Thus far the co-operation of Selden in deed and spirit with the cause of the people had been entire and unflinching, but the moderation and prudence of his character began to operate most powerfully, when he discerned the omnipotence of the parliament, and their intention to profit by it to the uttermost. He was not gifted with that far-seeing and untaught philosophy which might have revealed to him amid the terrors of an approaching civil war the magnitude of the ultimate good that posterity must derive from the contest, but as a shrewd and well judging man he perceived that a revolution must take place, that the foundations of government must be subverted, and he perhaps anticipated that a worse and more despotic system would arise from the ruins of the present. The lover of ease and order was of necessity averse to tumult; the temperate and benevolent politician thought that certain misery in fact was too dear a price to pay for an uncertain good in prospect. His hatred too of bigotry and puritanism, of which his Table Talk affords ample proof, had, perhaps, great influence on his conduct, when he saw how thoroughly the cause he had adopted was tainted with religious intolerance. In all this his head may be judged wrongly, but his heart was right. Selden might lag behind, but he did not desert his party; he might wish to prevent the downfall of royalty, but he accepted no favors from the court. He dedicated some learned works to Laud, because the archbishop was a patron of learning; he assisted in 1633 in getting up a masque for the entertainment of the court, because he loved the stage and loathed the sentiments of Prynne's Histriomastix; but he was still an inflexible and uncorrupted patriot.

The strongest act of Selden in opposition to the popular party was his vote against the attainder of Lord Strafford. That he should have sought to stay the punishment of that bold bad man may at first appear extraordinary. Mr Godwin, in recording this note, observes, with no very great liberality, 'Such after all is the best of lawyers.' We will go farther than the philosophic author of the History of the Commonwealth, and venture to affirm that Selden's conduct proceeded from what is generally complained of as the worst fault of lawyers—a high estimation of the value of precedent. But did he not vote rightly and most wisely? Strafford was a dangerous man, but he was arraigned under Edward the Third's famous Statute of Treasons, and he had committed no act that came within that statute; he was therefore arraigned unjustly. 'But,' say the pleaders for his punishment, 'his death was necessary, for his energy and wisdom might have insured the triumph of the royal party.' A strange opinion, as it seems to us, that the genius of any single individual can long check a revolution of which a people have and feel they have a need. But grant it for a moment true, and admit, that utility, not justice, should be the regulator of political conduct; it may be doubted whether the example of a House of Commons forcing the statutes to bear what interpretation might best suit them, in order to punish an obnoxious individual, was not fraught with more danger to the cause of liberty and happiness, than the suffering Strafford to exist. The house itself was well aware how frightful a precedent they had introduced by this act of attainder. They in consequence inserted a proviso, that 'no judge or other magistrate shall adjudge anything to be treason in any other manner than they would have adjudged if this act had never been made'—an admirable scheme, teaching future parliaments how to steal the steed, and lock the stable door in the same moment. Mr Godwin nevertheless would seem to think that this proviso neutralized all the dangers of the act. Yet only four years afterwards, Laud, in the extremity of age and weakness, was dragged forth to public execution under a similar bill, with a similar proviso tacked to it. Encouraged by this specimen of a secure method for quelling an enemy, the Commons now employed it to remove a powerless and imbecile old man, who, even granting him to have been (as some writers assert) a wretched compound of superstition, vanity and cruelty, should have been left like a fangless bloodhound to linger out the trifling remnant of his days, unregarded or despised.

[To be concluded.]

CHIEF JUSTICE PARKER.

Sketch of his character as an advocate and lawyer—by an eminent Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr Chief Justice Parker brought with him to the Bench the reputation of an able, active and learned advocate. He had well earned that reputation by a course of long and honorable practice in the then District, now State of Maine. His talents (high as they were,) were not his only recommendation. He possessed what talents may adorn, but what talents, however shining they may be, never can supply, the mens conscia recti, an inflexible integrity, a deep-rooted and enlightened virtue. His private life was without reproach, his honor without stain, his political and civil career straightforward and steady. His manners were frank, modest, and winning, without ostentation and without affectation. Nature had given him a mild temperament, a quiet and moderated cheerfulness, an ingenuous countenance, and social kindness, which pleased without effort, and was itself easily pleased. But his most striking characteristic was sound sense, which, though no science, is, in the affairs of human life, fairly worth all, and which had in him its usual accompaniments, discretion, patience, judgment. In his professional harangues he was persuasive and interesting; he had the earnestness of one, who felt the importance of fidelity to his client, and at the same time the sincerity of one, who felt the dignity of truth, and of that jurisprudence, whose servant he was, and whose precepts he was not at liberty to disown, and was incapable of betraying. In the sense sometimes affixed to the term, he did not possess eloquence, that is, he did not possess that vivid imagination which delights in poetical imagery, or in rhetorical flourishes, in painting the passions or in exciting them into action. He was not addicted to a rich and gorgeous diction, or to color his thoughts with the lights and shades, or the brilliant contrasts of a variegated style. But in a just sense, if we look to the means or the end, to his power of commanding attention, or his power of persuading, and convincing the understanding, he might be deemed truly eloquent. His reasonings were clear, forcible and exact; his language, chaste, pointed and select; his fluency of speech uncommon; his action animated; so that in their actual union they gave a charm to his arguments, which won upon the ears and captivated the judgment of his audience.

Such was the reputation and character, which he brought to the Bench. He took his seat among distinguished men; and he sustained himself as a worthy and equal associate. He did more, and accomplished what few men do accomplish; he moved on with a continual increase of reputation, even to the very hour of his death. He lived through times, happily now past, of peculiar delicacy and difficulty, in the midst of great political changes and excitements, when the tribunals of justice were scarcely free from the approaches of the spirit of discord, and the appeals of party were almost ready to silence the precepts of the Law. During this period, his firmness, moderation, patience, and candor secured to him the public confidence. When the office of Chief Justice became vacant by the lamented death of Mr Chief Justice Sewall, all eyes were turned towards him as the successor. His appointment gave universal satisfaction. And yet, if he had died at that period, half of his real merits would have remained unknown. His ambition was now roused to new exertions by the responsibility of the station; his mind assumed a new vigor; his industry quickened into superior watchfulness; and he expanded, so to say, to the full reach of his official duties. It was a critical moment in the progress of our jurisprudence. We wanted a cautious, but liberal mind, to aid the new growth of principles, to enlarge the old rules, to infuse a vital equity into the system as it was expanding before us. We wanted a mind to do in some good degree what Lord Mansfield had done in England, to breath into our common law an energy suited to the wants, the commercial interests and the enterprise of the age. We wanted a mind, which, with sufficient knowledge of the old law, was yet not a slave to its forms; which was bold enough to invigorate it with new principles, not from the desire of innovation, but the love of improvement. We wanted sobriety of judgment; but at the same time a free spirit, which should move over the still depths of our Law, and animate the whole mass. Such a man was Mr Chief Justice Parker. And whoever in this age, or in any future age, shall critically examine the decisions of the Supreme Court during the sixteen years, in which he presided over it, will readily acknowledge the truth of these remarks. There was in his mind an original intrinsic equity, a clear perception of abstract right and justice, and of the best mode of adapting it to the exigencies of the case. He felt, as Lord Ellenborough before him had felt, that the rules, not of evidence merely, but of all substantial law, must widen with the wants of society; that they must have flexibility, as well as strength; that they must accomplish the ends of justice, and not bury it beneath the pressure of their own weight. There is in this respect much, very much to admire, and, if it were possible in our reverence for the dead, to envy, in his judicial career. Few men have ever excelled him in the readiness of grasping a cause, of developing its merits, or of searching out its defects. He may have had less juridical learning than some men; but no man more thoroughly mastered all that was before him, or expounded with more felicity the reasons even of technical doctrines. He had an almost intuitive perception of the real principle pervading a whole class of cases, and would thread it through all their mazes with marvellous ability. His written opinions are full of sagacity, and juridical acuteness, at the same time that they possess a singular simplicity and ease. He rarely fails to convince, even when he questions what seems justified by authority. His judicial style is a fine model. It is equally remarkable for propriety of language, order of arrangement, neat and striking turns of expression, and a lucid current of reasoning, which flows on to the conclusion with a silent but almost irresistible force. In his more studied efforts, in some of those great causes, in which the whole powers of the human intellect are tasked and measured, he was always found equal to the occasion. There are not a few of his opinions on some of these intricate subjects, which would bear a close rivalry with the best in Westminster Hall in our own times. There are some, which any Judge might be proud to number among those destined to secure his own immortality.

But we must stop. The time for mourning over such a loss cannot soon pass away. We have lost a great magistrate, and an excellent citizen. Vain is the voice of sorrow, and vainer still the voice of eulogy. They cannot recal the past. His place cannot be easily supplied; for it is difficult to combine so many valuable qualities in a single character. To sum his up in one sentence, we may say, that, as a Judge, he was eminent for sagacity, acuteness, wisdom, impartiality and dignity; as a citizen for public spirit, and elevated consistency of conduct; as a man for generosity, gentleness, and moral purity. His fame must rest where it is fit it should; upon the printed Reports of his own decisions. These will go down to future ages; and though perhaps beyond the circle of the profession they may not attract much general observation, (for the misfortune of the profession is, that great Judges and great Lawyers cannot enjoy a wide-spread popular favor,) they will yet be read and honored by the jurists of succeeding times with undiminished reverence, when those of us, who have known and loved him, shall be mingled with the dust, that now gathers round his remains. They will often recal to the classical reader the beautiful eulogy of Cicero upon a great character of antiquity, so applicable to his. Erat in verborum splendore elegans, compositione aptus, facultate copiosus; eaque erat cum summo ingenio, tum exercitationibus maximis consecutus; rem complectebatur memoriter, dividebat acute, nec praetermittebat fere quidquam, quod esset in causâ, aut ad confirmandum aut ad refellendum.

ENGLISH CASES.

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT—MAY.

Tyler v. Drayton.

Mr Sidebottom was heard on the same side with Mr Horne and Mr Knight, for the defendent Drayton.

Mr Pepys appeared as Counsel on behalf of Mr Sergeant Wilde. Before he commenced his speech for the Learned Sergeant, he stated that the Learned Sergeant was desirous of being himself heard, together with his two Counsel, and wished his Honor to appoint a time for that purpose.

The Vice Chancellor said that it was contrary to the usual rules of the Court to permit a party to be heard as well by himself as by his Counsel. It would, therefore, be advisable either to permit Mr Sergeant Wilde to be heard alone or by his Counsel.

Mr Pepys then spoke on behalf of Mr Sergeant Wilde, and urged nearly the same points as had been touched upon by the Learned Counsel who had preceded him. With respect to Mr Sergeant Wilde's own case, the facts were clear and undisputed, that the Learned Sergeant had, previous to his being called to the bar, assigned all his interest in the business with Mr Knight to the latter gentleman for 6,000*l*. The Learned Sergeant, therefore, had no interest of any kind in the question, whatever he might formerly have had. The Learned Counsel, in the course of his speech, touched upon the agreement between Drayton and Jenkins in 1807 followed up by that of 1816, and contended that, under all the circumstances, there was no gross inadequacy of price—that it was a bona fide fair and open transaction, and could not now be impeached. The Learned counsel, at considerable length, detailed the different transactions in the case, and dwelt with much force upon the sale which had been made of a portion of the estate by Drayton and others, with respect to which it was not even pretended that there was any inadequacy of price. Upon the whole, he urged that the bill ought to be dismissed with costs.

Mr Jacob spoke at much length on the same side, and occupied the remainder of the day.

Mr Sergeant Wilde, just previous to the conclusion of Mr Jacob's speech, entered the Court, and, somewhat to the surprise of all present, took his seat between the Solicitor General and Mr Agar. When Mr Jacob had finished his address,

Mr Sergeant Wilde rose, and in a low tone of voice stated that, in consequence of what he had heard from his Learned Counsel, Mr Pepys, by whom his cause had been so ably advocated, he wished to address a few words to the Court. He was desirous, in the first place of setting himself right with the Court in one particular. He had always understood that every Barrister had a right to address the Court as well in his own behalf as on the part of others.

The Solicitor General was not anxious that the Learned Sergeant should be prevented from addressing the Court; indeed he was desirous that ample opportunity should be afforded to the defendants, and he should, therefore, offer no opposition.

The Vice-Chancellor then directed that Mr Sergeant Wilde should be heard on Tuesday next.

Tyler v. Drayton.

Mr Sergeant WILDE entered into a detail of the case at considerable length, and observed that he should have been unfeignedly proud to have attended at his Honor's bar upon any occasion but the present; but for any man to appear in his own cause—for an individual standing as he did at the bar, it was most peculiarly painful, and he trusted that it would be considered that nothing but a strong sense of duty would have compelled him to quit the interests of those clients committed to his care in the Court where he usually practised. He must in the outset beg to assure the Court that nothing was more distant from his mind in thus appearing than the supposition that the Learned Counsel appearing on the part of the defendants had not done everything that talent, ingenuity, zeal, and learning could have done—he was fully sensible of this; but, although he was so, he could not but think that those who were generally engaged in defending others could not, in the multiplicity of their avocations, be so well acquainted with all the circumstances as others might be, and that the man whose honor had been unjustly attacked should not be backward in defending himself. For that purpose it was (he was going to say) that he presented himself face to face with his opponent. Unfortunately, however, his opponent was not here. He (Mr Sergeant Wilde) was not brought before the Court upon the record. He was not here to advocate any pecuniary interest he might have at stake in this case, nor was it his intention to discuss any point relating to pecuniary questions; he had no doubt all such questions had been most ably and fully discussed by those much more acquainted with the technicalities of the Court on that subject than he was; but even if that had happened, which was not at all likely—namely, that there had been any omission—he should feel himself degraded, when he had so much deeper an interest at stake, in embarking in pecuniary questions. He could not find anything upon the face of the record that would justify him in intruding upon the Court and had it not been for the attack upon him he never would have done so. Where that attack had come from he could not say—whether from instructions or otherwise he could not tell; but certain he was they were not to be found upon the record. He never dreamt that he was more than a formal party; he had not the remotest conception that he should have to stand before the Court to defend the part which he had taken in the transactions. The record concealing from him that there were any imputations against him, he had now to approach it, not for the purpose of answering anything alleged there, but to answer that which had been said at the bar, which was not upon the record, and which was not warranted by anything in the case. He had no doubt that the Learned Solicitor General, in stating what he did, had acted under a strong impulse of duty. He knew of no feelings more likely to lead an honorable man into warmth of expression than those which an Advocate would feel in taking care not to sacrifice the interests of his clients. He did not expect forbearance where the client was to suffer, but he was sure the Solicitor General would never have stated what he did if all the facts of the case had been in his memory. Thus deceived in the shape of the record, scarcely having looked at the evidence in the case, never having seen his Counsel, or paid one moment's attention to it, he was surprised on his Counsel informing him that facts had been so misstated and so distorted; he could safely say the information of this was the most painful moment of his life. Upon this he ordered as correct a transcript of the speech of the Solicitor General to be procured as possible, and he there found that Learned Gentleman commenced, as he (Sergeant Wilde) would have expected by the known view he took of his case, by expressing his regret at the occurrences that had taken place in this case, and the parties connected with it, but making a covenant with himself that nothing should fall from him but a dry statement of facts. He (Sergeant Wilde) lamented that that course had been deviated from, for, in the very beginning of that Learned Gentleman's speech, he found sarcasm, invective, and declamation—everything but a plain, clear statement of the facts of the case. He did not mean to say that some of the circumstances that existed in the case had not been detailed, but the order of them had been so perverted, the facts so distorted, and the whole deriving such a coloring from the statements made, that it would have been impossible for any person really to have known what the case was. Under such circumstances he thought it necessary to appear before the Court. There was nothing here to show the Court that the individual whose estate was the subject of consideration was not as capable as any one to understand, and was perfectly aware of the nature of the transaction; nor was there anything to show that undue advantage had been taken of him. He (Sergeant Wilde) had never profited one shilling by this transaction, and never could. The transaction which had been the subject of consideration before the Court was one which took place in 1807, and which was again the subject of certain deeds and transactions in 1816; and the question was as to the capacity of Jenkins' mind to do what he had done, and as to whether he had been fairly treated in the course of these transactions. The Court would not fail to have observed that this was not the complaint of the individual who was interested in the transactions; it was not Griffith Jenkins that was now before the Court—not the soldier of whom the Court had heard so much: it was not the unfortunate wretch whom the Solicitor General had so much pitied and commented upon; it was not the unfortunate man who had suffered military punishment sooner than agree to the propositions of his unfeeling grandfather; it was not the alleged maniac that was upon this record; but it was his aunt—that aunt who had suffered him to be in that distress—that aunt who had permitted him to pass his life without that kindness and protection on her part which she ought to have bestowed towards him—that aunt who only feels for his misfortunes when she is a suitor in this Court, claiming his property. Griffith Jenkins, who was a young man of good education, had powerful friends, possessing property, influence, and information. The Solicitor General had designated him as the most unprotected and profligate of men. But by whom was he unprotected? Why, by those very individuals who ought to have afforded him protection. No complaint whatever came from Griffith Jenkins as to this transaction—not even a murmur comes from him. If he had felt dissatisfied with what had been done, all the Courts of England were open to hear the complaint, and the arm of Justice would have wielded her sword in his favor; but his whole life passed without his feeling that injury had been done him, by those who were brought before the Court upon the present occasion. The Solicitor General commenced by professing to give a history of the transaction; he (Mr Sergeant Wilde) had had much more experience in the profession than, perhaps, his appearance would bespeak, and he had never known a case, till the present, where the Counsel, having all the facts of the case before him, had kept the Court in the dark as to what the case really was; nay, more, had actually had the boldness to call upon his adversaries to say if he had exaggerated or omitted anything. (The Learned Sergeant here went into a long history of the case, the facts of which are before the public.) He could not but designate the whole of the Solicitor General's address, every iota of it, as being composed of sarcasm, satire, and intentional misrepresentation; it was libellous and slanderous from beginning to end. He (the Solicitor General) should recollect that he was dealing out poison that would be circulated through every part of the empire. It was true that, when he (Mr Sergeant Wilde) came into Court the other day, the Learned Solicitor General had done him the honor of extending his hand to him; but if only half of what that Learned Gentleman had been represented to have said of him was true, smarting as he was under attacks as unfounded as cruel, how could he consistently accept that hand? When, however, he found that he had done him justice—when the atonement he could make for the injuries he had inflicted had been made—he should be most happy to take that hand, which, till that period, he must refuse.

The Court was crowded to excess during the whole morning.

---

DIGEST OF RECENT ENGLISH REPORTS.

Hetherington v. Graham.

Adultery is a bar to dower, though the wife did not elope with the adulterer, but left her husband's house and lived apart from him by his consent, and afterwards lived in adultery. 6 Bing. 135.

Broad v. Pitt.

No communications made to an attorney are privileged, but such as are made for the purpose of the attorney's either commencing or defending a suit. 3 Carr & Payne, 518.

Rex v. Browne.

An indictment for perjury tried before the Lord Chief Justice, at Westminster, charged the perjury to have been committed on a trial at Nisi Prius, at the King's Bench sittings. The prosecutor, to prove the trial at Nisi Prius, put in the Nisi Prius record, with the minute of the verdict indorsed on it by the associate. There was no postea drawn up, and the associate stated that none could be drawn up, as a rule for a new trial was pending: Held, to be sufficient proof of the trial at Nisi Prius. 3 Carr & Payne, 572.

Kemble v. Farren

Where it appeared on the record, that an agreement sued on was made by the plaintiff on behalf of himself and the other proprietors of a theatre, evidence of the declarations of one of such proprietors was held admissible on the part of the defendant. 3 Carr & Payne, 623.

Affalo v. Fourdrinier.

A. & B. were sued on a bill of exchange accepted by them while in partnership. Before the action, B. became a bankrupt, and, upon his pleading his certificate in bar, the plaintiff entered a nolle prosequi as to him, and proceeded against A. alone. Held that B., having released his interest in the surplus of his effects, was a competent witness for A. 5 Bing. 306.

Jones v. Hunter

Parol evidence held to be inadmissible of the terms of partnership, of which a rough sketch had been made in writing by one of the partners, and shewn to and approved of by another, although it was intended subsequently to extend it into a formal deed, and that had not been done. 1 Danson & Loyd, 214.

Scott v. Beavan.

If a party be sued in England on a judgment recovered in Jamaica, the amount is to be estimated at the par of exchange between England and Jamaica, and the defendant is not entitled to deduct the premium which bills on England bear in Jamaica. 1 Danson & Loyd, 301.

Doe dem. Ambler v. Woodbridge,

Ejectment on a clause of forfeiture in a lease for breach of any of the covenants. The lease contained a covenant not to use the rooms for any other purpose, than as bed or sitting rooms. They were used for other purposes up to the time of the trial; but the lessor, after he knew of such improper using, had received rent. Held, that there was a continuing breach every day during the time the rooms were so used, and that, consequently, fresh acts of forfeiture had done away the effect of the waiver by receipt of rent. 6 Barn. & Cress. 376.

Mitchenson v. Begbie.

The plaintiff contracted by charterparty with A. to take in a cargo of wheat at 4*s.* 6*d.* per quarter. A. when the ship arrived, had no cargo ready, upon which the captain bargained with B. to take a cargo at 6*s.* a quarter; and signed bills of lading by which the wheat was to be delivered to the defendants or assigns, they paying freight at the larger rate: in these bills no reference was made to the charterparty. It did not appear whether the captain had made this bargain as agent of the plaintiff or of A., but a sub-charterparty was entered into between A. & B.; but the time at which it was executed was not proved. Held, that the plaintiff was only entitled to recover 4*s.* 6*d.* per quarter of the defendants. 6 Bing. 190.

Goring v. Edmonds.

The defendant had guaranteed the payment of the price of certain goods sold by the plaintiff to his (the defendant's) son. The plaintiff made several applications to the son, and more than a year after the time of payment received a bill which was dishonored, but never applied to the defendant for nearly two years after the time of payment, nor gave him notice of the dishonor of the bill, nor of the state of the account. Held that the defendant was notwithstanding liable. 6 Bing. 94.

[N. B. The defendant, when applied to, admitted his liability; but this circumstance, though observed upon by Tindal C. J. in his address to the jury, is not alluded to in the decision of the court.]

Newbury v. Armstrong.

The following guarantee: 'To Mr J. N. Sir,—I do hereby agree to bind myself to be security to you for J. C., late in the employ of J. B., for whatever you may entrust him with while in your employ to the amount of 50*l.* in case of any default to make the same good,' signed by the defendant—was held sufficient within the statute of frauds; and per Tindal C. J. 'It may fairly be implied, that J. C. had left one service, and that the guarantee was given in consideration of his being taken into another. We ought not to be too strict in the construction of these instruments; for if every agreement entered into by a tradesman be so minutely criticised, it will be necessary to resort to an attorney in the most common intercourse of life.' 6 Bing. 201.

Hargreave v. Smee.

The guarantee on which the case turned was as follows: 'Mr J. H. (the plaintiff) I do hereby guarantee the payment of goods to be delivered in umbrellas and parasols, to John and Edward Augustus Smee, at No. 38 Milk street, according to the custom of their trading with you, in the sum of 200*l.*' (signed by the defendant). The custom of their trade was found to be to make up monthly accounts. Held a continuing guarantee. 6 Bing. 244.

[It is worthy of remark that Park and Burrough, J. strongly reprobated the doctrine, laid down by Best, C. J. in Evans v. Whyle, 5 Bing. 485; that guarantees ought to receive a strict construction. Gaselee, J. had, as usual, 'great difficulty in deciding the case,' and was 'rather inclined to come to a different conclusion.']

Kay v. Groves.

Assumpsit on the following guarantee: 'I hereby agree to be answerable to Mr K. for the amount of five sacks of flour, to be delivered to T., payable in one month,' (signed and dated Nov. 18, 1828.) At the trial before Tindal, C. J., it was proved that on the 19th Nov. 1818, the plaintiff delivered five sacks to T.; on the 21st, five more; on the 24th T. sent back three and a half out of the first five; and three and a half other sacks were supplied to him that day. The C. J. left it to the jury to say, whether the delivery on the 24th was in substitution of any part of the delivery on the 19th, or whether it was made under a new contract. The defendant having paid into court the price of a sack and a half, the jury found for the defendant; and on an application for a new trial, the case was held to have been rightly left to the jury: Gaselee, J. observing, 'If the delivery on the 24th was at a month's credit, it does not correspond with the guarantee, which was for a month's credit from the 19th.' 6 Bing.

Bain v. Case.

In assumpsit on a policy of insurance, the jury ought not to allow the plaintiff interest, unless it be proved that he applied to the underwriters to settle the loss after it happened, and notified to them the ground of such application. Lloyd's list is evidence against the assured, if it be shewn that the broker read it before the policy was effected. 3 Carr. & Payne, 496.

Parry v. Aberdein.

Action on a policy on goods, containing the usual warranty of 'free from average unless general, or the ship be stranded.' The ship on her voyage was so much damaged by a storm, that the crew were obliged to desert her; upon hearing of which, the insured gave notice of abandonment. The ship, however, was towed into port by some fishermen, nearly the whole of her hull being under water; and the goods were so much damaged by water, that they would have been worth nothing at the port of destination. Held, that though the goods remained in specie and were sold for the benefit of the salvors for a small sum, the plaintiff was entitled to recover as for a total loss. 9 Barn. & Cres. 411.

Nelson v. Salvador.

Warranty to sail on or before a day certain, is not complied with by being ready to sail, and proceeding a short distance along the moorings; nor is strict performance dispensed with by an unavoidable necessity preventing it. 1 Danson & Lloyd, 219.

Hunter v. Leathley.

A broker who has effected an assurance as the agent of the assured, is bound to produce the policy on the trial of an action on it by the assured, though he have a lien upon it for premiums. 1 Danson & Lloyd, 226.

Harratt v. Wise.

A policy of insurance on goods to a foreign port, was effected after notice in the London Gazette, that that port was in a state of blockade. The ship having sailed before this notice, and been captured, with the goods on board, for the alleged breach of the blockade: Held, that the assured, having given notice of abandonment, might recover on the policy, unless it were shewn that the captain had notice of the blockade in the course of the voyage. 1 Danson & Lloyd, 234.

Winder v. Wise.

If a ship, having sailed for a blockaded port before public notification of the blockade in this country, receive at any time during her voyage, intelligence of the blockade, but nevertheless continue her voyage to the blockaded port, and be captured in an attempt to enter it, a policy of insurance on the ship or her cargo is discharged. 1 Danson & Lloyd, 238.

Naylor v. Taylor.

A policy of insurance on goods to a foreign port, effected after notice in the London Gazette, that that port was in a state of blockade, though the ship sail after such notice, is not illegal, if it be part of the agreement, that inquiry shall be made as to the continuance of the blockade. 1 Danson & Lloyd, 240.

MAINE.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Vol. 5, of Greenleaf's Reports contains the cases decided from May 1827, to April 1829.

Peters & al. vs. Foss.

Where one, having entered into lands not his own, submitted to the title of the true owner, with whom he made a verbal contract for the purchase of the lands; and afterwards mortgaged them to a stranger; it was held that the mortgage was no disseisin of the true owner, the possession not having been changed.

Hallowell vs. Saco.

The domicil is not affected by the forming of an intention to remove, unless such intention is carried into effect.

Richmond vs. Vassalborough.

In a question of domicil, evidence of the party's conduct afterwards as well as before, may be received to ascertain his intention on a particular day.

It is of no importance, in a question of domicil under Stat. 1821, ch. 122, whether the occupancy of the house in which the pauper dwelt was by right or by wrong.

Nason vs. Allen.

The right of a widow to have dower assigned in the lands of her husband cannot be taken in execution for her debt.

Thompson & al. vs. Prop'rs. Adr. Bridge.

A recovery in a writ of right does not affect any claim of the tenant to an easement in the land.

The grant of a saw-mill, 'with a convenient privilege to pile logs, boards and other lumber,' conveys only an easement in the land used for piling.

Green vs. Thompson.

If in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, before a justice of the peace, the defendant justifies under the plea of title in himself, and thereupon removes the cause, by recognizance, into the Court of Common Pleas, where he suffers judgment by default, before issue joined;—this judgment does not estop him from contesting the title of the same plaintiff, in a writ of entry subsequently brought for the land.

Allen vs. Sayward.

The covenant of lawful seisin in fee, and good right in the grantor to convey, does not operate to estop him from setting up an after-acquired title in himself, against the grantee.

Clement vs. Durgin.

In a prosecution by complaint against the owner of part of a mill-dam, for flowing lands, the owner of another part of the same dam, in severalty, is a competent witness for the respondent.

Where a commission issues to any judge or magistrate of another State, to take depositions in a cause pending in this Court, the official certificate of the judge or magistrate is received as prima facie evidence of his authority.

Howard vs. Chadbourne.

In an action brought by a mortgagee, against a stranger, to recover possession of the lands mortgaged, the fact that the demandant had assigned his interest to a third person, cannot be given in evidence under the general issue, but must be specially pleaded in bar.

In such a case, the mortgagor was admitted a competent witness for the mortgagee, the latter having released him from so much of the debt as should not be satisfied by the land mortgaged, and covenanted to resort to the land as the sole fund for payment of the debt. ib.

Reed vs. Jewer.

If a bill of sale absolute on its face, was in truth made for collateral security only;—or if the possession of a chattel remains in the vendor, after sale;—neither of these circumstances is conclusive evidence of fraud, per se; but is only a fact to be considered by the jury in determining the question of fraud.

Ross vs. Gould.

A deed, imperfectly executed by an attorney as the deed of his principal, is nevertheless admissible in evidence, in aid of the grantee's entry, to show the extent of his claim of title.

Though a deed may be read in evidence to the jury, after the preliminary proof by the subscribing witnesses, yet if the genuineness of the instrument is in controversy, the burden of proof is still on the party producing it, to satisfy the jury, beyond a reasonable doubt, that it is genuine.

Emery vs. Chase.

Where, in a deed, a valuable consideration is expressed to have been paid, parol evidence is not admissible to prove another and different consideration intended, or promised and not performed.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

SUPERIOR COURT OF JUDICATURE.

Vol. 4 contains the cases decided from January, 1827, to May, 1829.

Farrar vs. Farrar.

The cancelling of a deed does not revest property which has once passed under it by transmutation of possession.

But where a grantee has voluntarily, and without any misapprehension or mistake, consented to the destruction of the deed with a view to revest the title, he cannot be permitted to show by parol evidence the contents of the deed so destroyed, and in this way the destruction of a deed may have the effect of a reconveyance.

A mere agreement to cancel a deed without actually cancelling it, cannot, however, have this effect.

Morse vs. Shattuck.

When a consideration of money is expressed in a deed made for the purpose of conveying land, no averment can be admitted to the contrary for the purpose of defeating the conveyance.

But for the purpose of assessing the damages in an action of covenant broken on such a deed for the breach of the covenant of seisin, the true consideration may be shown by parol evidence, although a different consideration is expressed in the deed.

Colby vs. Kenniston.

J. K. in 1808 conveyed a tract of land to C. and in 1816 conveyed the same land to B. K. In a writ of entry against B. K., he having shown that there was no deed on record from C. to J. K., and that the latter had absconded and gone to parts unknown, was permitted to show by parol evidence the existence of a deed from C. to J. K.

He who takes a conveyance of land, knowing that another person has a previous conveyance by an unrecorded deed, is guilty of a fraud and cannot hold the land.

And where, in such a case, the first purchaser is in the open visible possession of the land, this is notice to all the world, that he has a deed.

Barker vs. Clark.

The owner of three closes, A B and C, had a way by which he used to pass between the closes A and B, through the close C; he afterwards conveyed the two closes A and B, with their appurtenances—it was held that the way through the close C, did not pass.

Hall vs. Hall.

Where a wife has committed adultery, a subsequent cohabitation with her by the husband, with a knowledge of her guilt, is a remission of the offence, and a bar to a divorce.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1830.

Harrison's Digest—is a continuation of Coventry and Hughes', and is entitled 'An Analytical Digest of all Reported Cases determined in the House of Lords, and several Courts of Common Law, both in bank and at Nisi Prius, and also the Crown Cases reserved from Michaelmas Term, 1756, to Hilary Term, 1829; including the manuscript cases from the best modern treatises, not otherwise reported;' in two volumes, 1775 pages; price, imported, from sixteen to twenty dollars. The last two hundred pages of the second volume consist of Addenda of cases reported during the time of the work's being in the press, and also of cases overlooked by the compiler and omitted in the previous part of the work; for the omission of which the magnitude of the undertaking, and press of business, are offered as an apology.

The following is a chronological list of the reports comprised in the Digest; the dates having reference to the reign; it will be recollected that the reign of Geo. III. commenced 1760, and that of Geo. IV. 1820.

In the House of Lords.

Brown's Reports to 40 Geo. III; Dow, 53 to 58 Geo. III; Bligh, 58 Geo. III. to 3 Geo. IV.

King's Bench.

Wilson, 16 to 26 Geo. II.
W. Blackstone, 20 Geo. II. to 10 Geo. III.
Burrow, 30 Geo. II. to 12 Geo. III.
Lofft, 12 to 14 Geo. III.
Cowper, 14 to 18 Geo. III.
Douglas, 18 to 21 Geo. III.
Term Reports, 25 to 40 Geo. III.
East, 40 to 53 Geo. III.
Maule and Selwyn, 53 to 57 Geo. III.
Barnewall and Alderson, 57 Geo. III. to 3 Geo. IV.
Barnewall and Creswell, from 3 Geo. IV.
Dowling and Ryland, from 3 Geo. IV.
Chitty.
Smith, 44 to 46 Geo. III.
Burrow's Settlement Cases.
Caldecott's Do.
Kenyon's Notes.
Nolan.

Common Pleas.

Wilson, 20 Geo. II. to 14 Geo. III.
W. Blackstone, 10 to 20 Geo. III.
H. Blackstone, 28 to 36 Geo. III.
Bosanquet and Puller, 36 to 44 Geo. III.
New Reports, 44 to 47 Geo. III.
Taunton, 47 to 59 Geo. III.
Marshall, 54 to 57 Geo. III.
Moore from 57 Geo. III.
Broderip and Bingham, 59 Geo. III. to 3 Geo. IV.
Bingham from 3 Geo. IV.

Exchequer.

Anstruther, 32 to 37 Geo. III.
Forrest, 41 Geo. III.
Wightwick, 50 and 51 Geo. III.
Price from 54 Geo. III.
M'Cleland and Younge, 5 to 7 Geo. IV.
Younge and Jervis, from 7 Geo. IV.
M'Cleland, 4 and 5 Geo. IV.

Nisi Prius.

Peake's R., 32 to 37 Geo. IV.
Espinasse, 33 to 47 Geo. III.
Campbell, 47 to 56 Geo. III.
Starkie, 54 Geo. III. to 4 Geo. IV.
Ryan and Moody, from 5 George IV.
Holt, 55 to 58 Geo. III.
Gow, 58 and 59 Geo. III.
Carrington and Payne from 3 Geo. IV.
Dowling and Ryland's N. P. Cases.

In the 'Addenda,' besides cases from some of the preceding reports, there are those from Manning and Ryland (abridged M. & R.) K. B.; Moody and Malkin (M. & M.) K. B. and C. P.; Moore and Payne (M. & P.) C. P. Burrell and Ryan's Crown Cases reserved (B. & R. C. C.;) Ryan and Moody's Crown Cases reserved (R. & M. C. C.)

Jurist.

---

Petersdorff's Abridgment.—The design of this work is to give a practical and elementary abridgment of the cases determined in the courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas, Exchequer and at Nisi Prius from the Restoration in 1660 to Michaelmas Term, 4 George 4th.—with important Mss. Cases. Such decisions are noted as have been affirmed, recognized, qualified or overruled. There are also copious notes and references to analogous adjudications, &c. The object is to give the material facts, pleadings, and judgments in the several cases reported as accurately and yet as concisely as possible. The general arrangement of Titles is alphabetical. But the cases in the subdivision of Titles are referred to chronologically to illustrate the gradual progress of settled principles. There are references also to the different Books in which the same case is reported—to the cases in which the same point has been determined or affirmed—to such cases or elementary writers as recognize or advert to the same rule or principle—to those cases which are at variance with the decision abridged or which have expressly overruled it. It is proposed to issue occasional Supplements to render the abridgment as complete a Substitute for the Reports as possible. Such a work is certainly a desideratum to those professional men, and they are many, who cannot have access to the full English Reports. We think the plan of this work much preferable to anything of the kind which we have seen, and so far as a very slight examination will enable us to judge, we should think it well executed. The following is an alphabetical List of the Reports Abridged: Andrews, Anstruther, Barnardiston, Barnes, Barnewell and Alderson, Barnewell and Cresswell, Bingham, Blackstone William, Bosanquet and Puller, Bosanquet and Puller, New Reports, Broderip and Bingham, Bunbury, Burrow, Burrows, S. C., Caldecott, Campbell, Carter, Carthew, Cases Practice, C. P., Cases Temp, Hardwicke, Chitty, Comberbach, Comyns, Cowper, Coke, Croke, Douglas, Dowling and Ryland, Durnford and East, Dyer, Dow, East, Espinasse, Fitzgibbon, Forrest, Foster, Fortescue, Gow, Hardress, Holt, Holt, N. P. C. Jones, Thomas, Jones, William, Keble, Kelying, Kenyon, Leach, Levinz, Lofft, Lutwyche, Marshall, Maule and Selwyn, Modern Reports, Moore, J. B, Nolan, Parker, Peake, Peere Williams, Pollexfed, Practical Register, Price, Raymond Thomas, Raymond, Ld. Salkeld, Reports, Sayer, Saunders, Sessions Cases, Shower, Siderfin, Skinner, Smith, Starkie, State Trials, Strange, Style, Taunton, Vaughan, Ventris, Wightwick, Wiles, Wilson.

The above work is to be found, where amid their great variety of valuable Books, pretty much everything else appertaining to the Law may be had, at Hilliard, Gray, & Co.'s who will supply any number of copies that may be wished. We can but think many of our worthy Brethren in the Country who complain of dull times, would find better business and more liberal fees if they were to call a little oftener upon our accommodating neighbors and replenish their scanty libraries, from their richly stored shelves. No man can be a good Lawyer without Books,—many cannot with. My Lord Coke, Blackstone, the Statutes, State Reports, and Complete Justice, have constituted the entire stock in trade of many a village Lawyer who has lived and died on bad terms with a world which could neglect genius and undervalue high professional attainments.

Few, if any, Lawyers, are made ultimately poorer by buying Books. It much more frequently happens that our intelligent community yields them back a treble recompense of reward.

---

AMOS AND FERAD'S LAW OF FIXTURES.

An American edition of this work has been recently published in New York, with notes of American cases, of which we shall probably speak more particularly hereafter. The subjects of the work are the right to remove fixtures; as to fixtures for trade, agricultural purposes, or ornament or convenience; as between landlord and tenant; as between tenant for life or in tail, or their personal representatives; in respect to ecclesiastical persons; and between heirs and executors; the rights and liabilities of parties in respect to land increased in value by the annexation of personal chattels; remedies, &c.

---

Mr Shaw has been, by an unanimous vote of the Executive Council, appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of this Commonwealth, and will immediately enter upon the duties of his office. He goes from a profitable and laborious practice to the Bench, with a firm constitution and with a perfect knowledge of the nature and extent of the duties which he has undertaken. He has a large space to fill in the public eye, and he will be a fortunate man and a remembered one, if he shall so bear his office—so administer the Law, and so dispense justice to his fellow-citizens, as worthily to sustain the high dignity of the Court over which he is called to preside. Thrice happy, if in himself he may but that 'Light relume,' which so lately and so long, from the place he now holds, shed its benign illumination over our happy Commonwealth.

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. This day published by HILLIARD, GRAY, & Co. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law: being a continuation of the Digest of Massachusetts Reports; and also a continuation of Metcalf's Digest of the same work. Neatly bound in Sheep, $3,50—Calf, $4,00.

NEW LAW BOOKS.—JOHN GRIGG, No. 9 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia, has just published the following valuable works.

CONDENSED REPORTS of CASES decided in the SUPREME COURT of the United States, from the organization of the Court at August term 1791, to January term 1828. Edited by Richard Peters, Counsellor at Law, and Reporter of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

This work is intended to contain the opinions of the Supreme Court, in the language of the Judges, in every case decided in that court from the establishment of the Government of the United States, to the commencement of Mr Peters's Reports at January term 1828. The reported decisions in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, upon similar points, are also collected and digested in the work, as notes; and abstracts of those Cases, and also of the collateral decisions of the Supreme Court are given, so that the Professional Gentleman and the Student will be in possession of all the adjudicated Law of all the Courts of the United States, in an authoritative, condensed, and arranged form.

The work will be contained in not more than six volumes; the first volume is now published; the second volume will be published about the 1st of August, and the balance of the work during the present year and 1831.

Those who wish to possess this work will do well to make an early application as the greatest portion of the edition is taken up by subscription. They are for sale by the principal Booksellers in the United States, with J. Griggs's other law publications.

Price six dollars to those who subscribe, and seven dollars to non-subscribers, payable on delivery of each volume.

PETERS' REPORTS.—Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Supreme Court of the United States, by Richard Peters, Esquire, Reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, 4 vols. royal 8vo.

FONBLANQUE'S Celebrated TREATISE ON EQUITY. A new edition, with considerable additions, from the last London edition, by a distinguished Member of the Philadelphia Bar, in 1 vol. royal 8vo.

CHITTY ON CONTRACTS. A new and Practical Treatise on the Law of Contracts not under Seal, and upon the usual Defences to Actions thereon, with Corrections and Additional References. By a member of the Massachusetts Bar, in 1 vol. 8vo.

SAUNDER'S REPORTS, in 3 vols. 8vo. The 4th American, from the 5th considerably enlarged London edition.

Say's Political Economy, new edition.

TOLLER'S LAW OF EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS. With notes and references to American Authorities, by E. D. Ingrah m, Esq. new edition, in 1 vol. 8vo.

Sugden on the Law of Vendors in 1 vol. 8vo.

Jones on Bailments in 1 vol. 8vo.

CHANCERY REPORTS. JOHN GRIGG, has in press the Decisions of the English Chancery Reports, upon the plan which has been adopted and successfully executed with the 'English Common Law Reports.' The work will comprehend, in a condensed form, all the Reports which have not been republished in the United States; and it will be continued, so as to present to the profession, annually, the Chancery Reports as they shall hereafter appear in Great Britain.

The work will also contain references to the decisions of the chancery courts of the United States, and of the several states.

---

GRAY & BOWEN have received by late arrivals the following valuable Foreign Books, which they will sell at low prices.

Dibdin's Library Companion, second edition, one large 8vo. vol.

Bowring's Poetry of the Magyars.

Moore's Byron. Splendid quarto edition.

Belzoni's Researches in Egypt and Nubia.

Description of the Ruins of an Ancient City in South America, with plates.

Memoires de M. De Bourrienne, 10 vols.

Histoire De France. Par M. Bignon, 4 vols.

Dictionnaire de Maximes. Par J. L. Malire, 1 vol.

Histoire du Congress de Vienne, 3 vols. 8vo.

Lafayette en Amerique, with Plates, 2 vols. 8vo.

The Works of Lope de Vega, 21 vols. quarto, fine edition.

Obras de Quevedo, 11 vols.

Don Quixotte, 5 vols.

Las Eroticas Villegas, 2 vols.

Trabajos de Persiles y Sigismunda, 2 vols.

Teatro Italiano Antico, 8 vols. July 10.

---

PROPOSALS for publishing by subscription an ANALYTICAL DIGEST OF ALL THE AMERICAN REPORTS. By WILLIAM HILLIARD, Jr. Counsellor at Law. Revised by BENJAMIN RAND, Counsellor at Law.

The study of American Jurisprudence will always form an essential part of the education of every accomplished American Lawyer. And to the practitioner, as well as to the jurist, the decisions of the various Courts of Law and Equity in the United States, are daily becoming more important. The Jurisprudence of the several States, with a single exception, is founded upon the Common Law of England. On most subjects of general importance, there is a great similarity in the legislative enactments of the several States. And the judicial decisions of the Courts of the several States, are often cited and respected as authorities in the Courts of other States than those in which they were pronounced. The decisions upon local or statutory law, merely, are comparatively few, and even in these, from the similarity in the statutes and usages of the several States, precedents and analogies may be found, of general application. Few, perhaps, are aware of the number of volumes of American Reports, which now exceeds two hundred and fifty. It is believed that an Analytical Digest of these Reports, upon the plan of Mr Jeremy's consolidated Digest of the English Reports, is a desideratum. The advantages of such a digest, judiciously arranged, so as to bring into one view all the adjudications of all the Courts in the United States, upon each particular subject, will be duly appreciated by every practical lawyer. It is intended that the work shall contain all the reported cases to the time of publication, without any exceptions; and a Supplement containing the subsequent decisions will be published annually.

The work will be published with despatch.

---

The work will be printed on a beautiful small type, and good paper, and will be comprised in four or five volumes, (probably not exceeding four,) royal octavo size, each volume to contain about 1000 pages; and will be delivered to subscribers at $5 per volume, in good law sheep binding, which is a very low price for a law work embracing so great a quantity of matter.

After publication the price of the work will be raised to $6 per volume.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From Hon. JOSEPH STORY, Judge of the Supreme Court of the U. S.; and Hon. ISAAC PARKER, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts.

The proposal of Mr Hilliard, to publish a uniform Digest of all the American Reports, upon the plan of the English Digest of Mr Jeremy, appears to me to be entitled to the patronage of the profession. No work of this kind, sufficiently accurate and extensive for general practice, at present exists. The want of one cannot but be felt by every lawyer, whose inquiries reach beyond the limits of the local law of his own State. Such a compilation, executed with the care, fidelity and ability, which so important a task demands, would be so highly useful, that it could scarcely fail of general approbation. As far as I have had the means of comprehending the plan of Mr Hilliard, from a personal communication with him, it appears to me entirely satisfactory. And the assistance and supervision of so distinguished a lawyer as Mr Rand, cannot but ensure an accuracy and completeness in the execution of the plan, correspondent with his just claims on the public confidence.

JOSEPH STORY.

---

I have no doubt the Digest proposed by Mr Hilliard will be highly useful, and that it will have a tendency to relieve the profession from the great labor of looking through hundreds of volumes, or of indices, to ascertain whether points sought for have been treated of and decided. I also feel assured that Mr Hilliard's professional acquirements, and assiduity in legal researches, qualify him to give such a book, under the revision proposed, all the usefulness which the plan suggests.

July 10. ISAAC PARK ER.

---

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of administering and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire: and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Price $1,25.

Aug. 20.

---

GRAY & BOWEN have in PRESS A DICTIONARY OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE; or, an Explanation of Words and Things connected with all the Arts and Sciences. Illustrated with numerous Wood Cuts. By GEORGE CRABB, A. M. Author of 'English Synonymes,' 'Technological Dictionary,' and 'Historical Dictionary.'

'This little volume contains definitions of all terms of art and science, with such additional explanations in some cases as serve to illustrate something more than the bare meaning of the word. It is drawn up with special regard to brevity, in order to comprehend within a convenient space all words on which the reader may wish for immediate information. Although so small in bulk, yet this book will be found to contain a vast number of words which are not to be met with in any other works whatever, the explanation of which is nevertheless highly necessary for those who are not in the constant habit of hearing them used in ordinary discourse. Of this description are the Latin phrases now adopted into our language, as "Sine quâ non," "Ne plus ultra," and the like. The historical essays on each science, which have been expressly composed for this Dictionary, serve to show the progress of the arts and sciences from the earliest periods to the present.'

The American edition will be carefully revised, and contain a large amount of new and valuable matter. It will extend to nearly four hundred 12mo pages, with about five hundred fine engravings executed on wood It will appear very soon July 10.

---

NOW PUBLISHING, BY CARTER & HENDEE, A SERIES OF SCIENTIFIC TRACTS, designed for Instruction and Entertainment, and adapted to Schools, Lyceums and Families. Conducted by Josiah Holbrook and others.

The whole Series will contain simple and clear outlines of the various sciences, and their principal division, with their application to the common purposes of life.

TERMS.—Not less than 24 numbers of a 12mo size, containing 24 pages each, will be published in a year, at $1,50, payable in advance. July 10.

---

CARTER AND HENDEE have in Press, SELF EDUCATION; or, THE MEANS OF MORAL PROGRESS, Translated from the French of M. Le Baron Degerando. To this work was awarded the honor of being 'crowned' by the French Academy; a distinction annually confered on one or two works, deemed the most useful that have been published during the year. And a late Review remarks; 'We have no ethical work of any living English writer to be compared with that of Degerando.'

VIEW OF THE UNITED STATES, for the use of Schools, with Maps and numerous Engravings.

INFANT SCHOOL MANUAL, or Teacher's Assistant. Second Edition. Enlarged and much improved.

SCRAP TABLE, containing Original Anecdotes and Sketches.

YOUNG LADY'S BOOK, with 700 engravings on wood, of a superior quality, intended as an Annual for 1831.

THE YOUTH'S KEEPSAKE, a Christmas and New Year's Offering for 1831.

A NEW COLLECTION OF PSALMS AND HYMNS, for Public Worship. By Rev. F. W. P. Greenwood.

---

THIS DAY PUBLISHED,—By GRAY & BOWEN, a second, and cheap edition of 'British Opinions on the Protecting System, being a Reply to Strictures on that System, which have appeared in several recent British Publications.' Reprinted with a few alterations from an article in the North American Review, for January, 1830.

---

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. Complete sets of this work (thirty volumes in all) can now be had, on application to the Publishers, on liberal terms. The number and variety of the topics discussed in this work, and the high reputation it enjoys both in this country and Europe, render it a most valuable addition to the library of literary men. A General Index of the first twentyfive volumes has also been published, in a style to match with the current volumes of the work.

Subscribers and others whose sets may be deficient, can be supplied with the missing numbers. Subscriptions to commence at any period, received at $5 per annum. GRAY & BOWEN.

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1830. NO. VII.

MERCANTILE LAW.

[Continued.]

NO. III.

Having now surveyed the nature and general properties of the principal transactions of trade, in their relations to each other, and their connexion with a whole, we proceed, as was proposed, to reconsider them in detail, with reference to those municipal regulations, by which they are severally modified, controlled, or enforced. Yet we cannot help pausing for a moment on the threshold, whilst we endeavor to impress on the mind of the student (for whose benefit these elementary dissertations are mainly intended) a few plain but important principles as to the object, business, and character of law in its application to the mutual dealings of men in their ordinary intercourse with each other. Nor let him despise as commonplace, what appears self-evident when enunciated; but let him remember that that is not a principle, which requires demonstration, and that to be simple and easy of apprehension is the universal character of truth. Indeed a little deeper reflection will teach him, that without a familiar acquaintance with the axioms, on which the system rests, he can neither justly appreciate it in theory, nor apply it correctly in practice.

Let it be borne in mind then, that there are certain rights of man in society, which are not created but merely protected by law. Such is the right of him, who, at the request of another, bestows his labor or the produce of it for his benefit, to receive from that other a compensation or equivalent in return. It is evident that this is a right which does not derive its force from any positive declaration of mere human authority, but springs at once from that state of equality in which men are placed, if not by nature, at least by the primary and constituent principle of society.

In England this equality of civil rights is fully recognized; and the business of law therefore, as applicable to these, is simply to give effect to natural justice by preserving or restoring that equality. This it endeavors to accomplish, either by way of prevention, imposing wholesome checks on the evil passions and selfish desires, which are continually tending to disturb it, or by way of remedy, compelling a compensation, when it has been disturbed. Redress of wrongs, adjustment of differences, correction of injustice, and other expressions of the like kind, are merely varieties of phrases signifying the restoring of equality. To give one simple illustration. A nobleman employs a coachmaker to build him a carriage; i. e. to bestow his labor and his goods for his benefit. Now, whatever may be the difference of rank and political privileges between the parties, there is none in respect of this particular transaction: they deal on a footing of perfect equality, and the nobleman must give in return a benefit equal to that which he receives. Suppose then, that, having obtained the carriage, he refuses to pay what it is worth; it is plain that the condition of equality is destroyed, and that one has an advantage over the other. The law therefore steps in to adjust the difference, and by compelling the payment, restores the equilibrium.

Law then, as regards the ordinary commerce of men, is a collection of rules, having for its object the maintaining of equality, or, what is the same thing in other words, fair dealing and justice. These rules at first are few, simple, and very general. But to adapt them to the infinite diversity of cases, which in the progress of society are continually arising, it is soon found necessary to qualify, limit, or extend them, until they branch off into a multitude of subordinate rules, severally applicable to particular classes of facts. Again, the application of a general rule to some particular case may sometimes militate against an established principle. The most important must then prevail; and hence examples of one rule not unfrequently become exceptions of another; and even with this continual multiplication of rules, accommodated as far as possible to the ever varying combinations of circumstances, such is the imperfection inherent in the very nature of legislation, that it is impossible for the most perfect code to be provided with a remedy, exactly appropriate to every case which may occur. But where law stops, equity begins; and tribunals are established in this, as in, every other highly civilized community, proceeding however not arbitrarily, but upon settled principles of conduct, for the purpose of supplying this deficiency, and enforcing that equity, which is beyond the reach of law.

With these preliminary observations we enter at once upon the more intermediate subject of our inquiry; and first in order comes the contract of sale with its incidents. But the slightest glance over our last article will shew that contracts of various kinds enter into every part of commercial dealing. It will therefore save much repetition, if we begin with a comprehensive view of the legal qualities of contracts in general.

The law of England leaves every one, who has the power of choice, at liberty to form whatever engagements he pleases, and for the most part requires the fulfilment of them, so long as they are not at variance with the general interests of society, or unfairly prejudicial to those of individuals. We do not say in all cases, because there are certain classes of persons, whose rights are not recognized by the law, and in whose behalf it refuses to interfere. Such are the subjects of a foreign state in an open hostility with our own, technically styled alien enemies; and such are persons outlawed, attainted of treason or felony. These, so long as the disqualification continues,* are disabled from suing in our courts, and consequently from compelling the performance of any engagement entered into with them, either before or subsequently. Yet this disability does not exempt them from liability to the claims of others; for it is apprehended that even an alien enemy, if amenable to the jurisdiction of the court, may be sued upon a contract, made before the commencement of hostilities.*

Civil engagements pervade the whole system of society,† but our present inquiry will be limited to those which have in view a direct interchange of commodities, money, or labor. These, which from their reciprocity have received the name of contracts, have been classified as follows: 1. Stipulations mutually to give: 2. Stipulations mutually to do or forbear to do: 3. Stipulations on the one part to give in consideration of something to be done or forborne, and on the other to do or forbear in consideration of something to be given.‡ Under these three heads all the various contracts, which come under the cognizance of municipal law, will be found to range themselves. Now these compacts may be formed, either by the express agreement of the parties, in which the terms are settled by mutual consent; or the benefit may be conferred by the one and enjoyed by the other, without any express stipulation for a return. In the latter case, the law, presuming that what reason and justice dictate was also intended by the parties, supplies the formal words of contract, and by an equitable fiction supposes the party benefited to have promised an adequate compensation. Thus, if I order a coat from my tailor, or he send me one home, and I choose to wear it, without any stipulation as to price, the law considers me as having undertaken to pay him whatever sum it is reasonably worth. But where there is an express agreement, it interferes no further than to require the performance of the contract, in the terms upon which it was concluded. These may be unequal; yet the law, wisely considering that the adjustment of equality may be safely left to the opposing interests of the parties,§ merely says, 'Fides est servanda.' 'You must do what you have stipulated to do, or render an equivalent.'‖ Thus con-

*In the case of an alien enemy, the disability does not attach if he come into this country under letters of safe conduct, or trade by license from the crown. It is removed also in his case by the cessation of hostilities, and in the case of outlawry and attainder by reversal and pardon.

* The invalidity of the contracts of alien enemies, made in time of war, does not arise, as is erroneously supposed, from any incapacity in them to contract, but from a notion that such agreements are contrary to public policy, a topic which belongs more properly to another division of our subject. Neither are persons outlawed or attainted, correctly speaking, incapable of contracting, but rather of deriving personal benefit from the contract.

† The Roman lawyers classed all the relations of civil society into obligations ex contractu, or ex quasi contractu. We are in general averse to definitions; but if we were disposed to define a contract, it would be thus: a mutual engagement, voluntarily and deliberately entered into, between two persons at least, to do something beneficial each for the other. One advantage of this definition, which we shall not stop either to justify or explain in detail, is the separation of the contract into two distinct engagements, whereof both may be void, or the one may be binding and the other not, according as both, or either, are wanting in some of the legal requisites.

‡ This classification is adopted from the civil law: 1. do ut des: 2. facio ut facias: 3. do ut facias: 4. facio ut des: the only alteration being that we have united the two last, of which one is evidently the converse of the other.

§ The maxim of the civil law is 'contractus legem ex conventione accipiunt.' Ours is still stronger: 'modus et conventio vincunt legem.' It must be recollected that the implied obligation in all cases gives way to the declared. 'Expressum facit cessare tacitum.'

‖ The common law of England exerts no authority to compel the specific performance of an agreement. It tracts are distinguished into express and implied, and both are equally obligatory in law.

It follows from what has been already said, that in every contract, whether express or implied, there must be an agreeing between two parties at least, and a reciprocity of benefit; i. e. something to be done on the one hand, and a consideration for doing it on the other. The subject, therefore, naturally divides itself into the act of agreeing, which includes of course the parties; the thing agreed, and the consideration.

But before we enter into the detailed investigation of each of these topics, it may be as well to premise, that agreements,* in form, may be made either by word of mouth, or by writing, or by the formal sealing and delivering of a written instrument, or by a solemn acknowledgment, made before a competent judicial tribunal, and placed upon record. The two first of these are classed under the same head, the only distinction, recognized by the common law, being between agreements by parol or simple contracts, which comprehend the two first, agreements under seal, technically called deeds or specialties, and agreements of record. It is evident that these are in an ascending scale of importance, in proportion to the solemnity of the undertaking. Out of this difference many important distinctions arise, of which the most material are the following: 1. That, whereas in every simple contract, with one exception, the consideration must be proved, in a deed or record, it is incontrovertibly presumed: 2. That a deed is binding on the heirs of the contractor if named, and a record on his lands; whereas a parol contract extends only to the personal property of the contractor, and binds only himself and his personal representatives.

It was said, that the law gives the liberty of forming engagements to all who have the power of choice. Freedom of choice, however, is essential to the validity of every engagement, and indeed is implied in the very notion of an agreement. Now choice is a combined exertion of the understanding and the will. It follows, therefore, that where there is in either party an incapacity to understand or to will, there can be no contract. Hence, by the law of England all, who from their birth have been destitute of reason, and all, in whom subsequent disease, or other causes, have produced either permanent or occasional derangement, are declared incapable of contracting. It has been customary to distinguish the two classes by the names of idiots and lunatics. And though the latter name belongs in strictness to those only who are visited by periodical and intermittent fits of insanity, it may still for convenience be retained, if its legal definition be sufficiently extended. Let it be understood, then, to embrace all cases of adventitious insanity, however induced, or however varied in its symptoms. For instance, a man may by continual drunkenness destroy his intellectual energies, and become incapable of judgment. Yet such a one, however culpable the origin of his malady, is still within the protection of the law, as a man of unsound mind, so that the engagements made by him during his continuance in that state are altogether void. There is one obvious distinction between the engagements of an idiot, and those of a lunatic, viz. that the former are always and from the first absolutely null; whereas those of the lunatic are avoided only upon an inquisition finding the fact of lunacy—inclusively, however, and by the relation to the time from which the incapacity of mind is found to have commenced.*

Not that the lunatic, even before the inquisition, can be compelled to perform an engagement stipulated during a period of insanity.

merely takes cognizance of the wrong done by the nonfulfilment of it, and calls upon the wrong doer to make good the loss, which may have been occasioned to the other party by his breach of good faith. In many cases, however, it is obviously desirable that the agreement should be literally performed in kind. Here, therefore, the courts of equity step in, and supply the defect of jurisdiction by decreeing and enforcing a specific performance. It may be worth remarking that the compensation assigned by the courts of Common Law, for all violations of contract, is a sum of money, not unaptly called the damages: money being selected as the most convenient measure for estimating the quantum of compensation We may also take this opportunity of noticing an inaccuracy (though not a very important one) of Blackstone on the subject of implied contracts. 'There is also,' he says, 'one species of implied contracts which runs through, and is annexed to, all other contracts, conditions, and covenants, viz., that if I fail in any part of the agreement, I shall pay the other party such damages, as he has sustained by such my neglect or refusal.' Com. vol. ii. p. 443. The learned commentator has evidently mistaken a remedial consequence annexed by the law, for an implied undertaking of the party.

* We are not unaware that the term agreement will be found employed in the course of this inquiry in two different senses, one as expressive of the act of agreeing, and the other of the whole effect and result of that agreeing: it is in this latter sense that it is frequently used to denote the instrument which attests the contract. This inaccuracy must be imputed to the imperfection of language, not the fault of the writer: for, however much we may regret it, it seems better on the whole to adhere to the customary modes of expression.

* The proposition is here broadly laid down, that the contracts of a lunatic are, without exception, absolutely void, from the period at which the inquisition finds the lunacy to have commenced; and the authorities in support of it, if authority were wanted in a matter so obvious, are, 1 Ch. Ca. 113. 2 Atk. 412. 2 Strange, 1104. 3 Camp. 126. A recent case may seem at first sight to be somewhat at variance; we apprehend, however, that a careful consideration of the principle of that case will show, that it forms no exception to the general rule. We allude to Baxter v. the Earl of Portsmouth, 5 Barnew. & Cress. 170. and more fully reported in Chitty, jun. on simple contracts, p. 256. The form of action was indeb. assump. The defendant during the period between 1818 and 1823, had hired carriages of the plaintiff, suitable, as was proved, to his rank, and had thereby incurred the bill which was subject of the action. For the defence an inquisition was put in, finding the defendant a lunatic from the 1st Jan. 1809 continually to the date, which was subsequent to the time of incurring the bill. The Ch. J. (Abbott) at the trial thought that the plaintiff was not barred of his action by this plea, the benefit having been actually received, and no fraud practised by him and the Court of King's Bench subsequently confirmed this opinion. Now the result it is impossible to quarrel with: it was what reason and equity pointed to: still it may be doubtful, whether the court did not rather usurp the jurisdiction of an equitable tribunal; and at all events the reasoning by which it arrived at its conclusion, appears to have been very questionable. The learned judges who gave their opinion, drew a distinction which, for the purpose to which it was applied in the argument, was irrelevant to the question; viz. whether the transaction were a fair one on the part of the tradesman or not. Now the principle of the rule as to the contracts of lunatics is not a presumption of fraud, but a deficiency in that which is essential to a contract, viz. assent of the understanding, and the rule itself is, not that the contract may be rendered void, but that it never was a contract at all. Their reasoning, therefore, ought rather, as it seems to us, to have been this: 'The plaintiff proved the letting of his carriages, and that the defendant made use of them. The presumption of law then applies, that the defendant undertook to pay for them what they were reasonably worth. The defendant, however, (or those who represent him,) proposes to set up a defence, which, if admissible, would overcome the presumption. But this would be against good faith and honesty, and he is therefore precluded, or estopped, from setting it up. To be sure, if fraud had been practised upon him, (for it is in this view that that question becomes material) we would have admitted it: but here there is no pretence of fraud.' It cannot be objected to this mode of reasoning, that the contract here was an express contract; because the plaintiff declared in indeb. assump. and relied, therefore on the implied promise in law. See an analogous case mentioned hereafter, where a husband is held liable for necessaries furnished to his wife after express notice.

JOHN SELDEN.

Concluded.

From the commencement of the revolution until his death the conduct of Selden was distinguished alike by moderation and integrity. It is remarkable that in 1642 he was esteemed to be so well affected toward the court then held at York, that Charles had thought of offering him the great seal, but was advised that there was no chance of his accepting it. Perhaps the motives of his refusal would have been no better than Clarendon suggests. 'He was in years,' says that historian, 'and of a tender constitution; he had for many years enjoyed his ease which he loved: he was rich, and would not have made a journey to York, or have lain out of his bed for any preferment, which he had never affected.' It is indeed much to be feared that his constitutional indolence did in those times too much limit his exertions; and we find that his good deeds were confined to redeeming the library of his friend Usher, or recovering the Arabic lectureship for Pocoke, in times when the weight of his character and the vigor of his eloquence might have gone far to moderate the extravagances or turn to best account the successes of the victorious party. The parliament, however, though he was too rich to need, and too disinterested to solicit remuneration, thought the name of Selden worthy to be numbered among those who in the year 1647 received large sums in reward of their past services. From this time he took little part in public life. Luckily for mankind he declined to answer the Icon Basilike, though requested by Cromwell to do so, and thus left it to the handling of a far mightier genius. His death did not take place until the mature age of 70, in the house of Elizabeth, countess of Kent, to whom many supposed that he was united in stricter bonds than those of friendship. His expressions on his death-bed of his own sinfulness and humble confidence in the atonement of Christ must utterly confute Hume and others, who have dared, without a shadow of proof, to stigmatise his name with infidelity. Perhaps Clarendon's short character was no exaggeration, 'that he was a person whom no character can flatter or transmit in any expressions equal to his merit and virtue;' but his memory was too great for his judgment, and his love of ease still stronger than his love of liberty. His works are nearly all too dull to open, unless for purposes of reference, with the exception of his Table-talk, from which we have ventured to cull the choicest apothegms for the entertainment of the reader.

'Bible.

'Scrutamini scripturas. These two words have undone the world. Because Christ spoke them to his disciples, therefore we must all, men, women, and children, read and interpret the scripture.' v. iii. p. 2009.

'Henry 8th made a law that all men might read the scriptures except servants, but no women, except ladies and gentlewomen, who had leisure and might ask somebody the meaning.' p. 2010.

'Bishops.

'The bishops being put out of the house, where will they lay the fault now. When the dog is beat out of the room, where will they lay the stink.' p. 2014.

'Books.

'The giving a bookseller the price of his books has this advantage. He that will do so shall have the refusal of whatsoever comes to his hand, and so by that means get many things, which otherwise he never should have seen.' p. 2015.

'Ceremony.

'Of all people ladies have no reason to cry down ceremony, for they take themselves slighted without it. And were they not used with ceremony, with compliments and addresses, with legs and kissing of hands, they were the pitifulest creatures in the world. But yet methinks to kiss their hands after their lips, as some do, is like little boys that after they eat the apple fall to the paring from the love they have to the apple.' p. 2017.

'Damnation.

'To preach long, loud, and damnation, is the way to be cried up. We love a man that damns us, and we run after him to save us. If a man had a sore leg, and he should go to an honest, judicious surgeon, and he should only bid him to keep it warm and anoint with such an oil (an oil well known) that would do the cure, haply he would not much regard him, because he knows the medicine beforehand an ordinary medicine. But if he should go to a surgeon that should tell him, Your leg will gangrene within three days, and it must be cut off, and you will die unless you do something that I could tell you, what listening there would be to this man. Oh, for the Lord's sake tell me what this is, and I will give you any content for your pains.' p. 2025.

'King.

'The king's calling his friends from the parliament because he had use of them at Oxford, is as if a man should have use of a little piece of wood, and he runs down into the cellar and takes the spigot; in the mean time all the beer runs about the house.' p. 2039.

'Libels.

'Though some make light of libels, yet you may see by them how the wind sets. As take a straw and throw it up in the air, you shall see by that which way the wind is, which you shall not see by casting up a stone. More solid things do not show the complexion of the times so much as ballads and libels. p. 2042.

'Marriage.

'Marriage is a desperate thing. The frogs of Esop were extream wise, they had a great mind to some water, but they would not leap into the well, because they could not get out again.' p. 2044.

'Peace.

'King James was pictured going easily down a pair of stairs, and upon every step there was written, peace, peace, peace. The wisest way for men in these times is to say nothing.' p. 2052.

'Power.

'They that govern most make least noise. You see when they row a barge, they that do drudgery work, slash, and puff, and sweat, but he that governs sits quietly at the stern and scarce is seen to stir.' p. 2057.

'Predestination.

'They that talk nothing but predestination, and will not proceed in the way of heaven till they be satisfied on that point, do as a man that would not come to London, unless at his first step he might set his foot on the top of Paul's.' p. 2062.

'Wife.

''Tis reason a man that will have a wife should be at the charge of her trinkets and pay all the scores she sets on him. He that will keep a monkey should pay for the glass he breaks.' p. 2028.

'Wisdom.

'Wise men say nothing in dangerous times. The lion you know called the sheep to ask her if his breath smelt. She said, Aye. He bit off her head for a fool. He called the wolf and asked him: he said, No. He tore him in pieces for a flatterer. At last he called the fox, and asked him: Truly he had got a cold, and could not smell.' p. 2078.

'Words.

'Words must be fitted to a man's mouth. It was well said of the fellow that was to make a speech for my lord-mayor, he desired to take measure of his lordship's mouth.'

ENGLISH CASES.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MAY.

Doe, on the Demise of Birtwhistle, v. Vardill.

This case came before the Judges today on a writ of error brought by the plaintiff.

The action, brought by the lessor of the plaintiff, John Birtwhistle, was an action of ejectment, in order to recover against the defendant, Agnes Vardill, possession of certain lands and tenements, with the appurtenances, within the several parishes of Carlton, Skipton, Long Preston, Gisborne, and Kirky Malhamdale, in the country of York, and was tried at the Lent Assizes, at York, in 1825, before Mr Justice Bayley, when a special verdict was returned for the defendant, of which the following is the substance:—

That William Birtwhistle, being seised in his life-time in his demesne as of fee, of and in one undivided part, the whole into three equal parts to be divided of the premises in question: that he died on the 12th of May, 1819, so seised, without leaving any issue of his body: that all his brothers had died in his life-time unmarried, and without issue, except Alexander, who married and had issue as hereafter mentioned: this Alexander Birtwhistle went from England to Scotland in the year 1790, and became domiciled there, and remained until his death: that one Mary Purdie and he cohabited together: that a son was born on the 15th of May, 1799: that on the 6th of May 1805, Alexander Birtwhistle and Mary Purdie were married, according to the laws of Scotland: and that on the 5th of February, 1810, Alexander Birtwhistle died in Scotland, leaving to his son John, who had from the time of his birth dwelt there, the lands and tenements of which the father was seised. The Jurors went on further to say 'that if a marriage of the mother of a child with the father of such child takes place in Scotland, such child born in Scotland before the marriage is equally legitimate, by the law of Scotland, with children born after marriage, for the purpose of taking land, and every other purpose.' They also found 'that John Birtwhistle, when he died did demise one undivided third part of the tenements mentioned in the declaration to his son.' The defendant, it appears, was in possession of the property at this time, and so continued to be. In other words, the verdict was in favor of the defendant, who was declared not guilty of the trespass.

In Easter Term, 1826, the special verdict came on for argument before the Court of King's Bench: the question for argument being, 'Whether the subsequent marriage in Scotland between the father and mother, both being domiciled there, of a child born to them in Scotland before such marriage, has the retrospect effect of legitimating that child, so as to qualify him to inherit lands in England, holden by the tenure of fee-simple? The Court unanimously held that such subsequent marriage did not legitimate such child, so as to enable him to inherit such lands in England, and directed judgment to be given for the defendant.

It was now contended, on behalf of the plaintiff in error, that when the fact of the marriage of the parents is ascertained—as it was by Jury in the present case—the law of Scotland takes no cognizance of the circumstance of a child having been born before or after the marriage, except in the case of a legal impediment to the marriage; that, by the law of Scotland, consent makes marriage; the ceremonies prescribed and observed are but matter of order; that the child was born 'ex justis nuptiis,' and was entitled to all the rights of lawful children, and, in that character, entitled to succeed to the real estate as his father's heir; that where the estate or matter of right exists in one country, and the facts which give the 'status' have taken place in another country, that is a question of international law, and depends not on the municipal rules of the country in which the point of right is tried; that, because, although it is a rule of the laws of nations that the 'lex loci rei sitæ' regulates the succession to real estate, yet when the fact by which that law determines the succession revolves into a 'questio status,' the Courts of the country where the real estate is situate are bound to assume the 'status' of the individual as matter of fact, upon such evidence of the law of the country where the birth, marriage, and domicil existed. It was further urged that the Statute of Merton (20th Hen. VIII. cap. 9), the title of which is, 'He is a bastard that is born before the marriage of his parents,' was not repugnant to the claim of succession made by the lessor of the plaintiff, and, at any rate presented no obstacle to the plea in law maintained by him; for, although there was reference in the Act to the right of inheriting, yet, from the title, the Statute had relation simply to the question of personal 'status.' But it was insisted that this Statute could only relate to persons who were situated under the law of England as to personal 'status.' In support of the view taken by the Learned Counsel for the plaintiff, the cases of 'Sheddan v. Patrick,' 'the Earl of Stralhousie v. Bowes,' and 'Gordon v. Gordon,' were cited.

In support of the writ of error, Mr Brougham and Dr Lushington were heard.

For the defendant, the Attorney-General and another Learned Gentleman appeared.

JUNE.

Doe, on the Demise of Birtwhistle, v. Vardill.

This case was again brought before the Judges today. It is a writ of error brought upon a judgment given in the Court of King's Bench, on a special verdict argued in Easter Term 1826, before the Judges of that Court; the question being, whether the subsequent marriage in Scotland, between the father and mother domiciled there, of a child born in Scotland before such marriage, had the retrospect effect of legitimating that child, so as to qualify him to inherit lands in England, holden by tenure of fee-simple? The opinion of the Court was, that the child so born could not inherit lands in England.

In the preceding case we give briefly the facts of the case, with the substance of the argument of Counsel on behalf of the plaintiff in error.

For the defendant in error, for whom the original verdict of the Jury was found, which was afterwards confirmed by the judgment of the Court below, the Attorney-General, and Mr F. Courtenay appeared.

The substance of the argument now used by those Learned Counsel may be thus stated—First, it was contended that, by the law of England, a child born out of marriage could not inherit lands in England: secondly, that the lex loci rei sitæ, in all cases of reality, governed the right of inheritance; thirdly, that legitimacy and the right to inherit feudal lands were very distinguishable from each other, and, accordingly, the former might exist, and frequently did exist, without the latter, legitimacy being a personal status; but the right to inherit lands being no status at all, but a real right, attached indeed to the person, but exclusively governed by the lex loci rei sitæ; fourthly, that no principle of Roman civil law was applicable to the discussion of feudal inheritance. Even in countries where the Roman law prevailed it was insisted that the right to feudal property was regulated exclusively by the feudal law; and the feudal law did not admit of that legitimation per subsequens matrimonium, upon which the plaintiff relied; and lastly, admitting, for the sake of argument, that the law of Scotland, legitimating ante nati, legitimated them, so as to make them capable of all feudal inheritance in Scotland, yet that legitimation, by the law of Scotland, must be confined to the inheritance of lands situate in Scotland, for one country could not legislate for another independent country.

In support of these arguments many cases were cited, and numerous authorities quoted.

After Mr Brougham had replied to the observations and arguments of the Learned Gentlemen who appeared for the defendant in error, judgment was deferred.

The Judges then retired.

---

KING'S BENCH.—APRIL.

Gell v. Waterhouse and others.

This was an action brought against the defendants, as common carriers, to recover damages for the loss of some watches sent by their coach from Coventry to Aberdeen. A verdict was had for the plaintiff, which Mr Denman applied to set aside, on the ground of misdirection on the part of the Lord Chief Baron, who tried the case at Warwick. It appeared that a notice was in the office of the defendants, stating that they were not to be held liable for any parcels in value over 5*l.* and the Learned Gentleman contended that this was sufficient notice, whereas the Learned Baron left it to the Jury generally whether the plaintiffs had sufficient notice.

The Court thought his Lordship had left the question properly to the Jury.—Rule refused.

---

PREROGATIVE COURT—JUNE.

Heddington v. Holloway.

This was a suit instituted to try the validity of a bequest made by Mrs Heddington, deceased, to a son of her husband's under these circumstances:—

Mr Holloway was a son of the husband of the deceased, who was in possession of a policy of insurance for 5,000*l.* She was also possessed of property to the amount of 10,000*l.*, which she left by will among her own and her husband's relatives, but in that will she made no mention of the policy of insurance. By a private will, however, she gave that to Mr Holloway, and placing the will in his possession, desired him not to produce it until after her death, and not to mention the circumstance to any one until then. Mr Holloway obeyed her instructions, but, instead of producing the will immediately after her death, he deferred it for a considerable time, and first mentioned it in a conversation with Mr Parnell, his solicitor, who was also solicitor for the parties interested under the other will; Mr Parnell thought the delay so suspicious that he felt bound to oppose the will relating to the policy; and thus the question came before the Court.

The Court at once decided that Mr Parnell's conduct was, under the circumstances, quite justifiable, though there could be no question but the will was an authentic document, and, as such, must be pronounced valid by the Court. At the same time, if Mr Holloway had at once produced the will, it was more than probable that Mr Parnell would have admitted it, and the present suit would never have been brought; therefore the Court adjudged that Mr Holloway must pay his own costs.

---

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Before the Chief Baron and a Common Jury.

Wedlake v. Hurly and another.

This was an action brought to recover from the defendants the sum of 103*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* received by them for the use of the plaintiff, under the following circumstances. The plaintiff is a coal-merchant residing in Monmouth; the defendants are merchants, residing in Great Winchester-street, in the city of London; both parties had dealings with a merchant named Goold, who resides in Cork. Goold gave a promissory note to the plaintiff in November last, payable on the 4th of January, at the house of the defendants. On that day he sent a Bank of Ireland Bill for 104*l.* payable in 20 days after to the defendants, endorsed by himself in these words:—'Pay this to Messrs Charles Hurly and Co., under provision for a note of mine to Thos. Wedlake, payable at their office.' The defendants received cash for the bill at the Bank of Ireland when it became due, and the plaintiff subsequently applied to them for the payment of the promissory note. The defendants refused to pay, acknowledging, at the same time, that they had received the bill on the Bank of Ireland for the purpose mentioned. These facts having been established by evidence.

Mr Sergeant Jones, for the defendants, observed that Goold was insolvent, and indebted to both parties; and the question was whether the plaintiff or the defendant should have the amount of the bill. He contended that the plaintiff should be nonsuited. When a remittance was made to a party with directions to apply it to a particular purpose, he (Sergeant Jones) admitted that the remitter could sue the party, to whom the money was remitted for any damage he should receive in consequence of his directions not being complied with; but he contended that the party to whom the money was directed to be paid could not bring an action against the receiver, as there was no privity between them. In support of this position he cited the case of Williams v. Everett, 4 East, page 597, which was directly in point; and the case of Gates v. Bell, 3 Barnewall and Alderson, 643, which was an action by the holder of a dishonored bill against a person to whom money had been remitted to take it up; wherein Lord Ellenborough nonsuited the plaintiff, on the authority of the preceding case, observing that as the defendant had repudiated the trust reposed in him by the remitter, there was no privity between him and the plaintiff.

Mr Maule, for the plaintiff, observed that there were authorities both ways, but the better way would be to take a verdict for the plaintiff, with liberty for the defendant to set it aside, and have a nonsuit entered, as that course would prevent the necessity of a second trial.

The Chief Baron observed that he should rather act as Lord Ellenborough had done, which was to nonsuit the plaintiff, with liberty to move to have the nonsuit set aside, and a verdict entered for the amount of his claim.

The plaintiff was accordingly nonsuited, with liberty to move to have a verdict entered.

---

DIGEST OF RECENT ENGLISH CASES.

Naylor v. Taylor.

Where a ship, having insured goods on board, was captured for an alleged breach of blockade, and afterwards rescued by the British crew, who brought her back, with the goods, into an English port, and after receiving information of the capture, but before the return of the ship and before hearing of her rescue, the assured gave notice of abandonment: Held that they were not entitled to recover on the policy as for a total loss. 1 Danson & Lloyd, 240.

Page v. Newman.

The plaintiff and defendant being prisoners in France, the plaintiff lent the defendant 135*l.*, and received the following instrument, properly dated and signed, as his security. 'In one month after my arrival in England, I promise to pay W. E. P (the plaintiff) or order the sum of 135*l.* as sterling for value received: Held that the plaintiff was not entitled to interest although several years had elapsed since the defendant had arrived in England and been applied to for payment. 9 Barn. & Cress. 378.

Laing v. Stone.

A bill or note payable on a day certain, carries interest from that day, unless the non-payment has been occasioned by the negligence of the holder. 2 Man. & Ryl. 561.

Hawkins v. Sherman.

Where a person agrees to take an assignment of a lease of a house, which is out of repair, subject to the performance of all the covenants of the lease, from the day of the assignment, the assignor cannot recover against such assignee, sums which he is compelled to pay the original lessor for dilapidations that occurred before the assignment. 3 Carr. & Payne, 459.

[Quære, If B. assign the lease of a house to A. by deed, subject to certain covenants, and A. take possession, whether B.'s remedy for a breach of the covenants is by an action of covenant, though A. never executed the deed?]

Doe dem, Wheelder v. Paul.

In ejectment to recover demised premises for non-payment of rent, under the usual proviso for re-entry on non-payment for twentyone days, it appeared that the rent was payable quarterly, and that a demand of more than one quarter's rent was made on the 21st day at one o'clock:—Held, that only one quarter's rent should have been demanded, and that at sunset. 3 Carr. & Payne 613.

Pierse v. Shaw.

B. holding land of A. for a term of years, underlets part to C. from year to year. At the expiration of the term B. agrees with A. to hold from month to month: in the absence of any new agreement between B. and C. the tenancy from year to year continues. 2 Man. & Ryl. 418.

Doe dem. Elliott v. Hulme.

Where joint lessors are partners in trade, a notice to quit in the name of all, signed by one only is valid. 2 Man. & Ryl. 433.

Vessey v. Pike.

In an action for libel, the defendant cannot, under the general issue, give evidence of any fact in mitigation of damages, which would be evidence to prove a justification of any part of the libel. He ought to justify as to that part. 3 Carr. & Payne, 512.

Saunders v. Mills.

Assuming editors of newspapers to possess the right of publishing proceedings in courts of justice, the report must be fairly given; and a report of a trial containing the ex parte statement of the plaintiff's counsel and those parts of the judge's address to the jury which were unfavorable to the defendant, and omitting all but a few sentences of the defence, is not a privileged report. Park J. instancing the cases in which blasphemous or indecent statements may be made, said 'he could not accede to the position that a party is excused for publishing every proceeding in a court of justice, even though he publish it fairly.' Tindal C. J. who tried the cause, admitted evidence that the report was copied in substance from another paper, but, there being no justification on record, refused to admit evidence that any other paper had published the same statement. Held that he acted rightly in both respects. 6 Bing. 213.

MAINE.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Vol. 5, of Greenleaf's Reports contains the cases decided from May 1827, to April 1829.

Stanley v. Perley.

In a writ of entry it is competent for the tenant, under the general issue, to disprove the seisin of the demandant, as alleged in the writ, by showing that his grantor had, previous to the time stated in the writ, conveyed the title to a third person; even though the tenant does not claim under such grantee.

Chandler v. Morton.

The rule that a party to a negotiable note shall not be admitted as a witness to prove it usurious, extends to the maker of an accommodation note; and is applied even where the note had been delivered up to the real debtor, on his giving a recognisance to the creditor for the amount. And its application is not restricted to the case of an innocent indorsee; but is admitted where the usurer himself is a party.

Gardiner Manuf. Co. v. Heald.

If a written instrument, purporting to be a deed of partition, is signed by the parties, but not sealed, yet it is not therefore to be treated as a nullity, so far as to admit parol testimony to contradict it.

Soule's case.

In an indictment against a husband, for an assault and battery upon the wife, she is a competent witness against him.

Lathrop vs. Muzzy.

A judgment debtor, whose goods have been seized and sold on execution, does not stand in the relation of vendor to the purchaser. And therefore, not being liable on any implied warranty, he is a competent witness in any suit between other persons respecting the goods.

Cutts v. King.

Since the passage of Stat. 1826, ch. 344, a verdict and judgment in favor of the tenant, upon the general issue, in a writ of entry, will not always be evidence of title in him; for the statute having declared that such plea shall not be taken as an admission of the tenant's seisin and possession of the land, it may be that he prevailed because he was not proved to be in possession.

Linscott v. Fernald and al.

Where the course first given in a deed of conveyance was north 69 degrees west, fortysix rods, and thence to a certain range-line, and by that line, and other courses and monuments, to the beginning; and this description was intelligible, and unambiguous, agreeing with all the monuments given:—the grantor was not permitted to prove by parol that the first course actually run by the surveyor, at the time of the conveyance, was south 69 degrees west, which would equally well agree with all the other courses and monuments in the deed; and that the surveyor, who also wrote the deed, inserted north instead of south, by mistake.

Steward v. Allen.

If a creditor extend his execution on land mortgaged for more than its value, he not in fact knowing the existence of the mortgage, though it had been long on record; he may have an alias execution, and satisfaction out of other estate of the debtor; the case being within the meaning of Stat. 1823, ch. 210.

Emerson v. Towle.

The time of returning into the clerk's office an execution extended on land, is not material, if it has been recorded in the registry of deeds within three months after the extent.

Gardiner Manuf. Co. v. Heald.

If an execution be issued against an absent defendant, without the previous filing of a bond, pursuant to the statute, it cannot be avoided collaterally, but is good till superseded.

Moore v. Smith.

In an action against an executor, under Stat. 1821, ch. 51, sec. 11, to recover the penalty there provided for not filing a will in the probate office, it is not competent for the executor to prove that the will was revoked, this being a question exclusively of probate jurisdiction.

Ring v. Burton.

The provisions of Stat. 1821, ch. 51, sec. 28, apply to the cases where the creditor had already recovered his judgment against the administrator, before the estate was represented insolvent, as well as to those where the action was then pending, or is afterwards commenced.

It seems that the allowance of further time to settle an administration account, under the hand and seal of the Judge of Probate, ought to be made before the expiration of the six months mentioned in Stat. 1821, ch. 51, sec. 28; and that if a still further time be granted, the order should issue before the end of the term first allowed;—sed quære.

Stearns v. Burnham.

An executor, appointed under the laws of another State, cannot indorse a promissory note payable to his testator by a citizen of this State, so as to give the indorsee a right of action here in his own name.

And this objection, though in disability of the plaintiff, may be taken under the general issue, in an action by the indorsee against the maker of the note.

Heald v. Heald.

Whether an administrator, who is also an heir at law, is chargable as administrator for the rents of real estate in his own occupancy, without some contract express or implied,—quære.

Stanley v. Perley.

The title of an attaching creditor to the land afterwards taken by extent, is not affected by any knowledge which the officer may have had of the existence of a prior conveyance of the same land, made by the debtor to another person; even though such knowledge may have been communicated to the creditor himself, after the attachment, and before the extent.

Foss v. Stickney.

Where an execution has been extended on two or more parcels of land, the debtor is not entitled to redeem one of them alone, without the others, even though its value is separately stated in the certificate of the appraisers.

Where a judgment debtor, whose land has been taken by extent, having tendered the money within the year, brings his writ of entry for the land, pursuant to Stat. 1821, ch. 60, sec. 30, it is sufficient that the money be produced and lodged in court at any time before the rendition of judgment.

Little v. Lathrop.

Where there is no prescription, agreement, or assignment under the statute, whereby the owner of land is bound to maintain a fence, no occupant is obliged to fence against an adjoining close; but in such case, there being no fence, each owner is bound at his peril to keep his cattle on his own close.

Where a tenant is bound by prescription, agreement or assignment under the statute, to maintain a fence against an adjoining close, it is only against such cattle as are rightfully on that close;—and in such case, if the fence be not in fact made, the owner of either close, thus adjoining, may distrain the cattle escaping from the adjoining close, and not rightfully there.

The Stat. 1821, ch. 128, sec. 6, respecting fences and impounding, is merely in affirmance of the common law.

Whether to leave wild lands unfenced, be not an implied licence for all cattle to traverse and browse them,—quære.

Fisk and al. v. Weston.

If the trustee in a foreign attachment disclose an assignment of the debt to a third person, who thereupon is made a party to the suit, pursuant to the Stat. 1821, ch. 61;—the trustee is bound by the result of the ulterior litigation in that suit between the creditor and the assignee, in the same manner as they are, though he had no agency in making up the issue.

Gorham vs. Canton.

Upon a question of domicil, the declarations of the party whose home is in controversy, made at the time of his going or returning, may be received as evidence of his intention.

Crockett and al. v. Ross and ux.

A feme sole being summoned as trustee in a foreign attachment, took husband pendente lite, and afterwards disclosed, and was adjudged trustee. On scire facias brought against the husband and wife, to have execution de bonis propriis, they pleaded that at the time when &c, she had no goods, effects or credits of the principal in her hands; and on general demurrer the plea was held bad.

Sherwood v. Marwick,

The cases in which the court will determine the question of fraud, as an inference of law, the facts being clearly proved or admitted, are those of sale, in which the rights of creditors are concerned, under Stat. 13, and 27. Eliz. or of sales with intent to defraud creditors, at common law. In other cases of alleged fraud, the imputed intent and scienter are subjects for the consideration of the jury.

Clement v. Durgin.

The right to flow the lands of another, in order to raise water sufficient to carry a mill, subject to the claim of the owner for damages, is given, by necessary implication, in the statute regulating mills, and therefore needs not to be proved by writing, under the statute of frauds.

The damages occasioned by such flowing may be waived or relinquished by parol.

Dearborn v. Parks.

Where one undertakes to pay the debt of another, and by the same act also pays his own debt, which was the motive of the promise; this is not such an undertaking to pay the debt of another as is within the statute of frauds, and therefore it is not necessary that it should be in writing.

Though the consideration of such promise was land, yet the party to whom the debt was to be paid may recover the amount in an action for money had and received.

Bishop v. Little.

Where one, upon giving a deed of release and quitclaim, stipulated by parol that if the deed did not pass and secure the land to the grantee, he would make it good;—this was taken as a promise to convey a legal and perfect title to the land, and therefore as void, by the statute of frauds.

A parol renewal of such promise, within six years, creates no legal obligation.

---

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

SUPERIOR COURT OF JUDICATURE.

Vol. 4 contains the cases decided from January, 1827, to May, 1829

Pritchard vs. Brown.

An acknowledgment in a deed of conveyance, that the consideration money has been paid, cannot be contradicted for the purpose of defeating the conveyance, but for any other purpose, it may be contradicted like any other receipt.

Where a consideration of money is expressed in a deed of conveyance, the land will pass by way of bargain and sale, although there is only one subscribing witness to the instrument.

Crane vs. Thurston.

M. and his wife were seized in fee of land in her right, and having agreed to separate and live apart, M. conveyed all his interest in the land to L. the father of his wife, in trust, for the wife; and by indentures made at the same time between M. L. and the wife, M. covenanted that the wife might enjoy and absolutely dispose of the property she had to her separate use—it was held that the deed of L. and the wife, living the husband, was sufficient to pass a fee in the land.

M'Afee vs. Gilmore.

D. M. by his last will devised to his wife one third part of his real estate, and the use and improvement of the other two thirds till his daughters S. and M. should severally arrive at the age of eighteen years, in case his said wife should support, clothe, and educate the said two daughters. He then devised the said two thirds to his said daughters, in equal shares, when they should severally arrive at the age of eighteen years. The testator died April 3, 1809. The oldest of the two daughters died in August, 1809, aged about four years.

It was held—that the devise of 'two thirds of the real estate,' was sufficient to pass a fee without other words; that the daughters took a vested estate of inheritance at the death of their father, as tenants in common, by virtue of the will; and that the share of the deceased daughter belonged to her mother, as sole heir.

Mills vs. Stark.

A owned a close adjoining a highway and B owned another close adjoining the same highway, and opposite the close of A. A's cattle strayed from his said close, through defects in his fence, into the highway, and thence into the close of B, through defect of B's fence—it was held that B might lawfully take the cattle as a distress for the damage they had done.

Clindenin vs. Allen.

When a defendant dies, and it is decreed by the judge of probate, that his estate shall be administered in the insolvent course, the suit is to be discontinued.

Hamilton vs. Elliot.

Where the tenant in a writ of entry has disclaimed all the title to the demanded premises, both he and his subsequent assignees will be ever afterwards estopped to set up against the demandant and his subsequent assignees any claim to the land, which the tenant may have had at the time of the disclaimer.

And an agreement, made subsequently to the disclaimer by the demandant, to purchase all the right of the tenant in the land, will not set the estoppel at large.

Nelson vs. Swett.

When a defendant enrols the summons left with him in the service of a writ, and it appears by that, he was cited to appear at a different time and place from those where the writ was returnable, he is not estopped by the sheriff's return to allege what thus appears upon the record.

Pritchard vs. Atkinson.

Where a road was laid out over the land of A, in 1796, by the selectmen of the town where the land was; but the return of the road by the selectmen made no mention of any compensation allowed to A. for the road—it was held to be competent for the jury to infer from the circumstances, that the road was made in 1796, and constantly used for seventeen years from that time, as a highway, with the knowledge of A. and without any objection on his part, that he had agreed to dedicate the land to the public, and to permit the road to be made and used without receiving any compensation.

Robinson vs. Bachelder.

In assumpsit upon a written contract to deliver specific articles at a particular time and place, the defendant may show under a general issue that he had the articles ready at the time and place, and that no one came to receive them and this is a good answer to the action.

And a defendant in such a case may show under the general issue that the plaintiff accepted part of the articles before the day, and this will be a good defence pro tanto.

And farther the defendant may show in such a case that subsequently to the making of such contract a parol agreement was made between the parties that the articles should be delivered at a different place and a tender at such different place will discharge the contract.

But where in such a case the defendant left the articles at the place, in the custody of a person who was authorized to deliver them only in case the plaintiff produced and gave up the written contract, it was held that the articles were not ready at the time and place so as to discharge the contract.

Ela vs. Rand.

Where an attorney is party to a suit, depositions taken in a distant county by the opposite party while the court is sitting in the county where the attorney resides, will not be rejected unless it be shown that the party taking the depositions knew that the court would be sitting at the time.

When a party to a suit dies, no depositions can be taken by the opposite party, until the executor or administrator of the party deceased becomes a party to the suit upon the record.

Shepherd vs. Thompson.

The declarations of deceased persons, as to the boundaries of lands, are not admissible when it appears that they had, from their situation, an interest to make the declarations.

When depositions are taken abroad in another State, it must be shown to the court that the person by whom the depositions were taken, was a person duly qualified, before the same can be admitted as evidence.

Where the evidence of a party went to the jury in depositions intermixed with testimony, which was incompetent, and which the court had ordered to be erased, but which was not erased, this was held to be a legal cause for a new trial.

A notice to the adverse party of the taking of depositions under a dedimus ought to state not only the day, but the hour, when they will be taken.

Ross v. Knight.

A delivered to B in payment of a debt a promissory note made by C. Afterwards A paid to B the amount of the note and took and passed it to D. In an action on the note by D against C, it was held that the delarations of A that the note was an accommodation note, were not evidence for the defendant.

Barnard v. Edwards.

Where a right of dower accrued to a widow in 1797, but she neglected to make any claim of dower until the year 1826, such neglect was held to be competent evidence to be submitted to a jury as proof of a release of the right, although she married again in 1798, and remaining a feme covert during the residue of the time, and had resided out of the State during the whole time.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1830.

Paine and Duer's Practice.—The first volume of this work has been recently published, and in some of our Periodicals favorably noticed. It is a Book of more than 600 pages. The object of it is to explain the 'Practice in civil actions and proceedings at Law in the State of New York, in the Supreme Court, and other Courts of the State, and also in the Courts of the United States.'

Much of the matter is necessarily local and uninteresting to Gentlemen of the profession practising in other States. There are some portions of it, however, which are of general interest, particularly the Chapter on the United States Courts. The Chapter upon 'Actions' also will be found not altogether inapplicable to the Practice of most of the States. We have heretofore had no Books of Practice in this Country, and in New England especially, and those States whose institutions resemble hers; but little aid has been, or could be derived from the various treatises upon this subject which have appeared in England. The proceedings of the Courts are altogether dissimilar. Indeed any young Lawyer, who should attempt to get an action at Law through our Courts by the help of Tidd or Sellon, would find himself sadly disappointed and mortified. The Practice of our Courts is one of the most difficult and one of the last things the young Lawyer learns. And the reason is he can go nowhere to learn it. It is to be picked up by degrees in a daily attendance upon the Courts. It is besides ever varying as new systems of judicature are introduced, new legislative Acts passed, or new Judges take the places which age, death, or other causes have made vacant. It is so much so, indeed, that the venerable Practitioner who has been forty years at his post, watching his return, motion and judgment days, to whom the whole routine of the business of the Court is as familiar as the way to his office, if he happen to be a few months from his place, feels, on his return, not quite certain that he is rectus in curia, or that he moves their Honors in manner and form or at the right point of time. Nobody has ever undertaken to make Books of Practice for the different States, because, in the first place, of the difficulty of executing such a work satisfactorily—and in the second place, because every State must have its own work, and of course the sale must be extremely limited, and Book makers, we know, although they are often wofully disappointed, generally have an eye at the profits.

If indeed every Lawyer in the State should buy a copy, the avails would hardly pay the expenses of the Publication of a work which should be adapted, as it necessarily must be to the practice under a single local jurisdiction.

The volume of Messrs Paine and Duer, before us, seems to be well executed. When completed we should think this work could not fail to be valuable to the members of the New York Bar. If there exist any exception to our remark upon the want of encouragement to the compilers of such Treatises it is found in the State of New York, which already numbers about 1700 Lawyers.

Mr Paine is not altogether unknown to the Profession as an author. He was for many years the partner in business with Mr Wheaton, the late United States Reporter. And he has long enjoyed the reputation in the City of New York of an industrious, correct and sound Lawyer. He is a graduate of Harvard College, and the son of one of the most efficient, enterprising and intelligent men in Vermont, the Hon. Elijah Paine, District Judge of the United States for that District.

The table of contents of this volume is as follows:

PART I.

Of Civil Actions, &c.

Ch. I. Of Actions. Sec. 1. of personal actions. 2. of suits relating to real property. 3. of scire facias. 4. of remedies at law which are not called actions. 5. When actions are transitory or local, and when they die with the person or survive. 6. of the parties to actions. 7. of mistakes in the form of action, and the election and joinder of actions. 8. of the time limited for the commencment of actions.

Ch. II. Of the Supreme Court, including the Circuit Court of the State and Attorneys and other officers; and of the prosecution and defence of actions in person or by attorney. Sec. 1. of the supreme court. 2. of attorneys and counsellors. 3. of the prosecution and defence of actions by attorney or otherwise. 4. of sheriffs and coroners.

Ch. III. Of the Court of Errors.

Ch. IV. Of Courts of Limited Jurisdiction. Sec. 1. of the superior court of New York. 2. of the country courts of common pleas. 3. of mayors' courts in cities.

Ch. V. Of the Courts of the United States. Sec. 1. of the district courts of the United States. 2. of the circuit courts of the United States for the southern districts of New York. 3. of the superior court of the United States.

PART II.

Of the practice of the Supreme Court in the principal and direct proceedings to judgment in personal actions brought for the recovery of any debt or for damages only.

Ch. I. Of the modes of commencing personal actions. Sec. 1. of the original writ and process thereon. 2. of the commencment of actions by a capias and respondendum.

Ch. II. Of the proceedings after issuing the capias until the defendant's appearance. Sec. 1. of the arrest and service of the writ. 2. When the defendant may be held to bail. 3. of bail to the sheriff, or bail below. 4. of the return of the writ by the sheriff, and his duty thereon.

Ch. III. Of the defendant's appearance. Sec. 1. of common appearances and notices of retainer. 2. of special bail.

Ch. IV. Of the declaration. Sec. 1. of the parts and requisites of the declaration. 2. of the filing and service of the declaration.

Ch. V. Of Pleas and the subsequent pleadings, and of Demurrers.

Ch. VI. Of the issue.

Ch. VII. Of the proceedings from issue in trial. Sec. 1. of the circuit roll. 2. of notice of trial and inquest, of countermanding the same, and of preventing inquest and putting off trial. 3. of the venire for foreign jurors, and the mode in which they are drawn and summoned. 4. of the evidence and the witnesses, and the mode of compelling their appearance.

Ch. VIII. Of the trial and its incidents. Sec. 1. of pleas puis darrein continuance. 2. of drawing jurymen, of talesmen, and of challenges. 3. of proceedings before the jury; swearing and examining witnesses, demurrers to evidence, bills of exceptions, and non-suits. 4. of verdicts general and special, and of the conduct and duties of the jurors. 5. of the portion and rule for judgment. 6. of the damages.

Ch. IX. Of final costs. Sec. 1. of the general rules awarding, regulating, and limiting costs. 2. of the taxation of costs.

Ch. X. Of amendments.

Ch. XI. Of judgment by confession. Sec. 1. of warrants of attorney and entering judgment thereon. 2. of cognovit.

Ch. XII. Of judgment by default and the assessment of damages thereon. Sec. 1. of the default. 2. of the assessment of damages by the clerk. 3. of the assessment of damages in a court of inquiry.

Ch. XIII. Of discontinuance, nolle prosequi, retraxit, and cassetur billa vel breve.

Ch. XIV. Of judgment by default of the plaintiff. Sec. 1. of judgment of non pros. 2. of judgment as in case of non suit.

---

Letters patent have passed the Great Seal of Ireland, constituting and appointing John Leslie Foster, Esq. LL. D., to be one of the Barons of his Majesty's Court of Exchequer, in the room of James M'Clelland, Esq. resigned.—Dublin Evening Mail.

Mr Horne, of the Chancery Bar has been appointed Attorney General, and Mr J. Williams, M. P., Solicitor General to her Majesty.

New Publications.

Condensed Reports of Cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, containing the whole series of the Decisions of the Court, from its organization to the commencement of Peters's Reports, at January term, 1827, with copious notes of parallel cases in the Supreme and Circuit Courts of the United States. Edited by Richard Peters, Counsellor at Law, and Reporter of decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. Vol 2. From February term, 1807, to February term, 1813, inclusive.

The Patentee's Manual—containing a list of Patents granted by the United States, for the encouragement of Arts and Sciences, alphabetically arranged, from 1790 to 1830, (to be continued by supplements.) Also, the Laws of Congress for granting Patents, with a digest for all the decisions which have taken place in the courts of the U. States respecting Patents. By William Elliott.

---

DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS, TO WIT: District Clerk's Office.

BE it remembered, that on the seventeenth day of August, A. D. 1830, in the fiftyfifth year of the Independence of the United States of America, Lewis Bigelow of the said district, has deposited in this office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as proprietor in the words following, to wit:

'A Digest of Pickering's Reports, volumes II.—VII., being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law.'

In conformity to the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned;' and also to an act entitled, 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled, 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned,' and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints.'

JNO. W. DAVIS, { Clerk of the District of Massachusetts.

---

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. This day published by HILLIARD, GRAY, & Co. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law: being a continuation of the Digest of Massachusetts Reports; and also a continuation of Metcalf's Digest of the same work. Neatly bound in Sheep, $3,50—Calf, $4,00.

PROPOSALS for publishing by subscription an ANALYTICAL DIGEST OF ALL THE AMERICAN REPORTS. By WILLIAM HILLIARD, Jr. Counsellor at Law. Revised by BENJAMIN RAND, Counsellor at Law.

The study of American Jurisprudence will always form an essential part of the education of every accomplished American Lawyer. And to the practitioner, as well as to the jurist, the decisions of the various Courts of Law and Equity in the United States, are daily becoming more important. The Jurisprudence of the several States, with a single exception, is founded upon the Common Law of England. On most subjects of general importance, there is a great similarity in the legislative enactments of the several States. And the judicial decisions of the Courts of the several States, are often cited and respected as authorities in the Courts of other States than those in which they were pronounced. The decisions upon local or statutory law, merely, are comparatively few, and even in these, from the similarity in the statutes and usages of the several States, precedents and analogies may be found, of general application. Few, perhaps, are aware of the number of volumes of American Reports, which now exceeds two hundred and fifty. It is believed that an Analytical Digest of these Reports, upon the plan of Mr Jeremy's consolidated Digest of the English Reports, is a desideratum. The advantages of such a digest, judiciously arranged, so as to bring into one view all the adjudications of all the Courts in the United States, upon each particular subject, will be duly appreciated by every practical lawyer. It is intended that the work shall contain all the reported cases to the time of publication, without any exceptions; and a Supplement containing the subsequent decisions will be published annually.

The work will be published with despatch.

---

The work will be printed on a beautiful small type, and good paper, and will be comprised in four or five volumes, (probably not exceeding four,) royal octavo size, each volume to contain about 1000 pages; and will be delivered to subscribers at $5 per volume, in good law sheep binding, which is a very low price for a law work embracing so great a quantity of matter.

After publication the price of the work will be raised to $6 per volume.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From Hon. JOSEPH STORY, Judge of the Supreme Court of the U. S.; and Hon. ISAAC PARKER, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts.

The proposal of Mr Hilliard, to publish a uniform Digest of all the American Reports, upon the plan of the English Digest of Mr Jeremy, appears to me to be entitled to the patronage of the profession. No work of this kind, sufficiently accurate and extensive for general practice, at present exists. The want of one cannot but be felt by every lawyer, whose inquiries reach beyond the limits of the local law of his own State. Such a compilation, executed with the care, fidelity and ability, which so important a task demands, would be so highly useful, that it could scarcely fail of general approbation. As far as I have had the means of comprehending the plan of Mr Hilliard, from a personal communication with him, it appears to me entirely satisfactory. And the assistance and supervision of so distinguished a lawyer as Mr Rand, cannot but ensure an accuracy and completeness in the execution of the plan, correspondent with his just claims on the public confidence.

JOSEPH STORY.

---

I have no doubt the Digest proposed by Mr Hilliard will be highly useful, and that it will have a tendency to relieve the profession from the great labor of looking through hundreds of volumes, or of indices, to ascertain whether points sought for have been treated of and decided. I also feel assured that Mr Hilliard's professional acquirements, and assiduity in legal researches, qualify him to give such a book, under the revision proposed, all the usefulness which the plan suggests.

July 10. ISAAC PARKER.

---

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of administering and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire: and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Price $1,25.

Aug. 20.

---

NEW LAW BOOKS.—JOHN GRIGG, No. 9 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia, has just published the following valuable works.

CONDENSED REPORTS of CASES decided in the SUPREME COURT of the United States, from the organization of the Court at August term 1791, to January term 1828. Edited by Richard Peters, Counsellor at Law, and Reporter of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

This work is intended to contain the opinions of the Supreme Court, in the language of the Judges, in every case decided in that court from the establishment of the Government of the United States, to the commencement of Mr Peters's Reports at January term 1828. The reported decisions in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, upon similar points, are also collected and digested in the work, as notes; and abstracts of those Cases, and also of the collateral decisions of the Supreme Court are given, so that the Professional Gentleman and the Student will be in possession of all the adjudicated Law of all the Courts of the United States, in an authoritative, condensed, and arranged form.

The work will be contained in not more than six volumes; the first volume is now published; the second volume will be published about the 1st of August, and the balance of the work during the present year and 1831.

Those who wish to possess this work will do well to make an early application as the greatest portion of the edition is taken up by subscription. They are for sale by the principal Booksellers in the United States, with J. Griggs's other law publications.

Price six dollars to those who subscribe, and seven dollars to non-subscribers, payable on delivery of each volume.

PETERS' REPORTS.—Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Supreme Court of the United States, by Richard Peters, Esquire, Reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, 4 vols. royal 8vo.

FONBLANQUE'S Celebrated TREATISE ON EQUITY. A new edition, with considerable additions, from the last London edition, by a distinguished Member of the Philadelphia Bar, in 1 vol. royal 8vo.

CHITTY ON CONTRACTS. A new and Practical Treatise on the Law of Contracts not under Seal, and upon the usual Defences to Actions thereon, with Corrections and Additional References. By a member of the Massachusetts Bar, in 1 vol. 8vo.

SAUNDER'S REPORTS, in 3 vols. 8vo. The 4th American, from the 5th considerably enlarged London edition.

Say's Political Economy, new edition.

TOLLER'S LAW OF EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS. With notes and references to American Authorities, by E. D. Ingraham, Esq. new edition, in 1 vol. 8vo.

Sugden on the Law of Vendors in 1 vol. 8vo.

Jones on Bailments in 1 vol. 8vo.

CHANCERY REPORTS. JOHN GRIGG, has in press the Decisions of the English Chancery Reports, upon the plan which has been adopted and successfully executed with the 'English Common Law Reports.' The work will comprehend, in a condensed form, all the Reports which have not been republished in the United States; and it will be continued, so as to present to the profession, annually, the Chancery Reports as they shall hereafter appear in Great Britain.

The work will also contain references to the decisions of the chancery courts of the United States, and of the several states.

---

GRAY & BOWEN have received by late arrivals the following valuable Foreign Books, which they will sell at low prices.

Dibdin's Library Companion, second edition, one large 8vo. vol.

Bowring's Poetry of the Magyars.

Moore's Byron. Splendid quarto edition.

Belzoni's Researches in Egypt and Nubia.

Description of the Ruins of an Ancient City in South America, with plates.

Memoires de M. De Bourrienne, 10 vols.

Histoire De France. Par M. Bignon, 4 vols.

Dictionnaire de Maximes. Par J. L. Malire, 1 vol.

Histoire du Congress de Vienne, 3 vols. 8vo.

Lafayette en Amerique, with Plates, 2 vols. 8vo.

The Works of Lope de Vega, 21 vols. quarto, fine edition.

Obras de Quevedo, 11 vols.

Don Quixotte, 5 vols.

Las Eroticas Villegas, 2 vols.

Trabajos de Persiles y Sigismunda, 2 vols.

Teatro Italiano Antico, 8 vols. July 10.

---

GRAY & BOWEN have in PRESS A DICTIONARY OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE; or, an Explanation of Words and Things connected with all the Arts and Sciences. Illustrated with numerous Wood Cuts. By GEORGE CRABB, A. M. Author of 'English Synonymes,' 'Technological Dictionary,' and 'Historical Dictionary.'

'This little volume contains definitions of all terms of art and science, with such additional explanations in some cases as serve to illustrate something more than the bare meaning of the word. It is drawn up with special regard to brevity, in order to comprehend within a convenient space all words on which the reader may wish for immediate information. Although so small in bulk, yet this book will be found to contain a vast number of words which are not to be met with in any other works whatever, the explanation of which is nevertheless highly necessary for those who are not in the constant habit of hearing them used in ordinary discourse. Of this description are the Latin phrases now adopted into our language, as "Sine quâ non," "Ne plus ultra," and the like. The historical essays on each science, which have been expressly composed for this Dictionary, serve to show the progress of the arts and sciences from the earliest periods to the present.'

The American edition will be carefully revised, and contain a large amount of new and valuable matter. It will extend to nearly four hundred 12mo pages, with about five hundred fine engravings executed on wood It will appear very soon July 10.

---

NOW PUBLISHING, BY CARTER & HENDEE, A SERIES OF SCIENTIFIC TRACTS, designed for Instruction and Entertainment, and adapted to Schools, Lyceums and Families. Conducted by Josiah Holbrook and others.

The whole Series will contain simple and clear outlines of the various sciences, and their principal division, with their application to the common purposes of life.

TERMS.—Not less than 24 numbers of a 12mo size, containing 24 pages each, will be published in a year, at $1,50, payable in advance. July 10.

---

CARTER AND HENDEE have in Press, SELF EDUCATION; or, THE MEANS OF MORAL PROGRESS, Translated from the French of M. Le Baron Degerando. To this work was awarded the honor of being 'crowned' by the French Academy; a distinction annually confered on one or two works, deemed the most useful that have been published during the year. And a late Review remarks; 'We have no ethical work of any living English writer to be compared with that of Degerando.'

VIEW OF THE UNITED STATES, for the use of Schools, with Maps and numerous Engravings.

INFANT SCHOOL MANUAL, or Teacher's Assistant Second Edition. Enlarged and much improved.

SCRAP TABLE, containing Original Anecdotes and Sketches.

YOUNG LADY'S BOOK, with 700 engravings on wood, of a superior quality, intended as an Annual for 1831.

THE YOUTH'S KEEPSAKE, a Christmas and New Year's Offering for 1831.

A NEW COLLECTION OF PSALMS AND HYMNS, for Public Worship. By Rev. F. W. P. Greenwood.

---

THIS DAY PUBLISHED,—By GRAY & BOWEN, a second, and cheap edition of 'British Opinions on the Protecting System, being a Reply to Strictures on that System, which have appeared in several recent British Publications.' Reprinted with a few alterations from an article in the North American Review, for January, 1830.

---

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. Complete sets of this work (thirty volumes in all) can now be had, on application to the Publishers, on liberal terms. The number and variety of the topics discussed in this work, and the high reputation it enjoys both in this country and Europe, render it a most valuable addition to the library of literary men. A General Index of the first twentyfive volumes has also been published, in a style to match with the current volumes of the work.

Subscribers and others whose sets may be deficient, can be supplied with the missing numbers. Subscriptions to commence at any period, received at $5 per annum. GRAY & BOWEN.

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1830. NO. VIII.

MERCANTILE LAW.

NO. III.

[Continued.]

Neither law nor common sense allow, that, where one of the essential ingredients is wanting, the binding consequences of a contract should attach; and mental incapacity at the time of contracting is admitted therefore as a good defence, not only in equity, but at law. Our law was indeed once disgraced by the recognition of a contrary doctrine, supported by a contemptible refinement of absurdity, which declared that a man could not be allowed to stultify himself.* But at this day no stipulation, however testified, whether by parol, by deed, or by record, entered into by one, who at the time was destitute of understanding, will prevail in a court of equity; and even at common law, nothing but the transcendant authority of a record, which admits of no question, is exempt from impeachment on that ground.† Whether the temporary prostration of the understanding, induced by a fit of drunkenness, is such an incapacity for contracting, as will on that account defeat an engagement entered into under such circumstances, was a question formerly much controverted:‡ but it seems to be now settled, as good sense and consistency demand, that such an engagement, wanting the requisite assent of the understanding, is invalid both at law and equity.§

Mere weakness of understanding in the party contracting is not of itself a recognized ground of incapacity to contract. Unless there be an absolute privation of the reasoning faculties, all men are considered as possessed of understanding sufficient for the conduct of their own affairs, and competent to bind themselves by agreement.‖ The reason undoubtedly is the difficulty of applying a different rule. It would be manifestly impossible for the law to ascertain in every case, by a nicely graduated scale, minute differences of intellectual capacity.

Accordingly, where this difficulty does not exist, it resumes its office of protecting the weak against the practices of the strong. Now those who have not yet attained to manhood, (a period which by our law is for this purpose fixed at 21 years) cannot in general have had experience sufficient to guide them in the management of their own affairs; and this incompetency being so far uniform, that it can be reduced to a tolerably accurate standard, the law interposes to shield them against the impositions to which the indiscretion of youth is liable, and does not bind them to the performance of their engagements.* But the reason which gives this indulgence to the infant (for so a person under the age of 21 is, with some inaccuracy of language, denominated by our law) manifestly does not apply to the other contracting party, if he be of full age. He at least is capable of providing for his own interests; and his engagement, therefore, if the infant choose to insist on performance, is obligatory on him.† Upon the same principle, of the infant himself, after his attainment to full age, recognize the engagement by an express and deliberate undertaking, he will henceforth be bound by it.‡ It is in fact a new engagement, rather than a confirmation of the former one, founded, it is true, on a benefit received before, but made at a time when he must be supposed capable of estimating what that benefit was worth, and when he had the choice of adopting it, or not.§ A reasonable distinction, however, has been drawn between such transactions as are apparently for the infant's benefit, and such as are clearly to his prejudice. The latter are held to be altogether void; the former merely voidable at his election.‖ Thus, the lease of a house, or the letting out to hire of a ship, may be confirmed by him when of age, without a renewal of the instrument. Indeed, if the contract be such, that after his maturity it is still in a course of performance, (as if a partnership, entered into by him when under age, be continued after his majority,) the engagement will thenceforth bind him, unless he at that time expressly repudiate it. But where the contract is void, as in the case of a bond with a penalty, no acknowledgment after full age can set up and give validity to the transaction.¶

The rule of law proceeds, as we have said, on the principle of protecting the young against the practices of such as might be inclined to take advantage of their inexperience: when therefore the circumstances of the transaction repel the presumption of unfairness, it is just, and for the benefit of the infant himself, that the rule should not apply. Accordingly a person under age may enter into a binding engagement to pay a reasonable price for such things as are necessary to his comfort, and proper to the station he holds in society. It is usual to include all such things under the general term of necessaries, and the expression, if understood as relative to the degree and condition of the infant, is sufficiently accurate for all pratical purposes.* The law will not countenance the claims of those who indulge, or take advantage of the extravagance of minors, but holds it to be the duty of the tradesman to make such previous inquiries as may satisfy him that the goods supplied are what may reasonably be required. If therefore the infant were already provided with all that was necessary, either by his father or from other tradesmen, he cannot support his claim.† An infant cannot be sued for money lent; in a court of common law, not even when advanced for the purpose of being expended in necessaries, because when trusted to the infant himself, it may be misapplied.‡ A court of equity, however, will grant relief, where the money has been lent to pay a debt for necessaries, and has been applied accordingly, by allowing the lender to stand in the situation of the creditor for necessaries, whom he has satisfied.§

As the law considers a minor wanting in the necessary discretion to contract, à fortiori it does not recognise him as a trader.‖ It does not, therefore, hold him liable on the custom of the realm, as a carrier or innkeeper,¶ or on the law of merchants, as on a bill of exchange, or promissory note, when given in the course of trade, and as a negotiable instrument; nay, it is very doubtful whether either would be available against the infant, even though given for necessaries, and in the hands of the original payee.†† It will not bind him by the statement of an account,‡‡ nor regard him as a partner,§§ nor suffer him to be made a bankrupt.‖‖ But though not liable on a mercantile contract, he is not precluded from suing upon it,¶¶ and, had not the case been questioned, it would seem unnecessary to add that a negotiable security is not invalidated, because it has passed through the hands of an infant.

By the civil law, persons who squandered away their money in extravagance and dissipation might, on the application of those who were immediately interested, be placed under what was called an

---

* 39 H. 6. 42. Co. Litt. 247 a. 4 Co. 124. Cro. Eliz. 398. See also 2 Bl. Com. 291, 2. and the notes by Mr Fonblanque d, e. to the Treatise of Equity, b. 1. c. 2. s. 1. 'It is always,' says the learned translator of Pothier on Obligations, 'a question of fact, whether a given act is imputable to a given individual; and where the nature of the act requires a mind capable of rational assent, the want of such capacity is a negation of the act imputed.' Appendix, No. 3.

† Hobart, 224. Co Litt. 247.

‡ 3 Ch. Ca. 107. Co Litt. 247 a. Heineccius, c. 14. s. 392. As to the relief afforded by equity in such cases, see 1 Ch. Ca. 202. 3 P. Wms. 130. and the opinion of Lord Hardwicke in Cory v. Cory, 1 Ves. and B. 30.

§ 18 Ves. 1 16. Bull. N. P. 172 citing the opinion of Holt Ch. J. 3 Camp. 33. and 1 Stark. N. P. C. 126. per Lord Ellenborough. And see Pothier, Pt. 1. c. 1. s. 1. art. 4. div. 49. The law of Holland agrees with this.—See Institutes of Holland, p. 1. 90.

‖ Still weakness of capacity may be a material circumstance for inferring unfair practice, when the bargain is manifestly to the disadvantage of the weaker party; and fraud, as we shall hereafter see, vitiates everything into which it enters.

* Bac. Abr. Infancy, I. Com. Dig. Enfant, B.

† Bac. Abr. Infancy, I. 4. Strange, 937. 2 M. & S. 205.

‡ Co Litt. 3. a. 2 Ventr. 203. 1 Mod. 25. Strange, 690. 9 Vin. Abr. 393, 394. 1 T. R 648. 2 T. R. 766.

§ See the observations of Lord Ellenborough in Cohen v. Armstrong, I M. & S. 724.

‖ See the case of Zouch v. Parsons, 3 Burr. 1794. where this distinction was much discussed by Lord Mansfield.

¶ 8 Taunt. 35. 5 B. & A. 147,

* Co. Litt. 172. a. 2 T. R. 159. 4 T. R. 363. 8 T. R. 578. Peake's N. P. C. 229. 4 Campb. 164. Necessaries for the wife of an infant are considered as necessaries for himself. 1 Strange, 168. It may sometimes be a question, whether the credit was not given to the father: if it were, the infant is of course exempt. See Baker v. Keen, 2 Stark. N. P. C. 501. Alleyne, 94.

† 2 Stark. 501.

‡ 1 Salk. 297. 387. 1 Vern. 255.

§ 1 P. Wms. 559.

‖ Therefore an action against an infant for goods supplied to, or work done for him, for the purpose of a trade, by which he gains his livelihood, cannot be maintained. Cro. Jac. 494. Strange, 1083. 2 M. & S. 209. 6 Taunt. 120. 8 Taunt. 35. 5 B. & A. 147. 2 B. & C. 824.

‡ Carthew, 161.

¶ Carthew, 160, Holt's N. P. C. 359, Com. Dig. Enfant, C. 2.

 1 Campb. 552. Bayley on Bills, 19. Chitty on Bills, 16. Holt's N. P. C. 78.

†† 1 T. R. 40. 2 Stark, N. P. C. 36.

‡‡ 1 Stark. N. P. C. 26. 5 B. & A. 147.

§§ Cullen, 26. A debt contracted during infancy is not sufficient to support a commission against a trader, on an act of bankruptcy committed after full age. Bull. N. P. 38. 1 Atk. 146. 197. 4 Ves. J. 163. 11 Ves. 402. 1 Ves. & B. 494. 6 Taunt. 119. 2 M. & S. 207.

¶¶ 2 M. & S. 205. 6 Taunt. 118.

 4 Esp. N. P. C. 13.

interdiction for prodigality. From this time they were incapable of entering into valid contracts. The law of England has nothing analogous to this; except that the courts of equity view with great jealousy contracts entered into with young persons, engaged in a course of dissipation. This, however, is not on the ground of an incapacity in them to contract, but of an undue advantage taken of their weakness and indiscretion.

But we have said that in order to constitute an agreement, there must not only be an assent of the understanding, but an exercise of the will. We need hardly say, therefore, that where there is no recognized will, there can be no contract. Now, the law of England, somewhat ungallantly perhaps, but in truth by a wise and commendable policy, considers the moral existence of the woman as incorporated, or rather merged, by marriage, in that of the man. It looks upon the will of the wife, not as identified with, but altogether lost and absorbed in that of the husband.* The consequence is manifest: the engagements of the wife, made during marriage, or as the law aptly enough expresses it, coverture, are altogether ineffectual; the general rule being, that neither she, nor her husband, can sue or be sued on any stipulation entered into by or with her, whilst this incapacity continues. All such engagements, whether evidenced by simple contracts or by deed, are absolutely void.† There are of course qualifications of this, as of every other rule. Laws which are for the benefit, are not to be strained to the disadvantage, of the community. Whenever the strict application of a rule would work general and manifest injustice, the same reason which first established it, equally sanctions the relaxation of it. Hence, the contracts entered into by the wife for necessaries (i. e. for goods corresponding to the rank and appearance which the husband permits her to assume in society) are, not only out of a due regard to the interests of the wife, and the rights of the fair-dealing tradesman, but even for the sake of the personal convenience of the husband, held to be binding on the latter.‡ Still the law does not depart from its principle. It does not consider these transactions as the acts of the wife, but of the husband represented by her. And in this reasonable fiction it does but conform to a still more general rule, that whatever is done for a man's benefit shall be presumed, unless expressly repudiated, to have been done by his authority. Of course this, as well as all other presumptions, may be rebutted by fact. Thus, an express notice to the individual tradesman not to trust the wife will discharge the husband.* Nor does the presumption attach, where circumstances shew that credit was given, not to the husband, but to the wife.† The tradesman has then chosen to rely upon her honor, and he must abide by the consequences. As in the case of infants, so in this, money lent to the wife for the purchase of necessaries cannot be recovered in law; in equity, if really so applied, it may.‡ And in both, an actual payment on account of necessaries for the wife may be claimed from the husband, as money expended for his use and benefit.‖

* Our law uniformly manifests the most anxious disposition to preserve entire the union of the married state, and to prevent whatever might be likely to introduce domestic discord. Undoubtedly, by this surrender of the wife's legal existence, it has taken a very effectual step towards the attainment of its object. It seems to have proceeded on that Homeric maxim, which we sincerely believe, so far as the executive of government, whether domestic or politicial, is concerned, will be found universally true—ακ αγαθου πολυκοιρανια· εις κοιρανος εσω.'

† Com. Dig. Baron & Feme. Bacon's Abr. Baron & Feme. 1 Sid. 120. 1 Lev. 4. 2 Atk. 453. 6 T. R. 609. 11 East. 301. 4 Camp. 26. If, therefore, the wife sell or dispose of the goods of the husband without his assent, he may recover them back from the holder, and if she lose money at cards, he may bring an action for it against the winner. Com. Dig. Baron & Feme, 2.

‡ Com. Dig. ubi ante. 2 Lord Raymond, 1006. 1 Salk. 118. 1 Campb. 121. It is at the peril of the tradesman if the goods supplied are beyond what is suitable to the apparent circumstances of the husband. 3 Barnewell & Cresswell. 631.

* Strange, 1214. A general prohibition will not. 1 Sid. 121. Lord Raymond, 444. Strange 875.
† 3 Campb. 21. 4 B. & A. 255. ‡ 1 Moore, 126.
§ 1 P. Wms. 483. ‖ Salk. 837.

MR BROUGHAM'S SPEECH

ON THE LAW REFORMS.

April, 1830.

Mr Brougham, in bringing forward his motion on this subject, called to the recollection of the House that, in consequence of his former motion two Commissions had been appointed. One was upon the law of real property. That Commission had already made one report, and a second was, at an early period, expected. The other Commission was with relation to the proceedings in a suit of law. The Commissioners had made a report, and disclosed their intention of speedily following it up by a second, in which the most important questions would come under discussion. Let it not be supposed that in calling the attention of the House to this most important subject he had any complaint to make of the manner in which the Commissioners had discharged their duty. He did not know that he ought to complain of the length of these reports, because, as the field of inquiry was large, it behoved the Commissioners to investigate fully; neither did he know that he ought to complain that the powers granted to the Commissioners were too limited; and certainly he had every reason to say that the powers granted were well exercised. The Commissioners, he thought, prosecuted their inquiries, and promoted their investigation, keeping clear of the rashness of innovation on the one hand, and too much veneration for ancient institutions and existing abuses on the other—(hear.) The great learning and experience which the Commissioners, as practical men, have brought to the extensive subject of this inquiry, and the vast knowledge which they have obtained from others of equally extensive practice with themselves, in addition to their own suggestions which those Commissioners have laid before them. That, therefore, being his candid opinion, it could not be supposed for a moment that he now brought forward the motion, of which he had given notice, in any hostility to the Commissioners. He would take the ground which they left untouched. If he saw that the labors of the Commissioners could be concluded in any reasonable time, he would not move upon his own views, until he could learn whether they formed part of the investigations of the Commissioners—or if the subjects to which their inquiries were directed could be brought within a reasonable scope—or that they had any connexion with the subject which he was about proposing—he would be inclined to postpone his motion. But finding that the attention of the Commissioners was not directed to this subject, or their inquiries connected with it, he saw no reason for postponing his purpose of directing the attention of the House to it. If we were told that there was any country, in which, for the purpose of recovering 600*l.* or 700*l.*, which a person was entitled to receive, he should first have to spend 60*l.* or 70*l.*—throwing, as the common saying was, good money after bad—in what circumstances such a country was placed in respect to the administration of justice, in which such a loss was to be first incurred. But that was not all. If, after that, and after great anxiety of mind, great labor of body, no little uncertainty as to the final event, and withal to be bandied about, from province to province, and from Court to Court, it must be confessed that our admiration of the administration of justice in such a country could not be great. But when after all, after spending so much money, we still could find that the adversary in the suit could still keep the property in litigation out of the power of the true owner, and that this latter did not ultimately receive one fourth of the debt, when even the debtor was solvent, and was willing to pay what the law and the Judge declared, even in the most favorable case. When we find that the party could receive 60 or 70*l.*, but even less, after being, perhaps, 14 or 15*l.* out of pocket beyond the debt, then we should say, if such a country existed, it must be a barbarous country—(hear, hear.) Nevertheless, he need not remind them of what they all knew—many of them to their cost—that that country was England—that country in which they then sat. Then the question to be considered was—how shall this be remedied? And the first question which occurred was, 'How did all this arise?' He would thus go into the question and into the subject at once, in the way that was most convenient for discussion. He had formerly stated to the House the experiment which he had made at one Assizes at Lancaster. He begged of the Prothonotary to give him the number of verdicts which were given at one Assizes. He did accordingly get them—they were in number 50, and the average amount of each was 14*l.* He did not mean to say that there were not among them some cases in which the damages were merely nominal, such as ejectment, issues out of Courts of Equity, &c; but the most of them certainly were such as enabled the creditor to hold the debtor to bail for his debt. He would refer to the tables given by the Commissioners in the appendix to their report, to show the great evils of the system. In the year 1826, the number of actions brought in the King's Bench was about 69,000; of these, the number brought to trial was about 60,000. Many of the actions were not proceeded in for various reasons with which he would not trouble the House. If they could form an estimate of the sums for which these actions were brought generally, it could not be from the documents laid on the table. But they could form an approximation to them. They had a return in 1827 of the number of actions that were brought in the Courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas for two years. The number of affidavits of debt for 10*l.* and upwards, was 73,000. Out of these affidavits, an average of about 30,000 out of the 73,000, were made foundations for actions. These affidavits were for sums in the following proportions:—29,000 of them were for sums above 10*l.* and not exceeding 20*l.*; 36,000 of them were for sums exceeding 20*l.* and not exceeding 50*l.* Taking all of these, it would be found that 63,000 of these affidavits were for sums not exceeding 50*l.* each, and no less than 78,000 odd of them were for sums not exceeding 100*l.* each. Now, he called on the House to observe, that out of all the 93,000 affidavits of debt, one third of them were for sums not exceeding 20*l.*; no less than two thirds of them were for sums not exceeding 50*l.*; and no less than five sixths of them were for sums not exceeding 100*l.* each. Of this statement there could not be a doubt, and he pledged himself to the House for its accuracy. From all this, the House would see the practical conclusion—which was this, that a great part of the Legislature of the country resolved itself into questions where the sums in dispute did not exceed 100*l.* He next would call the attention of the House to the description of the persons that were engaged in those actions. The Commissioners, from whose labors he was quoting, had added some valuable tables of costs of actions to their report, and they gave four bills of costs of actions in the Court of King's Bench, to which he would direct the attention of Members. The Commissioners distinctly stated that these bills were reduced by taxation to the lowest possible scale of expenditure. One of the bills to which he would allude was that of an action tried in London, the witnesses being from the county of Lancaster. The Bill included the costs of the plaintiff only. Not only was it on the lowest scale of expenditure, but was also free from the additional costs of special writ, or more than one defendant; and the suit was altogether the most favorable that could be selected, both in the points of cheapness and expedition. The plaintiff's taxed costs, as allowed between party and party, from the giving of the instructions to his attorney to proceed up to execution, were 86*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.* These costs, the Court having ordered further proceedings after the verdict amounted to 110*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.* Out of this sum was to be deducted about 10*l.* for delay. There being two delays arising out of the arrear of business before the Court, one of these delays being 6*l.* odd, and the other 10*l.* odd, as he said before. But taking that there was no delay, but that all the proceedings were as they were laid down by the Commissioners in these most valuable tables; taking that there was no delay, the sum of 6*l.* was to be deducted for the first bill, and 10*l.* odd from the second, in which case they have to name 80*l.* odd for the one bill of costs, and 100*l.* odd for the other. Now he would admit that much of this expense was owing to the large sums given to the witnesses. He would not only admit it, but he maintained it. True it was that the cause was not a town cause, but was brought from Lancaster; but true it also was, that if the cause were tried in Lancaster or in York, the expense would be the same. The witnesses in this cause were an architect, a master carpenter, and a laborer. In taxing the bill two guineas a day were allowed to the architect, 15*s.* and then so much for each also for travelling and for expenses on the road, which was 12*d.* per mile. He next begged to direct the attention of the House to the head of delay, which was generally very great at the Assizes, and which delay, or fear of delay, he had no doubt was the cause of bringing this action for trial to London from the county of Lancaster, as in London the party could almost fix on the day by making it a Special Jury cause, so that he might in London know the day on which his cause was to come on, whereas he would have to wait twelve or fourteen days, as was often the case at Lancaster, at great expense, and in great anxiety before the trial might come on. Then as to the attorneys, they were to have two guineas each day if they had but one cause; if two causes or more, then one guinea a day. All the witnesses were to be paid all the days they were waiting, at the rate he had said. This expense was essential as long as the present system continued, and was inseparable from it. He did not know but it was more essential than retaining of Counsel, or employing attorneys, and for these he knew not how much expense was to be added.

Upon a former motion he produced to the House four bills of costs from respectable houses, one of these bills was for 400*l.* 200*l.* of which were taxed off, so that the party was 200*l.* out of pocket if the debt was not more. In the second bill 70*l.* were taxed off, being one third. In the third bill 15*l.* out of 60*l.* were taxed off. This last was an undefended cause, and if it had been litigated and if the other party had been litigious and made opposition, he might put him to the expense of 80*l.* before he got his verdict, or 100*l.* before he got final judgment. Another party had to pay 120*l.* before he got his verdict, and 150*l.* before he obtained final judgment—so that he paid 150*l.* in costs and got 50*l.* of debt.—So that, after all this harassing proceeding—out of all this uncertainty—out of all this vexation, embarrassment, and anxiety—together with the risk of losing his suit and his debt too—the plaintiff paid 150*l.* instead of getting 200*l.* It was needless for him to say that this was not an average case. But what was the result? It was this—that any man skilled in the proceedings of Courts of Justice would not think of suing for such small sums. Such a man would rather lie out of his money than enter a Court of Justice, quite certain of losing some at best out of pocket. He had occasion to converse with an attorney on the subject. Being only 20 miles off, he (the attorney) said, if he were the party, he would not think of going to the assize town for any sum under ninety pounds. A man might be inclined to bring an action for a gross detention of his rights, or to resist a flagrant demand, but this which he described was the result of his exertions. Now these were the evils, and whoever proposed a remedy for them somewhat exposed himself to opposition, and perhaps to obloquy, inasmuch as he seemed to put himself above others in wisdom and in experience. He felt that something would be done by the investigation of the Commissioners, if the House should carry into effect these proposals. He felt that somewhat of the evils of our present system would be diminished at least by acting upon the recommendations of the Commissioners. He had stated that we felt the evils, and he had also stated the principal causes of them. He would now come to suggest what he thought would be a remedy. He thought that the distance to which parties were forced to come, in order to have their causes decided by the existing Courts, a great evil, and requiring remedy. It long has been the custom to have justice distributed and causes decided in the capital of the kingdom. That this should be the great mart from which all process was to be purchased and issued forth—that hither all processes should be returned—and that hither all parties should be obliged to resort—was long the custom. But that was not of itself the cause of expense, because the difference of sending to town for a writ was nothing almost in point of expense, and the difference of expense from York or Lancaster was almost nothing; but out of that still arose another part of the system to which the same reason did not apply. The Judge as well as the process came from London, and the cause had to wait till he came. The Judge came once in half a year. But that was not all. The cause was to be heard, and the parties had to go to a remote part of the country; they had to send their lawyers and their witnesses, and generally a race was run by some practitioners to see who entered his cause first. The witnesses had to be supported; and not only supported, but paid a reasonable compensation for loss of time; and they were the better witnesses the better they were paid. As he said before, the day laborer was to be paid 5*s.* a day, and that was allowed in the taxation of costs. It was well known that the attorney who paid his witnesses stintingly was sure to pay for his parsimony. All these evils were essential to, and inseparable from, the system of jurisprudence now existing. Then another ground of evil was, that if any ulterior or special proceeding was to be had in Court, that must be done in London, and not in the neighborhood of the parties. The whole result necessarily was considerable delay in deciding the cause, and great and overwhelming, and most unnecessary expense. What, then, was the obvious remedy? He would suggest an alteration in the mode of issuing out process, by which a few shillings would be saved out of every eight pounds. Another proposition, emanating from the report of the Commissioners, was to lessen the arrears of causes, by which a saving might be made both of time and expense. In the larger bills a saving of 10*l.* might be effected, and in the smaller the expense might be diminished by 6*l.*—that was all. Then came a set of valuable recommendations and excellent improvements, to which he could only generally advert. He must, however, specially notice the proposition with regard to the attendance of witnesses in the places where causes were to be tried. Here an excellent principle was recommended, which was not at present acted upon. In like manner the whole system of pleadings was brought under consideration both in principle and practice, and this branch evinced some of the happiest thoughts and most profound suggestions which it was possible to conceive. These were well worthy the earnest attention of every lawyer, but more particularly of those ingenious persons who were engaged in the peculiar department of the profession to which they referred. What he principally alluded to were the suggestions with regard to the plea of interpleader. It appeared to him, however, that the great evil arose from the distance of the suitors from the town in which the causes were to be heard. Thus far with respect to the causes of complaint as to actions for a certain amount. He was ready to admit that, in actions for a large amount, there was no reason why a cheaper mode of proceeding might not be adopted than that at present existed; but the great and crying evil arose from actions not exceeding from 50 to 100*l.* And here he might be permitted to call the attention of the House to the old system, which our ancestors had adopted for the purpose of avoiding litigation. At the same time he must observe in the outset that it was quite impossible to deny the advantage of that system, by which all the practice of the law was carried from the Courts of Westminster Hall twice a year through the most remote parts of the land. Yet, long antecedent to the present system of law or jurisprudence, the form was much more simple, and afforded to the suitors a much more convenient remedy by means of trial in the Country Court. Lawyers differed not a litle as to the origin and jurisdiction of that Court, but it was evident that both were coeval with the Saxon times. In those days the County Court was the great ordinary tribunal of the country. It was said, but in this he could not agree, that its juridiction extended to criminal as well as to civil causes. At all events, it was certain that it had jurisdiction in all cases ecclesiastical as well as civil. The persons who presided in it were the Aldermen and the Bishops, acting under the Earl of the county, this maxim being enjoined—'Let the Bishops and the Earl meet the county at stated times, and let the one teach the law of GOD, and the other the law of the land.' The principle of the law was, that in all ordinary cases every man should seek for justice at his own home, and that he should not appeal to the King till he had failed of obtaining it at his own home. The principle laid down by Sir Harry Spelman was to this effect—'Let no man seek a remedy from the King till he cannot find his burdens lightened in the County Court; when he cannot find them lightened in the County Court, then let him seek a remedy from the King.'

In support of this view of the subject he might refer to the practice which obtained in the 6th year of the Conqueror, when the Archbishop, the Bishop, and the Earl, presided in the County Court, and continued their sittings for three days, adjudging manors of great value. In the Court were Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Odo, the half-brother of the King. These, with the Earl, had jurisdiction in all civil cases. By degrees the jurisdiction of the Court became limited, much inconvenience being found to arise from the manner in which it was subsequently constituted, and the Sheriffs having fallen into disrepute. In the time of Henry I. the jurisdiction of the County Court was confined to matters of 40*s* in amount, for under that sum no one was allowed to sue in any of the King's Courts of Westminster. But in a century and a half afterwards 40*s* became the maximum as well as the minimum amount for which legal process might be instituted at a County Court. Now he thought it would be convenient if the House looked to the history of the County Court in Scotland, since, in endeavoring to discover a remedy for an evil it would be desirable, before they agreed to any change, to try whether a system which was objected to in this country had been adopted elsewhere, and with what success. The Hon. and Learned Gentleman then made some observations to show that the system of British judicature probably originated in the principles laid down by Glanville, and that it was analogous in most respects to that which now existed in Scotland. He contended, however, that the improvements which had been made in the one county had been lost in the other. It was much to be regretted that the people of Scotland had retained many excellent things which the people of England had thought proper to discard. In the original constitution of the County Court the regulations were the same for both countries. In the earlier times the Sheriff could try pleas of the Crown, and in all civil causes his power was unlimited. At a subsequent period, however, the genius of the Scottish County Court assumed a character differing in a material degree from its Saxon origin. Its judicial offices became hereditary in fee in private individuals. But many of these hereditary jurisdictions were forfeited in the rebellion of 1715, and still more in that of 1745. It was at this time found that monstrous abuses existed under the system which then obtained, for persons purchasing property were vested with local jurisdiction, not only in civil suits, but in all cases of life and death. Therefore, to remedy an evil so obvious, all local jurisdiction of this feudal description was abolished. Hence arose, as a substitute, what was called the Crown County Court, the Crown possessing the shrievalties and their appurtenance of jurisdictions all over Scotland, and appointing persons to act through all parts of the country. Under that system Scotland had continued ever since, and the best effects were found to result from the mode in which justice was administered. He still thought that the system might be further improved by such a reform as would oblige Sheriffs Depute to reside within the limits of their shrievalties, instead of devolving their jurisdiction to other individuals. Yet it could not be denied that, whatever defects might exist in it, the system was found to work well; and so far as it went, it was a very cheap and convenient mode of obtaining justice. The Sheriff was competent to entertain all ordinary actions that might be brought by individuals. All actions for debt might be brought in his Court; so likewise might all actions of damages for assault, for criminal conversation, for slander, for seduction, together with all criminal prosecutions; and the damages might be laid at any amount there being no limitation whatever.

[To be concluded.]

---

ARCHES COURT—JUNE.

Before Sir John Nicholl.

Harrison vs. Lane.

The Court pronounced judgment in this case this morning. It was a suit promoted by Mrs Harrison, for the purpose of setting aside the will of the late Rev. Dr Pugh, of Hereford, her own brother, on the ground of mental incapacity. It was alleged, on the part of the promoter, that, for some years prior to his decease, the Rev. Dr Pugh had indulged in excesses which brought on a gradual decay, and that, in the month of March, 1829, when he made his will, making his housekeeper (Rebecca Charles) and her nephew (Thomas Rogers, a young boy) his residuary legatees, he was childish, and incapable of managing his affairs. It was alleged that, during the whole of the month of March, he was of unsound mind, memory, and understanding. Dr Ligh, however, who was called on the part of Mrs Harrison to prove this, did not go the length of stating that the deceased was of unsound mind, but that he was imbecile, and was daily getting worse. Into the other grounds of the suit—namely, the improbability of his thus disposing of his property while he had a sister for whom he always entertained a regard until he became dissipated, and the control alleged to have been exercised over him by Rebecca Charles, his housekeeper, it was not very requisite, to examine, the main question being whether, at the time of making the will, he was in such a state as to render Mr Lane's account of the transaction incredible. The previous history of his habits and of his profane swearing was of no importance, nor was even his continued intoxication, except so far as it tended to produce imbecility. It was clear from the evidence, that, even prior to his mother's death, he was in a state of alienation from his mother's family; and, after her death, the breach was still further widened by the legal proceedings which the sister thought proper to commence against him in the Court of Chancery. The extent of this alienation was proved by the fact that in the beginning of March, only three weeks before his death, their mutual friends endeavored to bring about a reconciliation between the deceased and Mrs Harrison. For this purpose, at the request of Mrs Harrison, the Rev. Mr Wynne and Mr Ware called upon the deceased, but he rejected the proposition. There was no occasion, therefore, for Rebecca Charles to incite the deceased against his sister; and even though she had joined with him in his feelings against Mrs Harrison and her family, however base that might be, yet it could not vitiate the act of a capable testator. The whole disposition of the will was supported by probability. The deceased had frequently declared that he would leave nothing to his family; and it was clear that he regarded Dr Jones, to whom he left 200*l.* and Mr James Lane, to whom he had left 500*l.* as his best friends. The boy Rogers also he was fond of playing with, and he had repeatedly declared his intention to provide for him; and, as he was the nephew of Rebecca Charles, it was by no means unlikely that he should have wished to unite the two in the enjoyment of his property. The probability was so very strong in favor of the will that only one presumption could be raised against it—namely, the length of time which elapsed before he made it. This, however, was a trivial objection, for it was a very common occurrence. The evidence in support of the will was very decisive, both as to the intention and capability of the testator. One of the witnesses, Green, deposed that he was sent for by the deceased on the 12th of March, upon which occasion the deceased told him that he intended to make his will; that the Harrisons had been annoying him, and he would 'disannul' them of everything. On the morning of the 13th he was again sent for, but was unable to go until evening, and then, when he inquired of Mr Pugh why he sent, the reply was, 'It does not matter now,' the will having been made in the interim. It was unnecessary to examine minutely the details of the evidence, because to presume it to be false would be to presume such a mass of perjury as it was impossible to concert. A few days prior to the death of the deceased, Mrs Harrison forced herself into the house, and it became necessary to send for Mr Gough, the Mayor, for protection. Mr G. was subsequently examined as a witness for Mrs Harrison, and he deposed that Dr Pugh was not insensible, but was very weak. On that occasion Dr Jones said to Mr Gough that Dr Pugh had sent for him on account of Mrs Harrison's conduct, which had very much excited him. That her conduct had done serious injury to Dr Pugh; and that he (Dr Jones) would not be answerable for the consequences. This was on the 18th of March. On the 19th Mrs Harrison sent Mr Pateshall, the keeper of a lunatic asylum, to the deceased, and on the 20th she took possession of his house and person. The effect of such measures upon the mind of the deceased might be easily imagined, but, even if reduced at that time to a state of absolute imbecility, it would be no proof that he was not on the 13th in such a state as to make his will. The course pursued by Mr and Mrs Harrison was most extraordinary. They took possession of and barricadoed his house, instead of leaving their rights to the due course of the law; and this conduct was the more extraordinary when it was remembered that they could have no reason for supposing that their exclusion was not the will of the deceased himself. The question then was, whether the deceased was not on the 13th of March in such a state as to enable him to make a will? With respect to this point Mr Theophilus Lane was a most important witness. He was, it was true, the brother of Mr James Lane, the executor, and large legatee under the will; but then there was abundant evidence that he was a man of unimpeached professional and private character. He was also Registrar of the Consistorial Court of the diocese—a situation which of itself inferred respectability; and in addition to this it was to be observed, that the making of this alleged fraudulent will could confer no benefit upon himself which could induce him to commit his character by lending himself to the grossest perjury. His evidence went to establish the capability of the testator, as well as his intention, and the Court felt it could rely upon his testimony with the utmost confidence. It could not, indeed, pronounce this will invalid, without declaring that not only his evidence, but the evidence of all the numerous other witnesses for the will, was perjury. The Court, therefore, had no hesitation in pronouncing for the validity of the will; and with respect to the question of costs, when it took into its consideration the total alienation of the deceased from his family; his constant declaration that he would never leave them a shilling of his property; his refusal to be reconciled to his sister shortly before his death; her conduct in taking forcible possession of his house and person; the respectable character of the person who made the will; when it took into its consideration the application made to the witnesses in the case by Mrs Harrison, between their examination in chief and their examination upon interrogatories; when it considered the large mass of evidence introduced, much of it of little value, and the large consequent expenses compared with the smallness of the property involved in the issue, the Court felt that it would not be doing justice if it did not discourage such vexatious actions by pronouncing costs against the party who had promoted the suit.

DIGEST OF RECENT ENGLISH CASES.

Clarkson vs. Lawson.

Declaration stated that the defendant had published of the plaintiff, that the plaintiff, a proctor, had been suspended three times. Plea (professing to answer the whole declaration,) that the plaintiff had been suspended once. Held bad, on demurrer, as omitting to answer two specific charges; and per Tindal C. J. 'the defendant's character is much more deeply affected than if he had only been charged with one offence.' 1 Bing. 266.

[The judgment of the Exchequer in Adams v. Meredew, 2 Y. & J. (ante, Vol. II. 401.) was reversed, 3 Y. & J. 219.

The Reporters state that a writ of error is now pending in the Lords.]

Gould vs. Shirley.

The defendant on being applied to for payment of a debt of 20*l.* barred by the statute of limitations, said he was going to H. in the course of the week, and he would help the plaintiff to 5l. if he could. Held that, to make this promise available, the plaintiff must show that the defendant was of ability to pay. 2 Moore & Payne, 581.

Williams vs. Tailor.

The defendant presented two bills for perjury against the plaintiff, but did not himself appear before the grand jury, and they were ignored. He then went to the K. B., and having himself appeared, a bill was found. The plaintiff's bail was refused, and the indictment was kept suspended for three years, when the plaintiff himself took the record down to trial. The defendant was present, but did not appear, and the jury after a short pause, acquitted the plaintiff. The chief assignments of perjury were the plaintiff's having sworn (in action for money lost at play) that he had lost money seventeen times, and that he had played at Taylors's on Good Friday; which the defendant, at the trial of the present action, called witnesses to negative. This evidence the C. J. (Best) who tried the cause, held insufficient to shew a want of probable cause, and nonsuited the plaintiff. A new trial was granted on the ground, that, although the onus of proof in such actions lies on the plaintiff, sufficient prima facie evidence was given to impose upon the plaintiff the necessity of shewing, that he had probable cause. Particular stress was laid upon the circumstance of his being the chief witness himself, and not having appeared at the trial of the indictment.

At the trial of the cause, the learned Chief Justice allowed a shorthand writer to be examined as to the testimony of witnesses given at the trial of the indictment: Held, not to be evidence, and that the witnesses themselves should have been called. 6 Bing. 183.

Crocker vs. Molyneux.

A servant being engaged for a year at thirty guineas, and a suit of clothes, was provided with a suit of clothes, on entering the service; he was wrongfully turned away within the year: Held, that he could not maintain trover for the clothes. 3 Carr. & Payne, 470.

Galliers vs. Moss.

Mortgaged estates do not pass by the general words of a devise, sufficiently large to include them, but conveying the property to trustees with a variety of limitations not properly applicable to mortgaged property, but more applicable to property of which the party making the disposition was the sole and exclusive owner. Neither does the mortgaged property pass by a bequest (to certain persons named executors, their executors, administrators and assigns upon trust to sell) of all the testator's stock in trade, securities for money, debts, personal estate and effects of what nature or kind soever. 9 Barn. & Cress. 267.

[The precise words of this last bequest were, upon trust that the executors or the survivor, or the heirs, executors, administrators or assigns of such survivor, should sell—but the word heirs was held to apply to other trusts of the will.]

Jones vs. Yates.

A. being a partner in the two firms of A. and D., and A. and B. C. indorsed bills and paid over money (the property of the firm of D. and A.) to the firm of A. B. and C., in discharge of a debt due from himself individually to that firm. Immediately after the indorsement of the bills to A. B. and C., A. indorsed the bills to a creditor of that firm. It appeared that B. was privy to the fraud: but the Court intimated an opinion that privity was immaterial, and held that the firm of A. and D. could not recover either the bills or the money; because a party, whether suing jointly or individually, could not rescind his own act, on the ground that such act was a fraud on some other person. 9 Barn & Cress. 532.

[Lord Tenterden, C. J. remarked that the defrauded partner might perhaps have a remedy in equity by a suit against his partner and the party joining in the fraud.]

Carolina Bank vs. Case.

A. B. and C. carried on business in partnership as factors, A. and B. in England under the firm of A. C., and Co., and C. in America, in the name of C. only; C. had written instructions from his partners, stating, 'It is understood, that our names are not to appear on either bills or notes for the accomodation of others, and that they should appear as little as possible on paper at all, and then only as regards direct transactions with the house here.' C. having obtained a consignment from D. in America, indorsed bills in his own name for him, to provide for which, B. drew other bills on A. C. and Co. in England, which were to be paid out of the proceeds of the consignment. Before the latter bills were presented for acceptance, A. and B. became bankrupts: Held, that the indorsement of the first bills by C. was the indorsement of the firm, and all the partners were liable as indorsers of those bills. 2 Man. & Ryl. 459.

Jones vs. Hunter.

Semble, that in an action against three partners, the non-liability of one, who had pleaded his bankruptcy and certificate, and as to whom a nolle prosequi had been entered, could not be set up as a defence by the others who were liable. 1 Danson & Lloyd, 214.

Hammond vs. Teague.

In assumpsit for money had and received, money paid, &c, the Court refused to allow in addition to the general issue a plea stating, that the plaintiff and defendant and others were partners in a mining company, and the money was employed by them for the purposes of the company;—Gaselee, J. saying that 'the practice was to allow secondary pleas of matters which might be given in evidence under the general issue only where such matters are simple and single.' 6 Bing. 198.

Fowler vs. Coster.

Plea in abatement, in assumpsit, that promises were made jointly with A. Replication that they were not made jointly with A., on the trial of this issue, the defendant begins. 3 Carr. & Payne, 463.

Cooper vs. Wakley.

If, in an action of libel, the defendant plead justifications, without pleading the general issue, and the affirmative of the issue be on the defendant, he is entitled to begin, and the plaintiff has not a right to begin, with a view of proving the amount of his damages. 3 Carr. & Payne. 474.

Cotter vs. James.

In trespass for taking goods, the defendant, pleaded (without the general issue,) a justification under the warrant of commissioners of bankrupt, and averred, that the plaintiff had become bankrupt within the true intent and meaning of the stat. 6 Geo. 4. c. 16. Replication, denying that the plaintiff became bankrupt: Held, that the defendant had the right to begin. 3 Carr. & Payne, 505.

Fish vs. Travers.

In trespass, where there are several pleas of justification, but no plea of the general issue, the defendant is entitled to begin, although the declaration alleges special damage. 3 Carr. & Payne 578.

Sculby vs. Pickford.

In assumpsit for work done, the counsel for the plaintiff proved the work done, and relied entirely on the quantum meruit count. The defendant set up a contract, by which the work was to be done for little more than a third of the value proved by the plaintiff. The plaintiff then proposed to call witnesses to prove that by this contract she was to be paid more than the contract (in the first instance) specified, in case the work exceeded a certain quantity. Held, that it was not competent to the plaintiff to do this; that she should have relied on the contract in the first instance. 2 Moore & Payne, 545.

MAINE.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Vol. 5, of Greenleaf's Reports contains the cases decided from May 1827, to April 1829.

Griffin vs. Derby.

Where R the son of D, bargained with the plaintiff for a yoke of oxen, giving his promissory note payable in six months for the price, under an agreement that the oxen should be his own if the note was paid at its maturity, otherwise the plaintiff should take them back, and the son afterwards exchanged them with a stranger, for other oxen, and then absconded, leaving on the farm of D his father, with whom he had dwelt, the oxen thus obtained; and the note being due and unpaid, the plaintiff called on D for the oxen, who replied —'if you will be easy for a fortnight, I will become accountable for the oxen which R had, and bring you the money;' this was held to be an original undertaking of D, and so not within the statute of frauds.

Usher vs. Hazeltine.

Where a farmer made a conveyance of his farm to his son in consideration of the son's bond to support him during his life, retaining in his own hands personal property to a greater amount than the debts he owed at the time; this conveyance was held good, there being no proof of actual fraud; although some of the personal property was exempt from attachment; and although after his decease, in consequence of the charges of administration, and of the sum allowed by the Judge of Probate to the widow, the estate proved insolvent.

If a creditor will blend in one suit debts accrued partly before and partly after a conveyance which he would impeach as fraudulent, and has one judgment for them all; he can come in only in the character of a subsequent creditor.

Fryeburg canal vs. Frye.

The statutes relating to the Fryeburg canal, are private statutes.

The remedy by complaint, given in the statutes relating to the Fryeburg canal is cumulative, not precluding a resort to the process of the common law, nor to the statute-remedy by arbitration.

Estes vs Troy.

Ten years' user of a way by the inhabitants of a town, is not sufficient to oblige them to keep it in repair.

The State vs. Kittery.

Towns are punishable by information for not opening public highways newly laid out, as well as for not keeping them afterwards in repair.

Templeton vs. Cram & al.

An action for breach of a promise of marriage, by a feme sole, was compromised by her attorney, after her marriage to another person, by taking the defendant's promissory note, payable to her by her maiden name; both the attorney and the defendant being ignorant of the marriage. In an action by the husband in his own name upon this note, it was held good.

Webster's case.

An indictment not certified to be 'a true bill,' though signed by the foreman of the grand jury, is bad.

Strout & al. vs. Bradbury & al.

Where a defendant, having judgment and execution for his costs, caused certain property to be taken in execution, which was replevied, but the replevin was not pursued;—it was held that his remedy against the indorser of the original writ was not impaired by his omitting to obtain judgment for a return, it appearing that this would have been fruitless, as the property was under a prior attachment.

If the indorsement of a writ does not contain the whole christian name, and is not objected to by the defendant on that account, the indorser cannot afterwards take advantage of this omission to avoid his own liability.

Dodge vs. Bartol & als.

The owner of a vessel is not liable to contribution for the jettison of goods laden on deck.

White vs. Philbrick.

A judgment in trover, if execution be sued out thereon, though without satisfaction, is a bar to an action of trespass afterwards brought by the same plaintiff, against another person, for taking the same goods.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

SUPERIOR COURT OF JUDICATURE.

Vol. 4 contains the cases decided from January, 1827, to May, 1829.

Walker v. Wilson.

In a writ of entry the tenant pleaded non-tenure, to which the demandant replied an entry claiming a freehold upon which issue was joined. The demandant showed that he went to the land and requested the tenant who resided on the land in the family of J. R., to surrender the possession, to which she replied that she had no possession to surrender, but she remained upon the land; it was held that this evidence was sufficient to maintain the issue on the part of the demandant.

Waldron v. Tuttle.

A deed thirty years old, is an ancient deed, and may be read in evidence without proof of its execution, provided possession of the land has constantly attended it.

Hearsay evidence is admissible to prove a pedigree—but this exception to a general rule is confined to what deceased relations, who had no interest to misrepresent, have been heard to say.

Barker v. Clark.

A claimed a right of way, founded on an uninterrupted use of the same for more than twenty years, through the close of B—it was held to be competent evidence to rebut the presumption of a grant from the use, that B had within the twenty years ploughed up the way declaring that A had no right, although A was not present when the declaration was made.

Pritchard v. Brown.

A resulting trust may be shown by parol evidence.

When the consideration money is expressed in a deed of conveyance to be paid by the grantee, evidence that the money belonged to a third person does not go to contradict the deed.

Any person who buys land, while there is a cestui que trust in possession, will be presumed to have had notice of the trust.

Lyman v. Lull.

In debt by a town upon a bond with condition to save the town harmless from the support of an illegitimate child, the breach of the condition was, that the town had expended $20 for the support of the child, upon which issue was joined—evidence that the child had been supported several weeks at the expense of the town, was held sufficient to maintain this issue on the part of the town although no money had been actually paid by the town for the support.

A plea, in such a case, that adequate provision had been made for the support of the child, of which the town had notice, without an averment that the child was in the custody of the town, and that the town refused to let the defendant support it, is no answer to the action.

Brown v. Webster.

In replevin for a horse by D. B. against W., the defendant pleaded in bar that the horse was the property of one T. and not of the plaintiff, and issue was joined on the plaintiff's property—it was held, that evidence offered by the defendant upon this issue that the horse was the property of one D. B., jun. was improperly rejected, because, although the defendant made no claim to the horse under D. B., jun. still, the evidence might have a tendency to disprove the plaintiff's property in the horse.

Sanborn v. Neilson.

An offer of a sum of money by a party, by way of compromise of an existing controversy, is not to be used as evidence against him.

But an admission of a particular fact, made during a treaty for a compromise, may be given in evidence as a confession.

In an action for criminal conversation with the plaintiff's wife, evidence that the character of the wife for chastity was bad before she was married to him, that the plaintiff had lived with her after he had notice of her improper intercourse with the defendant, that he had connived at her intimacy with other men, or that the plaintiff had been improperly intimate with other women, is no answer to the action, but goes only in mitigation of the damages.

But if a husband suffer his wife to live openly and publicly as a prostitute, and a man is thereby drawn into criminal conversation with her, no action lies.

And in such a case, the jury may be properly instructed to look not only to the character and conduct of the husband and wife to determine what such a husband ought to recover for criminal conversation with such a wife, but to the conduct of the defendant to determine what he ought to pay.

Cooper v. Bisbee.

Where an officer in his return of an extent of an execution upon land, stated that he commenced the extent within thirty days after judgment, but did not state the day when he commenced, it was held that the return was not sufficient to show an extent within thirty days after judgment.

Where an officer in his return of an extent stated that he chose two of the appraisers, the debtor not being within the state, nor within his knowledge, the return was held to be sufficient.

In such a case it is not necessary, that the return should state that one of the appraisers was chosen for the debtor.

Pritchard v. Brown.

The interest of a cestui que trust in land, will pass by the extent of an execution upon the land as his etsate.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1830.

We give to our readers this week a part of the last speech of Mr Brougham on the English Law Reforms, and shall publish the remainder next week. It will be read with interest by every Lawyer who is desirous of knowing the nature and extent of the great changes and innovations which are taking place in the system of English Jurisprudence. We believe those changes are not to be confined to that Country. They will be, and they should be, felt here. What has been taken upon trust should be examined, and what is not founded in principle should be discarded. The work of reformation with us is easy. It yet remains to be seen with how much safety to her political, England may break in upon and reorganize her legal institutions. It may prove dangerous to the whole to attempt to reform a single department of that Government. 'The English (says Chancellor Kent) put more to hazard in meddling with their jurisprudence than any other European nation; and they ought to be more jealous than any other, of the spirit of innovation and codification which are abroad in the land. When a free people have their constitution and system of laws pretty well established, construed and understood; when their usages and habits of business have accommodated themselves to their institutions, and especially when they are secure in their persons and property, under an able and impartial administration of justice, they ought, above all things, to beware of theory, for 'in that way madness lies.'

Our institutions are, however, held together by no such dependences. We are in no danger of sacrificing what is essential by an attempt to reject what is useless or pernicious. We can cast off the form without endangering the substance. And we hope the time is not far distant when our Courts will not feel themselves shackled by technicalities which are no longer to be tolerated anywhere, much less in a Country like ours;—and when the course of justice shall no longer be clogged up by the entanglements of useless forms and legal subtleties which originated in ignorance and have been perpetuated by prejudice. As a general rule the administration of justice in our Country is liberal and safe. The labor of a few more such Judges as Marshall, Kent, and Parker would give to our jurisprudence a symmetry and consistence, a perspicuity of arrangement and a completeness of effect, which could not fail to meet the wants and complicated demands of this free, great and busy community.

It would have been thought quite unpardonable twenty years since for a Lawyer to have expressed a doubt of the indispensableness of the System of Special Pleading to the safe administration of Justice in our Courts. It was regarded no less essential, than elaborate and abounding in astute learning and profound logic. But who now thinks of thrusting his student into the midst of its mysteries the moment he enters his office? Any Lawyer would as soon doom him to plod from Michaelmas to Michaelmas upon Coke's first Institute,—where many a desponding tyro has been kept till he has been ready to renounce his books and vocation. The truth is, that much of the latter has become 'dead matter'—and is only interesting as a subject of antiquarian research; while the former has been found quite too cumbersome and refined for our condition, and 'has fallen into very considerable disuse and neglect in almost every part of the country without the prospect, or perhaps the hopes of revival.'* Let us strip our practice of the pedantic follies and metaphysical abstruseness and puzzles which were engrafted upon the English Law at the same time and by the same men, who, by their vast and vigorous intellects, laid the foundation and embodied the elements of an imperishable system of Jurisprudence. But while we reject these, let us retain and abide by, as our sure guides, the great and unchanging elementary principles of law and equity, which we trace back to their age, and which give such ample proof of that 'robustness and vigor of intellect and plenitude of ideas, which throw their successors far behind them in individual attainment and exertion.'

* 4 Kent Com., p. 528.

Kent's Commentaries, Vol. 4th.—When after twentyfive years of distinguished usefulness as a Judge at Law and in Equity in the State of New York, it became necessary, by the Act of Limitation, that Chancellor Kent should retire from the Bench, it was everywhere regarded as a calamity. He was then in the enjoyment of health and of all his faculties in their fullest and most vigorous exercise. That event, however, has proved most propitious to that Gentleman himself and most fortunate to the country.

His Commentaries on American Law, which are now complete, can but prove a most valuable acquisition to the science and profession of Law. They are replete with the wisdom of experience, and rich in the exuberance of learning and variety of acquirement which they everywhere exhibit. The last volume has been recently published, and as many of our readers may not have seen it, we give the Contents below.

LEC. 53.—OF ESTATES IN FEE.

1, of Fee Simple,
2, of Qualified Fees,
3, of conditional fees,
4, of fee tail.

LEC. 54.—OF ESTATES FOR LIFE.

1, Estates for life by agreement,
2, Tenancy by the courtesy,
3, Dower.
  1, of what estate the wife may be endowed,
  2, in what way dower will be defeated,
  3, how dower may be barred,
  4, the manner of assigning dower,
  5, incidents to the right of dower.

LEC. 55.—OF ESTATES FOR YEARS AT WILL OR AT SUFFERANCE.

1, of estates for years,
2, extinguished by merger,
3, " by surrender,
4, of estates at will,
5, of estates at sufferance.

IEC. 56.—OF ESTATES UPON CONDITION.

1, of conditions in law,
2, of conditions in deed.

LEC. 57.—OF THE LAW OF MORTGAGE.

1, of the origin and general nature of mortgages,
2, of the mortgagor's estate, and equity of redemption,
3, of the estate and rights of the mortgagee,
4, of foreclosure.

LEC. 58.—OF ESTATES IN REMAINDERS.

1, of the general nature of remainders,
2, of vested remainders,
3, of the nature and variety of contingent remainders,
4, of the rule in Shelley's case,
5, of the particular estate requisite to support a remainder,
6, of remainders limited by way of use,
7, of the time within which a contingent remainder must vest,
8, of some remaining properties of contingent remainders.

LEC. 59.—OF EXECUTORY DEVISES.

1, of the history of executory devises,
2, of the several kinds, and general qualities of executory devises,
3, of executory devises limited upon failure of heirs or issue,
4, of other matters relating to executory devises.

LEC. 60.—OF USES AND TRUSTS.

1, of uses,
2, of trusts.

LEC. 61.—OF POWERS.

1, of the general nature and division of powers,
2, of the creation of powers,
3, of the execution of powers,
4, of the extinguishment of powers.

LEC. 62.—OF ESTATES IN REVERSION.

LEC. 63.—OF A JOINT INTEREST IN LAND.

1, of joint tenants,
2, copartners,
3, tenants in common.

LEC. 64.—OF TITLE BY DESCENT.

1st rule, lineals in equal degree,
2, " unequal degree,
3, " parents,
4, " brothers and sisters,
5. " grand parents,
6, " uncles and aunts,
7, " ex parte paterna, et materna,
8, " next of kin.
  1, posthumous children,
  2, computation of degrees,
  3, bastards,
  4, advancement to a child,
  5, marshalling assets.

LEC. 65.—OF TITLE BY ESCHEAT, BY FORFEITURE, AND BY EXECUTION.

1, of title by escheat,
2, of title by forfeiture,
3, of title by execution.

LEC. 66.—OF TITLE BY DEED,

I. Of the history of the law of alienation,
II. Of the purchase of pretended titles,
III. Of the execution of the deed,
  1, to be in writing, and signed, and sealed,
  2, delivered,
  3, recorded,
IV. Of the componant parts of a deed,
  1, form of the deed,
  2, parties,
  3, consideration,
  4, description of the premises,
  5, habendum,
  6, usual covenants,
V. of the several species of conveyance.
  1. of feoffment,
  2, of grant,
  3, of covenant to stand seised,
  4, of lease and release,
  5, of bargain and sale,
  6, of fines and recoveries.

LEC. 67.—OF TITLE BY WILL, OR DEVISE.

1, of the history of devises,
2, of the parties to a devise,
3, of things devisable,
4, the execution and revocation of wills,
5, of the construction of wills.

PROPOSALS for publishing by subscription an ANALYTICAL DIGEST OF ALL THE AMERICAN REPORTS. By WILLIAM HILLIARD, Jr. Counsellor at Law. Revised by BENJAMIN RAND, Counsellor at Law.

The study of American Jurisprudence will always form an essential part of the education of every accomplished American Lawyer. And to the practitioner, as well as to the jurist, the decisions of the various Courts of Law and Equity in the United States, are daily becoming more important. The Jurisprudence of the several States, with a single exception, is founded upon the Common Law of England. On most subjects of general importance, there is a great similarity in the legislative enactments of the several States. And the judicial decisions of the Courts of the several States, are often cited and respected as authorities in the Courts of other States than those in which they were pronounced. The decisions upon local or statutory law, merely, are comparatively few, and even in these, from the similarity in the statutes and usages of the several States, precedents and analogies may be found, of general application. Few, perhaps, are aware of the number of volumes of American Reports, which now exceeds two hundred and fifty. It is believed that an Analytical Digest of these Reports, upon the plan of Mr Jeremy's consolidated Digest of the English Reports, is a desideratum. The advantages of such a digest, judiciously arranged, so as to bring into one view all the adjudications of all the Courts in the United States, upon each particular subject, will be duly appreciated by every practical lawyer. It is intended that the work shall contain all the reported cases to the time of publication, without any exceptions; and a Supplement containing the subsequent decisions will be published annually.

The work will be published with despatch.

---

The work will be printed on a beautiful small type, and good paper, and will be comprised in four or five volumes, (probably not exceeding four,) royal octavo size, each volume to contain about 1000 pages; and will be delivered to subscribers at $5 per volume, in good law sheep binding, which is a very low price for a law work embracing so great a quantity of matter.

After publication the price of the work will be raised to $6 per volume.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From Hon. JOSEPH STORY, Judge of the Supreme Court of the U. S.; and Hon. ISAAC PARKER, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts.

The proposal of Mr Hilliard, to publish a uniform Digest of all the American Reports, upon the plan of the English Digest of Mr Jeremy, appears to me to be entitled to the patronage of the profession. No work of this kind, sufficiently accurate and extensive for general practice, at present exists. The want of one cannot but be felt by every lawyer, whose inquiries reach beyond the limits of the local law of his own State. Such a compilation, executed with the care, fidelity and ability, which so important a task demands, would be so highly useful, that it could scarcely fail of general approbation. As far as I have had the means of comprehending the plan of Mr Hilliard, from a personal communication with him, it appears to me entirely satisfactory. And the assistance and supervision of so distinguished a lawyer as Mr Rand, cannot but ensure an accuracy and completeness in the execution of the plan, correspondent with his just claims on the public confidence.

JOSEPH STORY.

---

I have no doubt the Digest proposed by Mr Hilliard will be highly useful, and that it will have a tendency to relieve the profession from the great labor of looking through hundreds of volumes, or of indices, to ascertain whether points sought for have been treated of and decided. I also feel assured that Mr Hilliard's professional acquirements, and assiduity in legal researches, qualify him to give such a book, under the revision proposed, all the usefulness which the plan suggests.

July 10. ISAAC PARKER.

---

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of administering and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire: and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Price $1,25.

Aug. 20.

---

NEW LAW BOOKS.—JOHN GRIGG, No. 9 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia, has just published the following valuable works.

CONDENSED REPORTS of CASES decided in the SUPREME COURT of the United States, from the organization of the Court at August term 1791, to January term 1828. Edited by Richard Peters, Counsellor at Law, and Reporter of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

This work is intended to contain the opinions of the Supreme Court, in the language of the Judges, in every case decided in that court from the establishment of the Government of the United States, to the commencement of Mr Peters's Reports at January term 1828. The reported decisions in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, upon similar points, are also collected and digested in the work, as notes; and abstracts of those Cases, and also of the collateral decisions of the Supreme Court are given, so that the Professional Gentleman and the Student will be in possession of all the adjudicated Law of all the Courts of the United States, in an authoritative, condensed, and arranged form.

The work will be contained in not more than six volumes; the first volume is now published; the second volume will be published about the 1st of August, and the balance of the work during the present year and 1831.

Those who wish to possess this work will do well to make an early application as the greatest portion of the edition is taken up by subscription. They are for sale by the principal Booksellers in the United States, with J. Griggs's other law publications.

Price six dollars to those who subscribe, and seven dollars to non-subscribers, payable on delivery of each volume.

PETERS' REPORTS.—Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Supreme Court of the United States, by Richard Peters, Esquire, Reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, 4 vols. royal 8vo.

FONBLANQUE'S Celebrated TREATISE ON EQUITY. A new edition, with considerable additions, from the last London edition, by a distinguished Member of the Philadelphia Bar, in 1 vol. royal 8vo.

CHITTY ON CONTRACTS. A new and Practical Treatise on the Law of Contracts not under Seal, and upon the usual Defences to Actions thereon, with Corrections and Additional References. By a member of the Massachusetts Bar, in 1 vol. 8vo.

SAUNDER'S REPORTS, in 3 vols. 8vo. The 4th American, from the 5th considerably enlarged London edition.

Say's Political Economy, new edition.

TOLLER'S LAW OF EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS. With notes and references to American Authorities, by E. D. Ingrah m, Esq. new edition, in 1 vol. 8vo.

Sugden on the Law of Vendors in 1 vol. 8vo.

Jones on Bailments in 1 vol. 8vo.

CHANCERY REPORTS. JOHN GRIGG, has in press the Decisions of the English Chancery Reports, upon the plan which has been adopted and successfully executed with the 'English Common Law Reports.' The work will comprehend, in a condensed form, all the Reports which have not been republished in the United States; and it will be continued, so as to present to the profession, annually, the Chancery Reports as they shall hereafter appear in Great Britain.

The work will also contain references to the decisions of the chancery courts of the United States, and of the several states.

---

GRAY & BOWEN have received by late arrivals the following valuable Foreign Books, which they will sell at low prices.

Dibdin's Library Companion, second edition, one large 8vo. vol.

Bowring's Poetry of the Magyars.

Moore's Byron. Splendid quarto edition.

Belzoni's Researches in Egypt and Nubia.

Description of the Ruins of an Ancient City in South America, with plates.

Memoires de M. De Bourrienne, 10 vols.

Histoire De France. Par M. Bignon, 4 vols.

Dictionnaire de Maximes. Par J. L. Malire, 1 vol.

Histoire du Congress de Vienne, 3 vols. 8vo.

Lafayette en Amerique, with Plates, 2 vols. 8vo.

The Works of Lope de Vega, 21 vols. quarto, fine edition.

Obras de Quevedo, 11 vols.

Don Quixotte, 5 vols.

Las Eroticas Villegas, 2 vols.

Trabajos de Persiles y Sigismanda, 2 vols.

Teatro Italiano Antico, 8 vols. July 10.

---

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. This day published by HILLIARD, GRAY, & Co. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law: being a continuation of the Digest of Massachusetts Reports; and also a continuation of Metcalf's Digest of the same work. Neatly bound in Sheep, $3,50—Calf, $4,00.

---

DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS, TO WIT: District Clerk's Office.

BE it remembered, that on the seventeenth day of August, A. D. 1830, in the fiftyfifth year of the Independence of the United States of America, Lewis Bigelow of the said district, has deposited in this office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as proprietor in the words following, to wit:

'A Digest of Pickering's Reports, volumes II.—VII., being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law.'

In conformity to the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned;' and also to an act entitled, 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled, 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned,' and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints.'

JNO. W. DAVIS, { Clerk of the District of Massachusetts.

---

NOW PUBLISHING, BY CARTER & HENDEE, A SERIES OF SCIENTIFIC TRACTS, designed for Instruction and Entertainment, and adapted to Schools, Lyceums and Families. Conducted by Josiah Holbrook and others.

The whole Series will contain simple and clear outlines of the various sciences, and their principal division, with their application to the common purposes of life.

TERMS.—Not less than 24 numbers of a 12mo size, containing 24 pages each, will be published in a year, at $1,50, payable in advance. July 10.

---

CARTER AND HENDEE have in Press, SELF EDUCATION; or, THE MEANS OF MORAL PROGRESS, Translated from the French of M. Le Baron Degerando. To this work was awarded the honor of being 'crowned' by the French Academy; a distinction annually confered on one or two works, deemed the most useful that have been published during the year. And a late Review remarks; 'We have no ethical work of any living English writer to be compared with that of Degerando.'

VIEW OF THE UNITED STATES, for the use of Schools, with Maps and numerous Engravings.

INFANT SCHOOL MANUAL, or Teacher's Assistant Second Edition. Enlarged and much improved.

SCRAP TABLE, containing Original Anecdotes and Sketches.

YOUNG LADY'S BOOK, with 700 engravings on wood, of a superior quality, intended as an Annual for 1831.

THE YOUTH'S KEEPSAKE, a Christmas and New Year's Offering for 1831.

A NEW COLLECTION OF PSALMS AND HYMNS, for Public Worship. By Rev. F. W. P. Greenwood.

---

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. Complete sets of this work (thirty volumes in all) can now be had, on application to the Publishers, on liberal terms. The number and variety of the topics discussed in this work, and the high reputation it enjoys both in this country and Europe, render it a most valuable addition to the library of literary men. A General Index of the first twentyfive volumes has also been published, in a style to match with the current volumes of the work.

Subscribers and others whose sets may be deficient, can be supplied with the missing numbers. Subscriptions to commence at any period, received at $5 per annum. GRAY & BOWEN.

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

---

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1830. NO. IX.

MERCANTILE LAW.

NO. III.

[Continued.]

But a separation may take place, and that under various circumstances. What effect then will this produce on the rights and obligations of both? If the marriage be annulled by a court of competent jurisdiction for some original vice of the contract or solemnization, the parties, never having been married in contemplation of law, have the same rights and liabilities as to all engagements made with third persons during the period of cohabitation, which they would have had, if they had remained single in fact. Still, it cannot be doubted that for necessaries supplied, during the period of cohabitation, to the supposed wife, the nominal husband would, on the ground of a presumed authority, be liable even after the dissolution.* A divorce on account of adultery puts an end to the marriage, and therefore to its consequences, from the period of the sentence: but a separation à mensa et thoro does not affect the legal relations of the parties, and the wife therefore, though living apart from her husband, and upon her own resources, is not liable upon her contracts.† Hitherto the rule is simple; but the question as to the liability of the husband, for necessaries supplied to the wife in case of separation without divorce, has something about it of more intricacy. The following distinctions seem, however, to be now settled. 1. When the separation is by mutual consent, if competent provision be made by the husband for the maintenance of his wife, either by deed or verbal agreement, he is not liable;‡ provided that in the latter case payment has been made,§ or in the former, that the trustees have taken possession under the deed.‖ 2. Where the separation is in consequence of the adultery of the wife,¶ or, if during separation caused by other circumstances, even the fault of the husband, she has been guilty of adultery, in either of these cases, he is thenceforth released from all obligation to provide her even with the bare necessaries of life.†† The separation, however, whether by consent, or by the fault of his wife, must be notorious, else the presumption of authority from the husband remains.* 3. Where the wife has voluntarily quitted her husband's roof, and has not committed adultery, he may discharge his liability by a particular notice, but not by a general advertisement.† But, lastly, where the separation is occasioned by the misconduct of the husband, his responsibility for necessaries furnished for his wife's support, so long as she preserves her own fidelity, remains under all circumstances. He cannot divest himself of it either by a general advertisement or a particular notice, for the law will permit no man to take advantage of his own wrong.‡ It may be collected from what has been already said, that in none of these cases can the wife herself be sued either at law or in equity, and the tradesman, therefore, who gives credit to a married woman, has need to satisfy himself previously, by careful inquiry, of the circumstances of the party, or he does so at his peril.

There are, however, some few cases in which a woman, though married, is treated as a single woman (or, as the law terms it, a feme sole), whose contracts are binding on herself. These are, first, where the husband is, in contemplation of law, no longer in existence, as when undergoing a judicial sentence of transportation.§ 2. Where the husband is a foreigner, or alien, who has never been in this country at all;‖ for if he has once resided here, it seems the legal inference is, that he intends to return,¶ and in that case the personal responsibility of the wife does not attach. 3, Where he has been absent and not heard of for a period of seven years, the law in such case presuming that he is dead. It need scarcely be added, that a married woman is not recognized as a trader. Yet, in the city of London, she may, by peculiar custom, carry on a trade separately and on her own account; and, if the husband do not interfere in it, she may, as to all the transactions connected with that business, be treated as a single woman,* except that in the suits, which are brought against her,† in her capacity of feme sole trader (for so she is designated) the husband must be made a party for conformity.‡

But the wife may have entered into contracts before her marriage, the effects of which remain after the marriage. And on this subject it may be sufficient briefly to remark, that the husband by the marriage, gains the right to sue, in conjunction with his wife, on such contracts—that the fruits of them become absolutely his by possession‖—but that if he omit, during the life-time of the wife, to reduce the right into possession, he cannot afterwards claim in his own right, but merely as the representative and administrator of the wife. In like manner he is liable, upon the contracts of the wife made before coverture, only while the marriage continues, and jointly with her. After her death, his personal responsibility upon them ceases altogether. It follows, that if the wife survive the husband, she may in the former case sue, and in the latter be sued, alone. There is, moreover, one instance, and but one, in which the wife may sue after the death of the husband, in her own right, upon a contract entered into during her marriage; and that is, when she is herself what is termed the meritorious cause of the contract; as when a service has been rendered by her personal exertion, for which a stipulated remuneration has been promised. It is of rare occurrence, and might scarcely have been deemed worthy of mention, had it not been an anomaly in the law, for which there seems no sound or intelligible reason.

In concluding this subject it may not be useless to remark, that, although property may be settled in various ways, so as to be subject to the disposition of married women, yet that this is not inconsistent with a general incapacity to content. It must be regarded rather as a modification of the particular property, drawing after it none of those consequences of personal liability, which are inseparable from the nature of a contract.

But in order to constitute an agreement, there must not only be a power of willing, but a free and bonâ fide exercise of the will. Reason declares that where undue constraint is put upon the inclination, the party suffering it, though he may, in order to avoid a present evil, have assented, cannot be considered as having agreed, to the terms so forced upon him. Violence offered to the will is termed in our law duress; and it is a gratifying instance of the advance of civilization, that in the modern reports scarcely a case can be found upon a subject which, in the ancient books,

---

*It has been decided that if a man cohabit with a woman, holding her out to the world as his wife, he is liable for goods furnished to her, even by a tradesman who knew that the parties were not married. 2 Esp. N. P. C. 637. 1 Campb. 246. 4 Campb. 215. This must have proceeded on a presumed agency of the nominal wife, and is therefore a stronger case than the one supposed.

† 6 M. & S. 73. 3 B. & C. 291. The courts of common law at one time assumed to themselves the extraordinary discretion of determining, that, where a married woman by agreement lived apart from her husband, and had a separate maintenance settled upon her by deed, her general disability was removed, and her contracts became equally obligatory with those of other persons. See the case cited 1 T. R. 5. But this doctrine, which was long doubted, was at last exploded, and the law restored to its former consistency, by the case of Marshall v. Rutton, 8 T. R. 545.

‡ Lord Raymond, 444. Salk. 116. 2 New Rep. 148. 4 Campb. 70. 4 B. & A. 252.

§ 3 Campb. 370. 2 Stark. N. P. C. 86.

‖ 8 Taunt. 343.

¶ Ham v. Towey, cited in Selwyn's N. P. Assumpsit.

Strange, 647. 706.

†† There is a case reported, in which, although the husband had been guilty of adultery with a woman whom he brought to his home, and had turned his wife out of doors without any imputation on her conduct, yet because the wife subsequently, during the separation, committed an act of adultery, the husband was held not liable for necessaries furnished to her. Govier v. Hancock, 6 T. R. 603. This is most harsh and unjust.

* 1 Bos. & Pul. 226.

† 1 Sid. 109. Freeman, 248. Strange, 1214.

‡ This is a beautiful illustration of a rule of law, overcome by a more general rule of reason and equity. The presumption of authority, which is the only legal foundation of the husband's liability, might here be rebutted by the fact: but the law will not listen to the husband, when he would turn his own misconduct to his gain, and estops him, therefore, from setting up such a defence. There has been some difference of opinion whether the introduction of a mistress into the house where the wife is residing, is such misconduct on the part of the husband, as justifies the wife in quitting his roof: and, consequently, whether he is liable for necessaries supplied to her while so living apart. In Hopwood v. Heffer, 3 Taunt. 421, the Court of Common Pleas decided in favor of the husband; but Lord Ellenborough is stated to have held in a subsequent case, that of Aldis v. Chapman, cited in Selwyn's N. P. 281, that he was bound under such circumstances to supply her reasonable wants; and there can, we think, be little doubt on which side justice, humanity, and good sense incline.

§ Co. Lit. 133 a.

‖ 2 Bos. & Pul. 231. 11 East, 303.

¶ 3 Campb. 124.

 1 Bos. & Pul. 359. 3 Esp. N. P, C. 18.

*She may, therefore, be made a bankrupt. 1 Atk. 206. 3 Bur. 1783.

†Which are confined to the courts of London. 4 T. R. 361.

‡ Cro. Car. 67. 10 Mod. 6. 2 Bos. & Pul, 93. 106.

‖Negotiable instruments are in this respect treated as chattels, and not as choses in action. Thus, where a bill of exchange is given to a feme sole who afterwards marries, the right of indorsing vests in the husband, 7 T. R. 348.; and he may sue alone upon a bill payable to the wife dum sola. 1 Brod. & Bingh. 50.

occupies so conspicuous a place. It will, therefore, be sufficient cursorily to remark, that personal violence, or unlawful imprisonment, or threats inducing a reasonable fear of the loss of life or member, or of imprisonment, whereby an engagement is extorted against the will of the party making it, constitute such duress as invalidates it altogether, and leaves it in his choice to fulfil it or not.* It is superfluous to add that the engagement of the party imposing the violence remains obligatory on him. The plea of duress is available only to the person himself who has suffered it; if, therefore, a third person enter into an engagement for the purpose of releasing another from unlawful constraint, he cannot discharge himself on the ground of duress from the obligation which he has contracted.†

*2 Inst. 472. Rol. Abr. 687 43 Ed. 3. 11 Hen. 4. 66, Bac. Abr. (Duress). Threats of violence, or other injury, for which an action in damages might afford a sufficient compensation, are not considered as duress. 2 Inst. 483. 2 Strange, 917.

†1 Rol. Abr. 687. The civil law is copious on the subject of duress. It provided that the person, on whom the violence had been exercised, might, if he pleased, procure the engagament to be annulled by letters of rescission within ten years; after that time he was estopped. Our law has nothing analogous to this mode of proceeding; the violence being a good defence to any suit instituted for enforcing the engagement,

Obituary.

In that apportionment of the means of nature which is in fact infinite calculation, the exact appropriation of talents to the demands of society, by the operation of cases founded upon the individual and social constitution of man, is the most curious and unerring part. As in the supply of our physical wants so in the provision for the intellectual necessities of society, allowance is made for those vicissitudes by which the original appropriation is diminished before it can be applied to use. All the analogies of nature teach us that fine faculties and noble characters must be almost every day blighted in some of the stages between their first germination and the perfection of their fruit. However painful it may be therefore to those who watch the process of development and decay or death, it would seem to be useless to inform society of the particulars of those secret losses and internal waste of resources, which, on general principles, it must be conscious, are constantly taking place in their elaboration. But there are some characters of a class which seem hardly necessary, in the common operations of society, or which belong to a more enlarged and comprehensive part of the system of its progress, which when fully developed and ready to take their place in the world, deserve notice as examples in the natural history of mankind. And if I may judge from the eager curiosity with which we dwell upon the character and untimely fate of the few characters of the sort, whose connexion in youth with those who have lived to become distinguished has introduced them to our notice, there is a sentiment in human nature, which makes them an object of public interest.

Such a person was Edward Jackson Lowell, a member of the Suffolk Bar, lately lost to them and the community, at the early age of twentyfive, and almost at the very hour when he was to have performed his first act of professional duty; and after having lived a life, which, though undistinguished by public exertions, made it privately known exactly how he would have performed it. His place at the head of those of the same standing in a profession of the highest importance in the conduct of society, is a public station, from which it seems due, to those who are acting a similar part, under the influence of similar hopes and objects, that he should not retire unnoticed. A community too of moderate extent, in which the comparative smallness of the final reward which it promises to successful industry and talent is compensated for by its interest and sympathy with it, in all the stages of its progress seems to demand some account of the many valuable qualities and accomplishments which it plainly expected from so many advantages of nature and fortune, a happy constitution of mind and temper, the facilities of a competent fortune, the influences of the best connexions.

A childhood spent partly in Boston, partly in Scotland, and partly at the Andover Academy;—five years and a half in the College and Law School of Harvard University, a winter attendance upon the lectures and private instruction of Chancellor Kent; a year in a counsellor's office in this city; two years profitably spent in study and travel in Europe, and two years of professional seclusion and study, excepting the interruptions of sickness, fill out the short and simple outlines of his life.—The very day on which he was to have opened in an interesting case in one of our highest courts, he became incapable of appearing, from the progress of that decline by which he passed without pain or struggle to his grave.

A habit of patient, systematic and comprehensive study, which was assiduously conformed at all periods, times and places, and in every variety of manner according to the subject and occasion; which books could neither mislead or embarrass, and which pursued, analyzed and digested its materials whenever and in whatever condition found; had rendered him the man of the most information upon his own profession and all the branches relating to it, I have ever met with of his age. Before he went to Europe the progress he made in the common law, and the thirst and industry with which he studied it, raised the highest hopes in his several instructers. While abroad he was perhaps equally industrious in the study of the civil law and of the modern codes and scientific treatises, upon which subjects he had an excellent collection of books in his library.—While in France he took an instructer in the civil and French law; and both in France and in England he attended their courts and legislative assemblies, and paid great attention to the history, theory and operation of their political and legal institutions.

He moreover had a fondness for, and during his whole studious life greatly attended to the study of history, geography, and the belles lettres, and the political, metaphysical and moral sciences. On all those subjects he had a surprisingly judicious collection of books, considering its size. He spoke the French language with elegance, ease and spirit, and the Italian fluently. The Greek he had neglected at College, and postponed the recovery of it to a day which, alas, will never come for him.—He kept up his familiarity with the best Latin authors, to whom he evinced his attachment by his having the best editions of many of them. But though fond of and accomplished in all these studies, the science of law was his favorite study, the practice of it the intended occupation of his life. His mind was not one of those which to be efficient must be directed to a single point, and whose intensity seems to be scattered and wasted by being directed to a multiplicity of objects; but it seemed to derive and concentrate light from every subject which was submitted to it.

The predominant quality of his mind and character was its sense of justice. But it was a sense of justice which not only appreciated and decided rightly upon the materials presented to it, but which could only be satisfied with the most deep and comprehensive method of considering the subject. His instinctive perception of sophistry in argument, or faults in morals were sometimes so surprisingly rapid and intuitive that one could hardly attribute them to anything but a conscientious instinct. In the comprehension of general principles he was liberal and philosophic, in the use of them scientific and clear. He was equally accurate and faithful in the observation and generally in the recollection of details.

He had genius, but it was not of that sort which consists in the possession of any single faculty in that high degree at which it amounts to genius. But it was that kind of genius which results from the happy proportion of several faculties, and which often produces results equally surprising and admirable, and is always more permanently serviceable to society.

He had brilliancy; but not that dazzling brilliancy which seems to be poured out upon and distinct from our thoughts themselves, but that sober and subdued light, which seems to emanate from, and be inbred in the thoughts themselves and which may be called the splendid solidity of the judgment. He possessed no distinct and separate organ of light by whose aid the other faculties surveyed and displayed their subject, but the combination, and order of his thoughts was light itself. In addition to those active and judicial powers of mind, his taste was equally delicate and just; he had a fine sense of the sublime and the beautiful, the noble and the refined both in sentiment and expression, and both in poetry and in the fine arts.

To these qualifications he added enough of that excitability and sensibility of temperament which partly physical and partly moral seems a necessary ingredient in the composition of an orator; a person and face happily suited to his character and adapted to the expression of his feelings; and a voice naturally deep, flexible and melodious. His ambition was not the desire of excelling, but the love of excellence. To show how far he carried his attention to all the requisites to his professional success, he took pains to procure all the best treatises not only upon the arts of oratory and the management of the voice, but upon what may be called the ethics of his profession. He belonged to several Debating Societies—but he always spoke extemporaneously and rather talked than declaimed in their discussions, in which he never was called upon, or exerted himself to display anything more than his good sense.

His character was remarkable for the same justness which distinguished his mind. He was a man of whose secret thoughts one felt as confident as in the correctness of his most considered actions. His very instinct hardly seemed to need the chastisement of his judgment. There was no subdued grossness or impurity in his conceptions, no satirical severity in his temper, no secret mixture of selfishness in his motives. But he was as just and firm a judge of what was due to himself as of what was due to others. His opinions on matters which require a nice sense of delicacy and propriety, were as valuable in their place as those which required the application of his stronger powers of mind. In temper he was generally calm and dignified, but susceptible of warm emotions and that strong indignation which in his mind was the only form of passion. He was in his affairs generous and free; and to the extent of his means elegant in his tastes and habits of life. In manners he was uncommonly well bred and elegant, always remarkable for the manliness and dignity, and often for the playfulness of his manners. In his conversation, which was always easy and spirited, his intimates found all the characteristics of his mind and character. Strong in his own personal attachments, he had in the highest degree all those qualities which attach others. He was easily susceptible of the kindest and noblest emotions, and happy in his conceptions of all those relationships which make life most beautiful and interesting.

In short, he possessed so remarkable a combination of useful and amiable qualities, that all those who have known him well, must agree, that however great the misfortune of losing a person so valuable and so much beloved in all his relations, it seems hardly too high a price to pay for an intimate acquaintance with so admirable a character.

MR BROUGHAM'S SPEECH

ON THE LAW REFORMS.

April, 1830.

Concluded.

From returns which had been laid before the House, it appeared that in the year 1821, 1822, and 1823, not less than 22,000 some odd causes had been brought in the Sheriff's Court in Scotland, the amount being for 5*l.* and upwards, for the smaller jurisdictions took all the smaller actions out of the Sheriff's Court. This was a great amount; but, considering the difference between the extent of litigation in Scotland, as compared with England, the number of actions would be found six times greater in the latter country; so that, if in England the same system were adopted that prevailed in Scotland, the number of causes tried in England in the same period would be 120,000 and some odd hundreds. The number of actions brought before the Sheriff's Court, and in which judgment was pronounced in the absence of the defendant, within the time he had mentioned, was 12,000 some odd hundreds; and the number of causes disposed of in what was called foro contentioso amounted to 9,000. Of all these, the proportion of appeals was as one in 117 in actions brought, and as one in 53 in the number tried. There was an appeal from the Substitute to the Sheriff himself, but the causes were chiefly tried by the Substitute. An estimate might be formed of the extent of property they involved by the fact that, in Lanarkshire—which, including the city of Glasgow, was the most important and populous district in Scotland—no less a sum than 500,000*l.* was disposed of yearly, by legal adjudication. Now, if, with the proportion which he had stated, the adjudication had taken place in England, the amount would be 3,000,000*l.* sterling yearly. He would ask, then, was nothing to be learned from this system, which was found to work so well in Scotland? He would ask, could we not improve our system of judicature—he would not say by adopting the precise form which existed in Scotland, but by recurring to that which had been the ancient law of England?—(hear, hear.) He meant that law which had obtained in the Saxon times, and for a considerable period after the Norman invasion. They ought to see whether this ancient law was not applicable to the mischief which he sought to remedy. He now wished to make a few observations as to the expense of legal proceedings. When the sum pending in a trial before the Sheriff in Scotland was 12*l.* and not upwards, the expense of recovery was 10*s.* where it was 25*l.* and not upwards, the expense was 15*s.* or a little more. When the sum was 100*l.* and not upwards, the expense did not exceed 20*s.* This was the estimate in all cases in which there was no litigation; but even where the parties did come to issue with each other, the expense was quite a trifle. Of the 12*l.* a portion, amounting to 5*l.* might be received, which would reduce the charge of recovery upon the remainder, to 5*s.* that being the whole amount, that the party suing would be out of pocket. When the sum rose to 10*l.* the party would never be more than 10*s.* or 1*s.* in the pound out of pocket; and upon 100*l.* the expense would not go beyond 20*s.* We might well envy our Scotch neighbors, who had all the benefit of a system like this—a system which gave cheap justice to all classes. Cheap it certainly was, when a man might recover 100*l.* for 20*s.* instead, as was the case with us, of being obliged to throw half a hundred pounds away in seeking to secure the remainder. He might ask them whether it would not be expedient to adapt the County Courts of England to the Scotch system? It was altogether an error to suppose that there ought to be an inferior description of justice for inferior suits. It was, however, held by some persons, that when the sum amounted to 100*l.* there ought to be a superior jurisdiction; but when it was only 2*l.*, 3*l.* or 5*l.* it mattered not in what sort of Court the suit was instituted, for the individual who presided there might be called a Judge, an Assessor, or a Commissioner of the Court of Requests. It was equally held to be a matter of indifference, whether that individual afforded a remedy or not, provided the sum was small. No principle could be more erroneous than this. He could never agree to such a proposition, for nothing could be more crude, or more at variance with the first principles of justice, than a distinction between large and small sums, where the question was as to the mode of recovering them. The forty shillings for which a man sued, was of infinitely more consequence to him, so far as the question of justice was concerned, than the importance of which this sum was the measure. He felt it less hurtful to him to lose the amount, than to consider that his case had not been fairly heard; he was therefore resolved to be righted, and would not submit to wrong. A man with such feelings felt as satisfied with a decision given either for or against him in a competent tribunal, however small might be the amount, as the individual did when sued for 100*l.* and upwards. The great object was to satisfy the mind of the party that justice was done to him by the Judge. He (Mr Brougham) would not be understood as wishing to cast any reflections upon the person who administered the law under the present system. It was better to have some place in which suitors might recover than no place at all. So precious a thing was justice, that he preferred having any tribunal, however slovenly—any Judge, however incompetent—to having no tribunal, or no judge at all. It was better that two tradesmen, even uneducated as they might be, should preside in some place, than that parties should be driven to Westminster Hall, where they had not the slightest chance of recovering debts, of so small an amount as 2*l.* without considerable expense. The next observations he had to make regarded the subject of appeals. It appeared to him that no causes, except those of the most trifling nature, ought to be decided by local judicatures, and any man ought to have the power of appeal to a higher tribunal. He therefore much desired to see the appellant jurisdiction extended. He had formerly referred to what he considered very great defects in the appellant jurisdiction, so far as regarded our colonial possessions; and he hoped that in future certain Judges would attend the Privy Council who were acquainted with colonial affairs. With regard to the appellant jurisdiction of the House of Lords, he could not help saying that our fellow-subjects in Scotland had great reason to complain of the manner in which the jurisdiction of that tribunal was constituted with regard to them. It was a great, and, to him, unaccountable anomaly, that a person should be selected—as had been the case since 1705 or 1706—since the union of Scotland with England—that a person should be selected to decide all questions of appeal upon Scotch law who was not of necessity a Scotch lawyer, and who might possibly know nothing at all of the law of Scotland. How this anomaly had been borne so long was to him a mystery. That our brethren in Scotland, who were acute observers of things—who were well acquainted with their own rights, attached to their own interests, and who were said to be not averse to litigation—of course he did not mean to dispute the right of every man to demand justice where he felt occasion—but how they could have submitted to this strange anomaly so long he was at a loss to conceive; and it seemed to him that it could be only ascribed to the accidental circumstances which had attended the exercise of that jurisdiction. There were not many appeals soon after the Union, and then came a succession of Chancellors in England of the highest fame and the most comprehensive knowledge in all branches of the law, whose opinion was paramount in the profession, and who, by universal consent, were at the head of their profession. But, in addition to all these essentials for the character of Judges in generalt, hey had one peculiar qualification which admirably fitted them for the exercise of these functions. They had practised much in Scotch Appeals, and some of them had been intimately connected with Scotland. There was Lord Hardwicke, who was a good Scotch lawyer. There was Lord Mansfield, who was himself a Scotchman, and was amply conversant with the law of that country. There were also Lord Loughborough and Lord Thurlow—Lord Loughborough having practised for many years as a Scotch Advocate. After these came Lord Eldon, who had attained a standing of greater eminence than any Judge since Lord Coke, who was profoundly skilled in jurisprudence, marvellously learned in the English law, and who, to these high qualifications, added an extensive and thorough knowledge of Scotch law, having been employed for 12 or 15 years in almost every appeal which came before the House of Lords from Scotland. To their peculiar fitness for the duty he looked to account for this grievance, and, as it appeared to him, unaccountable anomaly, having been so long borne by the people of Scotland. But if there should ever come a time when a person should be appointed to administer those functions, who possessed but a moderate authority among English lawyers (hear, hear,) and who, the first time he ever saw a Scotch case, was called upon to decide it in the last resort, then the anomaly would remain, but the means of accounting for its being endured would become wholly inexplicable. Let it give offence where it might, he could not but take the first opportunity, as a lawyer, of saying that a revision of the arrangement of appeals on Scotch law in the House of Lords would be a task infinitely worthy of the attention of Parliament. He had drawn the attention of the House from the subject more immediately under consideration, and he would now beg leave to return to it. He should proceed shortly to explain what, as it appeared to him, on the principles which he had stated, ought to be attempted, on some scale at least, if they could not at first and altogether carry into effect the purpose of rendering the system universal, by creating tribunals where cheap justice might be speedily administered in cases which were under a certain extent in point of amount or value. What he would suggest was this—appoint in each county a proper person (a lawyer of so many years' standing) as Judge in the last instance of cases under a certain amount, and in the first instance of those causes which should exceed that amount. Enable a man who sought to recover a debt of 10*l.* or under, to call his adversary before this local Judge, who should examine both parties, dispose of the claim, give his judgment between the parties, award execution, and specify in what time, and by what instalments, that execution should be levied. Above the sum of 10*l.* give the party the power of going before the same local Judge, and of calling his adversary into Court, with the assistance of professional men if they thought fit, without the examination of the parties if they thought fit, and limiting his jurisdiction to the sum of 100*l.* in point of value, but not limiting it in respect of the nature of the causes which should be brought before the Court, with the exception, however, of questions in which the right of freehold, copyhold, or leasehold was involved, giving this Judge jurisdiction in matters of cost as well as of debt, and confining the appeal to those cases which amounted to more than 10*l.* making his decision final up to 10*l.* but rendering his judgment subject to revision in cases above 10*l.* and not exceeding 100*l.* Now in what way was the appeal to be directed? He considered that it would be a great relief to the suitor that the appeal should be, not to the Courts at Westminster Hall, but to the Judges annually, or rather twice a year, going the Circuits for that purpose. There would be one reason, however, against that being the only Court of Appeal. Accidents might often render it undesirable for a party to bring his appeal before the Court of Assize at a particular time; and it would be always desirable to have an option—a competition—so as not to be the suitor either in the original stage of the cause, or in the appeal upon it. He would allow a party (subject to certain restrictions as to costs, which he should mention) to appeal either to the Court at Westminster Hall or to the tribunal in the country.

If a party called his adversary to the more distant tribunal, he should be made to pay double, or in some cases treble costs, if he did not recover the sum which he claimed. He begged leave to say, by way of explanation to his legal Friends, to whom he principally addressed these observations, that when he talked of appeal he meant motions for new trials, and other proceedings of that nature. The local Judge, for instance, or the County Judge or arbitrator—however he should be designated—says he had decided upon a point of law Well, a motion might be made against the decision to the next Judge who went the Assize; or, a verdict had been given against evidence, a motion for a new trial might be made before the same Judge at the Assizes, notice being given by the party making such motion, in order that the other might be able to meet him on the spot, and to instruct Counsel, if necessary; not, however, as in Westminister Hall, by a rule to show cause being first obtained, but rather as in the Courts of Equity, notice being previously given, and then both parties being heard—first, the one and then the other. He had mentioned in his outline trial by Jury; and far be it from him to say that there were not some cases in which that mode of trial might, with great convenience, with manifest and unquestionable benefit, be dispensed with. When he mentioned the name of his venerable and most highly-esteemed friend, Mr Bentham—one whose transcendent merits as a lawyer and a philosopher, but, above all, as the founder of all legal reform in this country—(hear, hear)—would hand down his name to future ages as the first great and efficient purifier of our legal system, when he paid him this humble, but sincere, tribute for the important services which he had rendered to this country during a long, disinterested, and most useful life, he retracted no portion of that acknowledgment; he did in no wise qualify his heartfelt admiration of that high character when he said that he was very far from agreeing with that venerable and learned authority in the whole of his speculations on the subject of the system of jurisprudence. He differed in degree from his friend in many points—he going much further than he (Mr Brougham) was prepared to go; but he also differed from him in kind on some parts of the subject, and on none more than that which regarded trial by Jury. It was not that Mr Bentham was, as was vulgarly and most inaccurately supposed, an enemy to trial by Jury—far from it; but he undervalued its importance in many cases to which he (Mr Brougham) thought it peculiarly fitted, while he was for retaining it in others where it appeared to him (Mr Brougham) that it might be dispensed with. They differed in kind as to the cases to which it was applicable, although they differed in degree upon some other points. Whenever conflicting evidence was to be sifted—whenever you had to find your way through the intricacies of a case by contrasting the evidence on the one side with that upon the other, where it was given inconsistently—whenever documentary evidence was to be compared with parol—whenever circumstances were to be weighed against each other, there being no direct testimony in the case to point conclusively on which side the truth lay, then it appeared to him that trial by Jury was of infinite and incalculable benefit. There was no means in any of these cases of eliciting the truth so effectual as assembling twelve men. He was not devoted to the number twelve; any moderate number of individuals, of various habits of thinking, whose experience had been derived from various quarters—men of different kinds of feeling, and different forms of understanding, to weigh the same circumstances, and then to secure, by a discussion among themselves—paradoxical as it might seem, and irreconcilable on the first blush—a compulsory unanimity in their decision. This unanimity must be produced, because, if the matter were to be decided by the opinion of a majority, would not 'question, question,' be called there, when they became impatient of restraint, as it was in a larger and less judicial assembly—(a laugh). So that there was no more of reaching the truth except this anomalous and apparently paradoxical one. Also in assessing the amount of rational compensation, where the damages could not be stated in the declaration—in cases of defamation, libel, seduction, or other cases where the precise damage could not be specified—this was the only mode of awarding a just compensation. For these reasons he was desirous of retaining trial by Jury in the system which he hoped to see universally established in this country. He trusted that the experiment would be made in some parts of the country before any long time should have passed over. Be had already said that though he thought Jury trial ought not to be abandoned, yet there were many questions in which he admitted it would be more convenient to leave the decision to the Judge; but how to specify these cases by any general definition, he confessed he was at a loss. It was not for want or time or attention, for he had long meditated upon it with all the earnestness of which he was capable, but it did not appear to him that those cases could be so classed as to enable him to say with safety to the general system what cases should be decided by the Judge, and what should be tried by a Jury. He would, however, in all cases under 10*l.* allow the Judge, if upon viewing the case upon the pleadings, which, by the plan suggested by the Law Commissioners, would be materially reduced in extent, and would then speak as they did in former times, and as it was their proper use and object to do so—namely, to tell the very story of the plaintiff and the very story of the defendant, so as to let a person, on reading them, understand fully their import, and to enable the Judge to know what he had to try, and each party to know what he had to allege. When the important improvements suggested by the Commissioners, in their second Report, should be made, and when other improvements should be added to adapt them to the local jurisdiction, and to the moderate amount of the causes, he apprehended there would be no difficulty in the local Judge saying, 'This cause is not fit for a Jury.' But he would impose a restraint upon the Judge in this instance. He would not allow him to say, without any control or responsibility, 'I will have no Jury here,' but if both parties agreed—if the Judge said that a Jury might be dispensed with, and if neither of the parties insisted upon a Jury being impannelled, it might be entrusted to him, and then there could be no evil in vesting in the Judge and the parties jointly the discretion of calling or not calling for a Jury. With respect to the kind of actions to which this regulation should apply, he had already said that whenever a person brought an action, be it for tort or debt, and let the case be of what kind it might, provided the damages were under the sum he had mentioned as the limit of this officer's jurisdiction, he would extend this regulation to such cases. In the present state of our law, the essential and necessary expenses of driving one of the parties from one part of the country to another, and from one country to another, made it a duty imperative upon Parliament to provide some cheap, effectual, and speedy tribunal for rendering justice to the public. That the officer whom he had described ought to be a man of weight from his learning and character, required no argument. That he ought to receive such a salary as would be suitable to his station; and that he ought to work constantly for that salary, appeared to him to be essential to upholding the proper character of that office. He should hold his sitting once a month for 10 months in the year at least. He should sit six times in the principal town in the county, and two of the other four times in each of the two principal villages in the county; so as to carry justice to the door of the individuals, and to enable the most distant to have justice twice a year nearer home. This was an essential part of his plan. He had already stated the case of Scotland. He understood that great benefit had been felt in Ireland since the introduction of Assistant Barristers there in 1795 or 1796. He was informed that the having or not having a Jury was in the discretion of the Assistant Barrister; and that that officer was entitled, in cases under 20*l.* to say that they should be tried by a Jury or not. It appeared essential that notice should be given of a motion for a new trial, before the Judge of Assize. For this purpose the local Judge should always be in attendance at the Assize. He should be in commission with the Judge of Assize, in order that he might possess the due weight in public estimation. He should sit with the Judge when a motion was made against his direction or against a verdict in his Court; and should report to the Judge who would dispose of the question, whether in point of law or fact, he would decide it, if it had been reserved for him, whether upon his decision, upon a particular point, a verdict stand or not. But that he should have no voice in the decision, was the result not only of reasoning upon the subject, but of experience in other cases. He could intend nothing disrespectful to any of the Learned Judges, when he said that, although he conceived it convenient when a motion was made against the direction of the local Judge on a point of law, or against the inclination of his opinion on a point of fact, although he conceived it highly convenient that the local Judge should be then present, yet his having a voice or influence in the award of the Court; his setting himself up to support his own opinion, and, perhaps, his own error—for even Judges might sometimes err—his setting himself up to back in Court the prejudices which he had derived at the trial, was what he (Mr Brougham) altogether objected to; for it was a practice which he had seen operate injuriously, and lead to misdecision in our highest Courts; causing cases to be decided one way, which he was morally certain would have been decided in another, if the cause had come out of a Court which the Judge did not belong to who had ruled the point of law, or directed the verdict. Of this he had had, he would not say constant, but certainly abundant experience; and it led him to the opinion that the local Judge should be present to report his own decision, and to state the grounds of it; but that he should have no authority in disposing of the case. This appeal in cases of error, not to the Court at Westminster, but to the Judge of Assize, would have the effect of superintending and controlling the local Judge, and of preserving the same law in different places, so that there should not be one law in one place, and another in another; or one law for one class, and another for another.

Then came the question of the expense. He did not think it necessary that very large salaries should be given to the officers of those Courts. There ought to be an officer in the nature of a Registrar, an assistant clerk, and one or two ushers. Some establishment of this description was necessary, because, if the system were established at all, it should be constructed so as to be able to do the business. He could not imagine that 1500*l.* a year would be too much as the salary of the local Judge. He saw the Hon. and Learned Gentleman opposite (the Solicitor-General) smile at the amount; but undoubtedly, if we were to have a good lawyer—a man fit for business—whose time was to be purchased out and out—the sum he stated was not too much. He had, indeed, some doubt whether it was not too little; but taking the whole expenses, including the salaries of the Judge, the Registrar, and other officers, the whole amount would be between 120,000 and 130,000*l.* a year. And this sum was not much, when compared with the amount expended in other countries. In France there were from 3,500 to 4,000 local Magistrates, who were to decide all causes in the first instance, where the amount did not exceed 200 francs, or about 8*l.* of our money—and these were maintained at an expense of 121,000*l.* a year. Then came the Tribunals of First Instance in each of the arrondissements, which were 300 or 400 in all, and the Judges of which amounted to about 1,600, and who, besides the Judges de Paix, or local Magistrates, cost 125,000*l.* a year. Then the Courts of Appeal cost from 70,000 to 80,000*l.* a year; and last came the Court of Cassation, at Paris, which was the ultimate tribunal of appeal, or rather a Court of Error, the expense of which was 25,000*l.* a year. So that for the administration of civil justice alone, France paid between 300,000 or 400,000*l.* a year. The whole expense of the administration of civil and criminal justice, amounted to about 525,000*l.* a year, which, in that cheap country, would nearly equal a million of our money—at least it was equivalent to about 800,000*l.* This proved that the French wisely thought that no expense was too great for the inestimable benefit of an effectual administration of justice; and that we should grudge 125,000*l.* a year for that purpose, was a supposition to which he would never yield until he saw it proved by a vote of that House. It was not equal to three weeks' extra expenses in the last year of the last war. He did not mean that the war was conducted for 50,000*l.* a week, unfortunately nothing like it. But he meant, that independent of the National Debt, the civil list, the whole expense of the army, and the ordinary charges of war, the extra expenses amounted to a sum in three weeks which would have been sufficient in the capital expended, to purchase an annuity of 150,000*l.* a year. By far the greatest benefit which Parliament had ever bestowed upon this country would be the providing cheap, speedy, and certain justice. The functions of these Courts ought not, in his opinion, to be confined to litigious judicature. If the law were brought to its highest possible perfection, there would always remain a sufficient quantity of business which might be beneficially administered by arbitrators. If the person selected for the function of this office were respected in his character of Judge, who could be so fit to arbitrate in cases in which, from the nature of their details, the parties might not be disposed to go into Court. What could be more judicious, or more proper, than that such a person as the Judge described should be appointed to take references between parties on subjects which he might have had to decide as a Judge? What mode of terminating litigations or disputed claims would give greater satisfaction to the public and the parties? There was another improvement of which he thought the administration of justice in this country was susceptible—namely, that of the constitution of Courts of Conciliation, similar to those which were in use in foreign countries, where the parties appeared to talk over calmly and quietly the subject in difference between them, in the presence of a Judge, who, instead of urging them to litigation, represented to the claimants the necessity of moderating a demand, or to the party on whom the demand was made, the reasonableness of compliance. The system had been introduced extensively in France, as appeared by the accounts published by Levasseur, in his Manuel, who states that, though the object of the law is fulfilled, yet where recourse is had to a compulsory enforcement of conciliatory adjustment, satisfaction is but rarely given to the parties concerned. The system had been tried in Holland, but it was not intended to revive it in the new Constitution, which they were now remoulding. In Sweden it had succeeded partially; but in Denmark, where going before such a Judge was entirely optional, it had been peculiarly successful. In one part of Switzerland the system had been adopted on the plan of the Code Napoleon, with the compulsory provision; and as it might be evaded by paying a fine of 10 francs, the practice of evasion was general. In Geneva, where the proceedings was not compulsory, by the returns of 1825, 1826, and 1827, nearly one third of the causes commenced were finished by withdrawing the cause, and nearly one seventh, and certainly an eighth, were absolutely settled by this conciliatory process alone. In respect of cases instituted in Courts of Law, it had been said, and tolerably correctly, that the man bringing the action was generally the person most ignorant of his case and of its merits. Not that he wished to insinuate, with the high respect he felt for his own profession, that Counsel were in the habit of promoting litigation by giving that sort of advice which would lead a plaintiff astray. The reverse was the fact, for none were found more disposed often to discountenance, or throw cold water on litigation. There were cases, however, where ill advice had led men to ruinous and fruitless litigation; and where that had been given by persons in the profession consciously, such persons could not be respectable. Yet he had heard of those in the profession of solicitors and attorneys—however generally respectable that branch of the legal profession—who, if such a person were to be found in the other branch alluded to, would prefer to have recourse to him, or even go so far as to assert to a client that such an opinion had been given, when they had substituted one which was favorable to their own views, and the promotion of litigation. He had been on occasions at consultations where the hands and eyes of Counsel had been turned up, as if to ask how in honor's name could such actions have been advised, and which never would have been brought had not a fallacious coloring been given to the case by false statements of facts. Ignorance on the part of his advisers he would, however, assert was far more frequently the ingredients in such dangerous and injurious advice to clients than premeditated mis-advise. All these were reasons why an opportunity should be afforded to litigants to bring their claims, and the nature of their defence, before some competent judge of the merits of their case in the first instance, so as to promote an amicable adjustment of their differences. All who were acquainted with the ordinary incidents of life and society must feel that such an improvement in our law would be highly conducive to the best interests of society, by insuring the prevention of useless litigation or cheap justice. Those who felt an indisposition to adopt this proposition were, in justice to their own motives and the interests of society, bound to give to society another remedy. He was not a man disposed to contend about words or forms. If they reformed effectually the County Courts, it would, to a great extent, produce many of the advantages which he was desirous to obtain, and should have his support.

The existence of the enormous grievance of the law, as it now was administered, was a matter of fact—was undoubted. The people had a right, and they felt it, to justice ; they clamored and called aloud for it ; they distrusted the profession in their slow approaches to legal reform—they distrusted the Government in their meditated reforms, whether politicial or otherwise, as long as expeditious and cheap justice was denied them. An absurd cry had been attempted to be raised that this reform was the result of a clamor raised against everything that was venerable in our Constitution—a clamor against the laws of the land. It was not so. But, if clamor it were, it was a clamor against that which it was but just and right should be raised—it was a clamor against the abuse of the law—(loud cheers.) It had been said by one who was no strong advocate for popular privileges, and no eager aspirant to popularity himself, no zealous promoter of innovation, nor among the foremost to raise his hand against what was venerable in our Constitution, or to raise his voice in opposition to the wisdom of our ancestors—by that eloquent statesman and senator Burke—that where abuse existed, there was a right to be clamor, inasmuch as it was better to have our slumbers disturbed by the clangor of the fire-bell, than be awoke by the flames of our bed —(hear, hear.) He had been told by some that this was but a timid and weak attempt, a mere mock reform ; by others he had been accused of rashly taking up as a subject of dangerous experiment that which had been, and must continue to be, the object of all men's veneration. He disregarded the opinion of both the one and the other party. His object was simple—and that the accomplishment of a great public benefit. The part of a reformer had rarely been an enviable one. He had peculiarly felt the truth of that remark. In his attempts to be useful, he had been obstructed by objections on points of form, or thwarted by some who affected to be his coadjutors : but, above all, he deplored the impediments which had been attempted to be raised, through the medium of the basest slanders—raised against his motives by men who, whilst they raised these calumnies, were, from a variety of reasons, the very men, of all men on earth, who best knew how base and unfounded such charges were. 'I have lived (said he, in a very impressive manner) to be reproached with being leagued with abuse. I have lived to be accused with being in a corrupt league with those who fatten by abuse, and the motive for that league is the more infamous as it is the more unfounded—namely, that I have formed that base and corrupt league for the purpose of obtaining high professional advancement and station. What! I, who have been offered and have refused the highest judicial situation in the gifts of the Sovereign! I, who at that very period engaged myself in doing that act, which, above all other acts, was calculated to prevent the possibility of such a proposition being made to me again : and this on grounds both personal and political! Was I affected by this slander ? Did I hesitate or falter in the objects I was—in the exercise of a conscientous feeling of duty—at that moment engaged in ? Did those calumnies quicken or accelerate my efforts for the public welfare ? No. I pursued that course I had marked out to myself, regardless of imputation or calumny.

False honor charms, and lying slander frights
Whom ? but the wretch, in baseness that delights.

It has been the lot, in all times, of men like me to be subjected to the attacks of calumniators—to be thwarted by the perverseness of friends—to be designedly misunderstood—to be misrepresented —to be borne down, till the attempt to bear one down longer was found to be fruitless ; but what does it all amount to but to prove that truth will survive—will finally triumph—and that calumny will have its day ?—(loud cheering.) But if this be the reward of the reformer, if he is to be the object of suspicion and misrepresentation, in the present instance an inference must be drawn favorably for myself. Having been taunted, by the enemies of reform, with being too rash ; its friends by being too slow, or too cold ; it may, with some degree of consistency, be inferred that the presumption is that the course adopted is right. Coldness may be taken as a proof of prudence, and rashness may be modified into proper courage. It is said, ' Wo to you when all men speak well of you.' So encouraged, I shall go on undismayed, uninfluenced in that course my own judgment sanctions, following with confidence in the steps of those illustrious individuals who have gone before me in the same career, and have bequeathed to us their example to guide, and their success to cheer us.—I move, Sir, that leave be given to bring in a Bill for the establishment of local judicatures in certain districts in England—(loud cheers.)

---

DIGEST OF RECENT ENGLISH REPORTS.

Robinson vs. Reed.

The plaintiff having a claim upon the defendant, took the acceptance of the defendant's agent for the amount allowing discount, which bill was twice renewed for periods of two months, interest being added at each renewal. At the time of taking the bill, the agent had money of the defendant in his hands, more than sufficient to cover the demand, and the agent then debited the defendant's account with the amount of the acceptance : but it did not appear that the defendant had seen the books, nor that the plaintiff might have had cash had he chosen. Held, that the agent having become bankrupt, and the acceptances being unpaid, the defendant was still liable. 9 Barn. & Cress. 449.

Holderness vs. Shackles.

A part-owner of a ship is not entitled to his share of the ship's earnings until he has paid his proportion of the ship's outfit and expenditure for the voyage ; and a part delivery of his share does not necessarily defeat the lien, which the other part-owners have upon the remainder. 1 Danson & Lloyd, 203.

Jones vs. Bright.

Where an article is sold by the manufacturer expressly for a particular purpose, there is an implied warrantry to the purchaser that the article shall be reasonably fit for that purpose, or at all events against latent defects, arising from the want of skill or care in the process of manufacturing. 1 Danson & Lloyd, 304.

Poulton vs. Lattimore.

In answer to an action for the price of goods sold under an express warranty, it is competent for the defendant to shew that the warranty was not complied with, without returning the goods, or giving notice of their defect in quality. No evidence having been offered that the goods in question (seeds warranted to be good growing seed) were worth anything, and the point as to the plaintiff's right to recover something not having been raised at the trial, the Court refused to interfere in favor of the plaintiff on that ground. 9 Barn. & Cress. 256.

White vs. Trustees of British Museum.

Two of the witnesses to a will of lands subscribed their names at the devisor's request, but did not see his signature, nor were informed, at that or any other time, of the nature of the instrument. The third witness did not see S the devisor's signature, but was informed by the devisor that the paper in question was his will. Immediately above the names of the witnesses was written, in the hand-writing of the devisor,—'In the presence of us as witnesses thereto :' Held to be a sufficiently attested devise, within the Statute of Frauds. And per Tindal C. J. 'When we find that the testator knew this to be his will ; that he produced it to the three witnesses, and asked them to sign it as witnesses ; that they subscribed their names in his presence, and returned the identical instrument to him ; we think the testator did acknowledge in fact, though not in words, to the three witnesses, that the will was his. 6 Bing. 310.

Kay vs. Brookman.

To dispense with the necessity of calling the subscribing witness to a deed, it is sufficient to shew that he expressed an intention of leaving the county, that he had reason for so doing to avoid a criminal charge, and that his relations have not seen him since he expressed his intention of going. 3 Carr. & Payne, 55.

---

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1830.

---

Bigelow's Supplement or Digest of Pickering's Reports.—Nothing is more easy than to make a Digest, if by that term is meant a collection of cases from the Index or Table of Contents of a reporter, alphabetically arranged and faithfully copied. And no sort of book making can be of less value to the Profession. Such Books are not merely useless, but they are pernicious. At best they give the authorities imperfectly, and, in many instances, incorrectly. The statements by reporters are always the last thing made, often hastily, and with the less care, because the cases reported generally go in the same volume with the statements, and are consulted as the better source of information. Sometimes, points raised are not clearly explained, principles are stated as general, which are applicable only to the case decided, and which, by the Court, are restricted or qualified.

Loose and uncalled for opinions, or suggestions of Judges, are regarded as considered and decided points.

The truth is, Reporters make their Tables or Indices for their Reports and to go with them, adopting the legal presumption, which, however, is often rebutted by the matter of fact, that those, who buy their Books, read them. It is enough for their purpose that their notice of the points decided, in any case, may direct to the case itself.

But something more is wanted in a Digest, which is, in many respects, to supersede the necessity of a recurrence to the cases reported, and something more is accomplished by those who come to this labor with the necessary industry, discrimination and learning. The same judgment, the same power of comparison, of apprehending analogies and discriminating differences, which necessarily belong to those who settle the law right, is wanted in those, who undertake to arrange its principles and state the cases which sustain them. A properly executed Digest is itself authority. It takes the character and consequence of a Book of Principles. The law as stated by Comyn can hardly be said to be strengthened or rendered more satisfactory by consulting his authorities. He is the best of authorities himself. And yet his work is but a Digest. The labors of such a man tend to diminish the quantity of necessary Books, while they abridge or take nothing from the amount of knowledge. Ten to one, the man, who, now a days, gets a Digest to find the law, will find, if nothing else, that he must buy the Reports to explain his Digest. In fact, the Digests, which have hitherto appeared in this country, have been designed as accompaniments to the Reports, whose contents they attempt to give. They are made chiefly to facilitate references to the cases. Perspicuity of arrangement, accuracy of reference and clearness combined with brevity of statement have been, therefore, their highest merit. That merit has always been conceded to Mr Bigelow. The last Volume recently published, is designed as a Supplement to, or continuation of the Volume which the Author published in 1825. Those who have already supplied themselves with the first Volume of Mr Bigelow, published in 1818, may complete the Digest of the Massachusetts Reports, by adding to it, that of Mr Metcalf and the present Supplement.

The two Volumes of Mr Bigelow, last published, as they are now arranged, are, however, somewhat more convenient for reference. Mr Metcalf's Digest is well executed, as is everything that Gentleman has attempted. His name and reputation, are a sufficient pledge to the Profession, that whatever he gives to the public, comes from his hands fraught with learning, extensive research and critical accuracy. The reception which his efforts to illustrate, simplify and explain the law, have met from the public, should encourage him to some high and worthy undertaking in which he may embody his learning, secure his reputation, and enrich the Profession. Of his Edition of Yelverton, Judge Howe says, 'his notes and discussions are most excellent, and do honor to him and the country. The whole is worthy of the attentive perusal of every one who would be a student in Law.'

Mr Bigelow seems to have examined the cases reported for himself, and to have been guided by his own good judgment in the explanation and statements of the decisions of the Court. In some instances he has referred to corresponding cases in the earlier Volumes of the Reports, and he would have performed a very acceptable service to the Profession, and profitable, as we believe, to himself, if he had carried his labor in this respect siill farther, and, in important cases, even beyond the Reports themselves.

There is a degree of confusion in his 'additional references to former vol.'

As Tyng's and Pickering's Volumes pass alike under the name of the Massachusetts Reports, we were at a loss, at first, to know when he refers to 'vol. iii. p. 261,' whether vol. iii. of Tyng or Pickering was meant. We get no light on this point from the Introduction. We should have much preferred a repetition of the principle, stated in the first Volume, with references to former cases. The course pursued by the Author, leaves a great many cases in Pickering undigested. Many of them contain important matters beyond the mere confirmation of former decisions. Indeed it seldom happens that the same question is submitted a second time to the Judges for determination. The cases vary in some important particulars.

We beg leave also to suggest that the title of the Book is objectionable. We hope the Author will live to favor the public with still other Volumes. What will he call the next? A Supplement to the Supplement? Why not call this the Second Volume of Bigelow's Digest? As much uniformity as possible should be preserved in the Titles of such Books for conveniency of reference.

We have never discovered the necessity or utility of changing the Title of our Reports with the change of the Reporter. The Reporter gains nothing but a little notoriety to his name, which is worth nothing, if his works discredit it; and he needs no such aids if they are worthily executed. Such, however, seems to be the fashion, and although there is some inconvenience, there is no great injury arising from it. They have in New York, already, Johnson, Caine, Paige and Cowen, and are likely, for ought that now appears, to go on through the Alphabet.

In the United States Courts too, where it would seem, that there were many reasons for preserving the same style of Reports, there are several different Titles, and as many different modes of reporting.

There is no very good reason why the Reports to the several States should not be designated by the name of the State to which they belong.

---

English Judges and Law officers at the demise of the late King.

Lord Lyndhurst, Chancellor.

Sir Launcelot Shadwell, Vice Chancellor.

Hon. Henry Goulbourn, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Sir John Leach, Master of the Rolls,

Lord Tenterden, Chief Justice of K. B.

Justices—Sir James Parke, Sir Joseph Littledale, Sir John Bayley.

Sir Nicholas Conyngham Tindal, Chief Justice of C. P.

Justices—Sir John B. Bosanquet, Sir Stephen Gaselee, Sir J. A. Parke.

Sir Wm Bolland, Sir John Vaughan, ——— Garrow, Barons of the Exchequer.

Sir James Scarlet, Attorney General.

Sir Edward Burtenshaw Sugden, Solicitor General.

---

List of Crimes which subject the offenders to the punishment of death in England.

Administering drugs, or using other means to procure the abortion of a woman quick with child.

Setting fire to buildings, stacks of corn, coal mines, malt houses, ships or vessels, or otherwise destroying them, at sea or in port.

Burglary, murder, rape, robbery, sacrilege, by breaking and entering any church, and stealing therein, or stealing in a church and breaking out therefrom.

Carnal knowledge of a female child under ten years of age.

Sodomy with mankind or with any animal.

Plundering or stealing any part of a ship or vessel in distress, or the goods on board.

Stealing horses, sheep, or cattle, or killing with intent to steal the carcass or skins.

Breaking into, and entering a dwelling house and stealing therein.

Stealing in a dwelling house any property, any person therein being put in fear.

Stealing in any dwelling house to the value of 5*l.* or more.

Forgery to defraud the customs, to defraud the excise, to receive wages of seaman, officer, or marine, and altering any instrument for these purposes; also obtaining by a false oath a probate of a false will, or letters of administration of a seaman or mariner, and demanding and receiving the wages of any seaman or mariner, by means of any document obtained by a false oath and with intent to defraud.

Poisoning, stabbing, strangling, or wounding with intent to murder. Also, cutting, shooting or wounding, which would amount to murder if death ensue. Attempting to drown with intent to murder.

Piracy on the high seas, smuggling by three or more armed persons, shooting at vessels in the British or Irish Channel, or shooting at or wounding any officer.

Persons returning from transportation before the time has expired, who have been transported for having goods liable to forfeiture.

Persons who assemble riotously and demolish or destroy any church, building, machinery, or any engine used in any mine, &c.

Accessaries before the fact are subject to the same punishment as the principal.

---

Peters' Supreme Court Reports is just published in Boston, by Hilliard, Gray & Co.

---

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

Part II., of Crown Cases reserved for Consideration, and Decided by the Twelve Judges of England, from July, 1825, to Easter Term, 1830, inclusive. By Edward Ryan and Wm. Moody, Esqrs., Barristers at Law.

An Analytical Digest of the Reports of Cases decided in the year 1828, in the Courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer; in Chancery, at the Rolls, and in the Vice Chancellor's Court; in Parliament, in the Consistory Court, Arches Court, Prerogative and Peculiars, and Bankruptcy and Nisi Prius. By Henry Jeremy, Esq., Barrister at Law. This work on perusal will be found of great value, as it embraces and presents at one view all the Decisions of the different Courts that arise in the course of the preceding year; and from the circumstance of being published annually affords a ready reference to all the points decided during that period.

Reports of Cases argued and determined between the months of May and November, 1829, before the Committees of his Majesty's Most Honorable Privy Council, appointed to hear Appeals and Petitions. Vol. 1. Part 1. (to be continued.) By Jerome William Knapp, D. C. L. Barrister at Law.

A Practical Treatise on the General Principles and Elementary Rules of the Law of Evidence. By Richard Grade, Esq. Barrister at Law.

PROPOSALS for publishing by subscription an ANALYTICAL DIGEST OF ALL THE AMERICAN REPORTS. By WILLIAM HILLIARD, Jr. Counsellor at Law. Revised by BENJAMIN RAND, Counsellor at Law.

The study of American Jurisprudence will always form an essential part of the education of every accomplished American Lawyer. And to the practitioner, as well as to the jurist, the decisions of the various Courts of Law and Equity in the United States, are daily becoming more important. The Jurisprudence of the several States, with a single exception, is founded upon the Common Law of England. On most subjects of general importance, there is a great similarity in the legislative enactments of the several States. And the judicial decisions of the Courts of the several States, are often cited and respected as authorities in the Courts of other States than those in which they were pronounced. The decisions upon local or statutory law, merely, are comparatively few, and even in these, from the similarity in the statutes and usages of the several States, precedents and analogies may be found, of general application. Few, perhaps, are aware of the number of volumes of American Reports, which now exceeds two hundred and fifty. It is believed that an Analytical Digest of these Reports, upon the plan of Mr Jeremy's consolidated Digest of the English Reports, is a desideratum. The advantages of such a digest, judiciously arranged, so as to bring into one view all the adjudications of all the Courts in the United States, upon each particular subject, will be duly appreciated by every practical lawyer. It is intended that the work shall contain all the reported cases to the time of publication, without any exceptions; and a Supplement containing the subsequent decisions will be published annually.

The work will be published with despatch.

---

The work will be printed on a beautiful small type, and good paper, and will be comprised in four or five volumes, (probably not exceeding four,) royal octavo size, each volume to contain about 1000 pages; and will be delivered to subscribers at $5 per volume, in good law sheep binding, which is a very low price for a law work embracing so great a quantity of matter.

After publication the price of the work will be raised to $6 per volume.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From Hon. JOSEPH STORY, Judge of the Supreme Court of the U. S.; and Hon. ISAAC PARKER, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts.

The proposal of Mr Hilliard, to publish a uniform Digest of all the American Reports, upon the plan of the English Digest of Mr Jeremy, appears to me to be entitled to the patronage of the profession. No work of this kind, sufficiently accurate and extensive for general practice, at present exists. The want of one cannot but be felt by every lawyer, whose inquiries reach beyond the limits of the local law of his own State. Such a compilation, executed with the care, fidelity and ability, which so important a task demands, would be so highly useful, that it could scarcely fail of general approbation. As far as I have had the means of comprehending the plan of Mr Hilliard, from a personal communication with him, it appears to me entirely satisfactory. And the assistance and supervision of so distinguished a lawyer as Mr Rand, cannot but ensure an accuracy and completeness in the execution of the plan, correspondent with his just claims on the public confidence.

JOSEPH STORY.

---

I have no doubt the Digest proposed by Mr Hilliard will be highly useful, and that it will have a tendency to relieve the profession from the great labor of looking through hundreds of volumes, or of indices, to ascertain whether points sought for have been treated of and decided. I also feel assured that Mr Hilliard's professional acquirements, and assiduity in legal researches, qualify him to give such a book, under the revision proposed, all the usefulness which the plan suggests.

July 10. ISAAC PARKER.

---

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of administering and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire: and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Price $1,25.

Aug. 20.

---

NEW LAW BOOKS.—JOHN GRIGG, No. 9 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia, has just published the following valuable works.

CONDENSED REPORTS of CASES decided in the SUPREME COURT of the United States, from the organization of the Court at August term 1791, to January term 1828. Edited by Richard Peters, Counsellor at Law, and Reporter of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

This work is intended to contain the opinions of the Supreme Court, in the language of the Judges, in every case decided in that court from the establishment of the Government of the United States, to the commencement of Mr Peters's Reports at January term 1828. The reported decisions in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, upon similar points, are also collected and digested in the work, as notes; and abstracts of those Cases, and also of the collateral decisions of the Supreme Court are given, so that the Professional Gentleman and the Student will be in possession of all the adjudicated Law of all the Courts of the United States, in an authoritative, condensed, and arranged form.

The work will be contained in not more than six volumes; the first volume is now published; the second volume will be published about the 1st of August, and the balance of the work during the present year and 1831.

Those who wish to possess this work will do well to make an early application as the greatest portion of the edition is taken up by subscription. They are for sale by the principal Booksellers in the United States, with J. Griggs's other law publications.

Price six dollars to those who subscribe, and seven dollars to non-subscribers, payable on delivery of each volume.

PETERS' REPORTS.—Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Supreme Court of the United States, by Richard Peters, Esquire, Reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, 4 vols. royal 8vo.

FONBLANQUE'S Celebrated TREATISE ON EQUITY. A new edition, with considerable additions, from the last London edition, by a distinguished Member of the Philadelphia Bar, in 1 vol. royal 8vo.

CHITTY ON CONTRACTS. A new and Practical Treatise on the Law of Contracts not under Seal, and upon the usual Defences to Actions thereon, with Corrections and Additional References. By a member of the Massachusetts Bar, in 1 vol. 8vo.

SAUNDER'S REPORTS, in 3 vols. 8vo. The 4th American, from the 5th considerably enlarged London edition.

Say's Political Economy, new edition.

TOLLER'S LAW OF EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS. With notes and references to American Authorities, by E. D. Ingraham, Esq. new edition, in 1 vol. 8vo.

Sugden on the Law of Vendors in 1 vol. 8vo.

Jones on Bailments in 1 vol. 8vo.

CHANCERY REPORTS. JOHN GRIGG, has in press the Decisions of the English Chancery Reports, upon the plan which has been adopted and successfully executed with the 'English Common Law Reports.' The work will comprehend, in a condensed form, all the Reports which have not been republished in the United States; and it will be continued, so as to present to the profession, annually, the Chancery Reports as they shall hereafter appear in Great Britain.

The work will also contain references to the decisions of the chancery courts of the United States, and of the several states.

---

GRAY & BOWEN have received by late arrivals the following valuable Foreign Books, which they will sell at low prices.

Dibdin's Library Companion, second edition, one large 8vo. vol.

Bowring's Poetry of the Magyars.

Moore's Byron. Splendid quarto edition.

Belzoni's Researches in Egypt and Nubia.

Description of the Ruins of an Ancient City in South America, with plates.

Memoires de M. De Bourrienne, 10 vols.

Histoire De France. Par M. Bignon, 4 vols.

Dictionnaire de Maximes. Par J. L. Malire, 1 vol.

Histoire du Congress de Vienne, 3 vols. 8vo.

Lafayette en Amerique, with Plates, 2 vols. 8vo.

The Works of Lope de Vega, 21 vols. quarto, fine edition.

Obras de Quevedo, 11 vols.

Don Quixotte, 5 vols.

Las Eroticas Villegas, 2 vols.

Trabajos de Persiles y Sigismunda, 2 vols.

Teatro Italiano Antico, 8 vols. July 10.

---

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. This day published by HILLIARD, GRAY, & Co. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law: being a continuation of the Digest of Massachusetts Reports; and also a continuation of Metcalf's Digest of the same work. Neatly bound in Sheep, $3,50—Calf, $4,00.

---

DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS, TO WIT: District Clerk's Office.

BE it remembered, that on the seventeenth day of August, A. D. 1830, in the fiftyfifth year of the Independence of the United States of America, Lewis Bigelow of the said district, has deposited in this office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as proprietor in the words following, to wit:

'A Digest of Pickering's Reports, volumes II.—VII., being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law.'

In conformity to the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned;' and also to an act entitled, 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled, 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned,' and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints.'

JNO. W. DAVIS, { Clerk of the District of Massachusetts.

---

NOW PUBLISHING, BY CARTER & HENDEE, A SERIES OF SCIENTIFIC TRACTS, designed for Instruction and Entertainment, and adapted to Schools, Lyceums and Families. Conducted by Josiah Holbrook and others.

The whole Series will contain simple and clear outlines of the various sciences, and their principal division, with their application to the common purposes of life.

TERMS.—Not less than 24 numbers of a 12mo size, containing 24 pages each, will be published in a year, at $1,50, payable in advance. July 10.

---

CARTER AND HENDEE have in Press, SELF EDUCATION; or, THE MEANS OF MORAL PROGRESS, Translated from the French of M. Le Baron Degerando. To this work was awarded the honor of being 'crowned' by the French Academy; a distinction annually confered on one or two works, deemed the most useful that have been published during the year. And a late Review remarks; 'We have no ethical work of any living English writer to be compared with that of Degerando.'

VIEW OF THE UNITED STATES, for the use of Schools, with Maps and numerous Engravings.

INFANT SCHOOL MANUAL, or Teacher's Assistant Second Edition. Enlarged and much improved.

SCRAP TABLE, containing Original Anecdotes and Sketches.

YOUNG LADY'S BOOK, with 700 engravings on wood, of a superior quality, intended as an Annual for 1831.

THE YOUTH'S KEEPSAKE, a Christmas and New Year's Offering for 1831.

A NEW COLLECTION OF PSALMS AND HYMNS, for Public Worship. By Rev. F. W. P. Greenwood.

---

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. Complete sets of this work (thirty volumes in all) can now be had, on application to the Publishers, on liberal terms. The number and variety of the topics discussed in this work, and the high reputation it enjoys both in this country and Europe, render it a most valuable addition to the library of literary men. A General Index of the first twentyfive volumes has also been published, in a style to match with the current volumes of the work.

Subscribers and others whose sets may be deficient, can be supplied with the missing numbers. Subscriptions to commence at any period, received at $5 per annum. GRAY & BOWEN.

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1830. NO. X.

MERCANTILE LAW.

NO. III.

[Continued.]

There must likewise be a fair exercise of the understanding. Fraud, therefore, which deludes, or surprise which entraps the judgment, are forbidden alike by natural justice and by law. Misrepresentation or concealment, suggestio falsi, or suppressio veri, are equally acts of fraud which take away the binding force of an engagement.* But the rule must by no means be taken in a large and unqualified sense. If the subject of the agreement, and the manner in which it is entered into, be such, that the person imposed upon has had a fair opportunity of exercising his judgment, the law will not supply the want of skill or caution in him, but leaves him to the consequences of his own improvidence.† The sound distinction seems to be this: if the falsehood or concealment be such that a person of ordinary experience might have detected it, then the contract stands. But if the fact alleged or concealed be peculiarly within the knowledge of the person practising the deceit, then the person deceived may withdraw from his engagement altogether.‡ The fraud, however, must proceed from, or at least be participated in, or adopted by, the other contracting party; else the contract stands good with respect to him, and the remedy of the injured party is by action against the person who practised the fraud. Fraud, though in many cases a good defence at law, comes more frequently, and perhaps more properly, under the cognizance of the courts of equity.§ Indeed, the jurisdiction of the latter in this respect is somewhat more general, extending to every instance of a gross violation of good faith, and sometimes presuming fraud from circumstances, where the law requires it to be proved.‖ Thus equity, as was hinted before, will not allow undue advantage to be taken of the weakness or necessity of another, which, as Lord Hardwicke rightly observes,¶ is equally against conscience as to take advantage of his ignorance.

Neither in law or in equity, however, is mere inequality, however great, in the terms of the contract, when unaccompanied with deceit, a ground for impeaching its validity.* By the civil law indeed, where the excess amounted to the half of the just price, the contract, if it regarded immoveable property, might be annulled. But even there also inequality in contracts as to personal property, was never admitted as a reason for vacating it; perhaps on account of the difficulty of establishing a standard of price.†

Lastly, it seems but reasonable that a mistake of either party, or both, as to the subject of the contract, should be a ground for annulling it. The civil law so determines, on the maxim that, where there is error, there is no consent.‡ Undoubtedly, however, a mistake as to the mere qualities of the subject, not induced by deception, will not invalidate the transaction.§ And even in equity, where the matter was doubtful, or both parties were equally in ignorance, or the contract has been so long acquiesced in, that it might be inconvenient to re-open it, the transaction cannot be questioned on the plea of mistake.‖

It will probably not have been forgotten, that the engagements, which the law was said to enforce, were limited to such as were neither at variance with the general interests of the community, nor unfairly detrimental to those of individuals. In annalyzing this limitation, we find included in the first term, all compacts which offend against public policy, or public morality, or positive law; and in the second, all which may be deemed fraudulent, as respects the rights and interests of third parties. To such compacts the law will not lend its countenance. Now it is evident that this vice of contracts may lie either in the act of agreeing or in the thing agreed. But for practical purposes this distinction, which savors perhaps somewhat too much of metaphysical refinement, may be disregarded; and we shall therefore consider the taint as inherent in the subject matter of the contract, and proceed to treat of it according to the division adopted above.

But as this brings us to the second main branch of our subject, it may be as well to give our readers a three months' respite from an investigation, not very captivating in its details, and unlikely, we fear, to interest any but those who can appreciate the high philosophical gratification of tracing the derivation of law through a thousand channels and ducts to every part of the social system, and of remarking that, though occasionally contaminated by the mixture of earthy substances, its waters still indicate their source from the one pure fountain of natural justice.

---

*1 Stark. 434. 2 Bro. Ch. Ca. 420.

†Vigilantibus non dormientibus lex inservit. This subject will be treated more at large under the head of Contracts of Sale.

‡2 Bl. Com. 451. 3 Id. 166. Sugd. Vend. & Purch. 1—10. 3 B. & C. 623. See also Gilb. Rep. 155. and 2 Salk. 251.

§ Fraud is a good defence to an action at law for non performance of an engagement; and this, whether the engagement were testified by parol or by deed, or if the party who has practised it, and damages recovered proportioned to the injury. In equity the fraud may be assigned as a reason for not completing such contracts as are executory, or for rescinding such as are executed. See the Treatise of Equity, B. 1. c. 2. s. 8. n. y, and the cases there collected. In the civil law the remedy was, as in the case of duress.

‖ See the remarks of Lord Hardwicke, 2 Ves. 155.

¶Ubi supra.

*See cases cited in notes d, e, and h, to the Treatise of Equity, ubi sup.

†Pothier, P. 1. c. 1. s. 1. art. 3. s. 4. Domat's Civil Law, B. 1. tit. 2. s. 9.

‡Non videntur, qui errant, consentire. The translator of Pothier mentions a case which occurred some years ago, respecting an error of this kind. A painting was sold as an original of Poussin, but it appearing afterwards, from the opinion of several artists, to be the work of some person, it was held that the sale was void, and the purchaser entitled to reclaim his money.

§ This subject will be more fully discussed under the head of Warranty, in contracts of Sale.

‖ See the cases cited in the Treatise of Equity, n. v. ubi sup.

NO. IV.

Our readers, we hope, will not have forgotten that at the close of our last article we were entering upon the subject of agreements which were void either as violating some rule of morality, policy or positive law, or as unfairly prejudicing the rights and interests of parties not immediately connected with the contract, and, therefore, in legal phrase, fraudulent.

Where an agreement contravenes the provisions of a positive law, to common sense it would seem immaterial whether it were the written or the unwritten, the common or the statute law, against which it offended; but not so reasoned the legal sages of antiquity. 'A statute,' said they, in the pedantic phraseology of their times, 'is like a tyrant; where he comes, he makes all void: but the common law is like a nursing father; it makes only void that part where the fault is, and preserves the rest.'* The distinction, it need hardly be observed, has more of quaintness than solidity. Undoubtedly where a statute in express terms declares that all contracts containing stipulations contrary to its provisions shall be utterly void, it follows that one offending member must vitiate the whole. The rule so understood is a mere truism. But it is equally true at this day, whatever may have been the case formerly, that neither is the entire agreement necessarily invalidated, because some one independent clause transgresses the regulations of a statute, nor, on the other hand, can a contract be sustained of which any material and inseparable stipulation violates a principle of common law.† And if the transaction be founded in illegality; in other words, if the unlawful stipulation form any part of the consideration, it will be alike fatal to the claim of the party seeking to enforce the contract, whether the obnoxious clause have sinned against the paternal precepts of the common law, or the imperious mandates of a statute.

To enter into a detail of cases in which contracts have been vitiated by statutory illegality, would be compatible neither with our limits or our design. The mere enumeration of the statutes themselves would occupy more space than we can afford. Such of them as relate to mercantile transactions will come under consideration in the progress of our inquiry. For the present it may be sufficient, in order to point out the arbitrary and unmeaning distinctions which are made in them, giving rise to an endless variety of perplexing questions, to allude to the statute against usury,‡ which expressly declares void both the contract and the assurance which evidences it;§ the gaming acts,

---

*Hobart, 14. 1Mod. 35, 36. It is amusing to observe the devotion of the old lawyers to the common law, in disparagement of the statutes. In modern times, or at least in the age just past, they would have been well justified in their preference.

†6 Taunt. 359. 4 M. & S. 66. See also 4 Taunt. 57. 105. 113. 553. 8 T. R. 411. 8 East, 231. 15 East, 440. 11 Ves. 635. 1 B. & C. 330. per Holroyd, J., 335. per Best, J. 4 B. & C. 130. arg. 1 Wms. Saund. 66 a. (d.)

‡12 Ann. c. 16.

§By 58 Geo. 3. c. 93. an exception in the case of usury has been made in favor of an innocent indorsee for value of a bill of exchange or promissory note. And with one of which * vacates both contracts and securities for money lost, the other † the security for money lent at play, but not the loan itself; the act against stock-jobbing,‡ which invalidates the contract, but not the assurance; the restriction of partnerships for the effecting of insurances§ (now indeed repealed,‖) the terms of which statute are merely prohibitory, and the various revenue acts the regulations of which are for the most part enforced by a penalty.

The subject cannot, however, be dismissed without noticing a position, which has been sanctioned by too great authorities to be treated with contempt. It was maintained by Blackstone,¶ that where a statute enjoins or prohibits an act, in itself indifferent, and enforces the regulation by annexing a pecuniary penalty to the transgression, there is nothing intrinsically immoral or even unlawful in infringing the regulation, so that the appropriated penalty, which he conceived to be merely an alternative and not a punishment, be duly paid. It was on reasoning, probably, such as this, that a distinction long prevailed in the courts between what were termed mala in se and mala prohibita: the latter, as contradistinguished from the former, being offences against statutory provisions in themselves arbitrary (such as the revenue laws generally,) which induce no moral turpitude, and in fact are offences only because forbidden. It followed as a corollary from this doctrine, that unless the statute expressly vacated, or at least prohibited, contracts involving a transgression of its regulations, they would not, in such cases, be void at common law. Accordingly, a factor who had sold a parcel of prize-manufactured tobacco, consigned to him as a dealer in tobacco, without having entered himself as required by the excise law under a penalty, as such dealer, was nevertheless permitted to sue the purchaser for the price. The distinction was also taken by Lord Eldon in a case of bankruptcy.†† 'The first point of objection,' his lordship said, 'resolves itself into this: Whether the proposition, that a broker of the city of London cannot act as a principal, be founded on a prohibition of general law, or a mere municipal regulation. If on the former, it is quite clear that a court of justice can give no enforcement to contracts which the law of the land has interdicted.' The statute 3 Hen. 8. c. 11. provides that no one shall practise as a surgeon in London or seven miles round without being licensed by the College of Surgeons, and imposes a penalty of 5l. a month for so practising. Yet Lord Ellenborough seems to have considered that an unlicensed practitioner might maintain an action for business done as a surgeon within these limits. The practising, he observed, was only prohibited under a penalty; the statute did not provide that no fees or charges should be recovered.‡‡ Nay, it has even been suggested by the court, that although the holding of a fair on a Sunday (which is an offence against the 29 Car. 2. c. 7.) would be illegal, yet an agreement made under such circumstances would not be therefore void.*

But this distinction, which, whether metaphysically just or not, is at all events too subtle for a legal principle, has been at length swept away. The courts have discovered that an act is not the less forbidden, because a penalty is annexed to the doing of it; and that their business is rather to give effect to what is written, than to refine upon the degrees of criminality which attach to the violation of it. Lord Holt, indeed, saw this long ago;† for he says, 'Every contract made for or about any matter or thing which is prohibited and made unlawful by any statute, is a void contract, though the statute itself doth not mention that it shall be so, but only inflicts a penalty on the offender, because a penalty implies a prohibition: thence, no prohibitory words in the statute.' In all the late decisions this reasoning has been uniformly acted upon; and the rule may now be laid down broadly that no agreement which contemplates the refraction of a statutory regulation (whatever the nature of that regulation may be) can be enforced either at law or in equity.‡

Contracts which offend against morality may be dismissed with a very cursory notice. The maxim of our law, as of every other system of rational jurisprudence, is ex turpi causâ non oritur actio. A single instance will serve to shew the extent to which the application of the rule is carried. A printer sought to recover from a publisher a remuneration for his labor and expense in printing a libellous and disgusting book, entitled 'The Memoirs of Harriette Wilson,' but the court would not contaminate itself by interposing in such a transaction, and refused to enforce the claim.§

Arguments of policy, it has been said by some one, are dangerous things for courts of law to meddle with. And the reason is plain: notions of policy are arbitrary, uncertain, liable to change; whereas rules of law ought to be, as far as human imperfection will allow, positive, definite, and stedfast. It might, therefore, seem a matter to be regretted, that there should exist a rule, declaring void agreements which are contrary to public policy: because either the determining of what is politic or not, must depend on the accidental opinions of successive judges, or uniformity of decision must be purchased at the hazard of occasionally upholding exploded error. In practice, however, little inconvenience attends the application of the rule. There are not many points of admitted expediency, on which the legislature has been altogether silent; and even where there is no express declaration on the particular subject, the general spirit of the law is for the most part sufficiently apparent. It must be recollected, moreover, that, however desirable it may seem to narrow the limits of this discretionary province, yet so long as the ingenuity of self-interest shall continue to mock the foresight of legislation, it is impossible altogether to abolish it.

The rule under consideration embraces agreements, which are either injurious to the public interest generally, or contrary to the policy, though not the letter, of a specific legislative provision. The following are examples of the first class:—An engagement, though founded on adequate consideration to the individual, not to carry on a particular trade, is void, as tending to a restriction of that competition which is unquestionably advantageous to the community. Nevertheless, with a subtlety of distinction not very intelligible, a like stipulation, in which the restraint is limited to a given distance, has more than once received the sanction of the court.* With a like regard to the general interest, bargains secretly concluded between unauthorized individuals, for the procuring a transfer of public and responsible appointments, have always been discountenanced by the courts. Accordingly an agreement, made by the owner of a ship in the service of the East India Company, for the sale of the command, without the sanction and in violation of the by-laws of the company, and even a deed of which such a stipulation formed a material ingredient, have been severally pronounced void.† It is on the ground of a supposed political inexpediency also, that trading contracts made with the subjects of hostile states, during the continuance of hostilities, are at common law absolutely and incurably void.‡ Of the latter class the following instances may be selected out of many:—It is the obvious policy of the bankrupt and insolvent acts, that there shall be a full disclosure of the affairs of the insolvent for the equal benefit of his creditors. Hence an agreement, which contained, and indeed was founded on, a stipulation that the commissioners should forbear to examine a bankrupt as to certain sums which he was charged with having improperly disposed of, was held void, as tending to stifle investigation:§ nay further, in a case recently determined, an engagement by the opposing creditor of an insolvent to withdraw his opposition, after an inquiry had been instituted by the court, was considered as vitiating the entire contract of which it formed the consideration.‖ The decision, however, in these latter cases, proceeded partly on the ground that the agreements were detrimental to the rights of the other creditors; and indeed they might, with equal propriety, be adduced as examples of that class of contracts, which, adopting the expression generally used, we have designated as fraudulent.

Of these there are many instances to be found in the reported decisions both at law and in equity. We shall mention two, as most appropriate to our subject. An insolvent tradesman compounds with his creditors for the payment of a dividend upon his debts. A secret stipulation by one of the creditors for a further sum, or even an additional security, as the condition of his outward acceptance respect to securities in general given upon illegal contracts, it is important to bear in mind the following rule laid down by Mr Justice Holroyd: 'I take it to be clear,' says that most learned Judge, 'that where a statute prohibits a thing to be done, and does not expressly avoid the securities which fall within the prohibition, there, if the violation of the law do not appear upon the face of the instrument, and the party taking it is ignorant that it was made in contravention of the statute, it is an available security in the hands of such a person.' 3 B. & A. 1.

---

* 16 Ch. 2. c. 7.
† 9 Ann. c. 14. ‡ 7 Geo. 2. c. 8. 19 Geo. 2. c. 37.
§ 6 Geo. 1. c. 18. ‖ 5 Geo. 4. c. 114.
¶ 1 Com. 58.  11 East, 180.
†† 2 Rose's Bankr. Cases, 349.
‡‡ 2 Campb. 144.

* See Drury v. Defontaine, 5 B. & A. 335. The stat. imposes a penalty on all who exercise their worldly calling on a Sunday.

† Carthew, 252.

‡ 2 Bos. & Pul. 371. 3 Ves. Jun. 373. 14 Ves. J. 192. 3 B. & A. 179. 5 B. & A. 335 It is laid down by a respectable writer (Deacon on the law and practice of of bankruptcy, v. i. p. 305.,) that 'if the consideration for which a security is given be good in part, and bad in part, though the security is void in law, yet in equity and in proceedings in bankruptcy, it shall stand as to what is good.' This position is not true. It is supported only by decisions proceeding on the exploded principle mentioned in the text, and now, therefore, overruled. See Exparte Daniel, 14 Ves. 192.

§ Poplett v. Stockdale, cor. Best, C. J.

* 1 P. W. 181. 2 Saund. 156. n. 1. 2 Marsh. 273. 5 T. R. 118. 4 East, 190.

† 8 T. R. 89, 2 B. & C. 661. But see 2 Bing. 242. There is much good sense (though the reporter seems to have taken some pains to disguise it) in the remarks of C. J. Best on this subject.

‡ 8 T. R. 548. 1 Rob. Rep. 196. 3 Bos. & Pul. 200. and see 1 M. & S. 726. 1 Taunt. 28. 6 Taunt. 237. 7 Taunt. 447. The alleged impolicy is, that trade improves the resources of the enemy, which it is the interest of the opposite party to impair. Did it never strike our sage forefathers that the prohibition cut both ways?

§ 3 T. R. 17.

‖ 8 B. & C. 421.

of the composition, is fraudulent and void.* The creditors bargain for an equal benefit; and it is therefore unjust towards the body that one should be more favored than the rest. A. guarantees payment for certain goods to be furnished by B. to C. A private arrangement between B. and C. that a sum shall be charged beyond the market price, to be applied in payment of an antecedent debt, is such a fraud upon the surety, as releases him from all liability.† Collusive transfers of his property by a debtor for the sake of defeating the claim of a bonâ fide creditor, were at common law, and by the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5. are expressly declared to be, fraudulent and void as respects such creditor; the principle of which has, for the benefit of commerce, been extended much farther in the case of traders by the various bankrupt acts, which we shall have occasion hereafter to notice.

*2 Vern. 71. 602. 1 Atk. 105. 2 T. R. 763. 4 T. R. 166. 6 Ves. 300. 15 Ves. 52. 1 Cox's Rep. 287. 4 East, 372. 4 B. & A. 695. 4 Moore, 78. 4 B. & C. 511. 515. n.

† 3 B. & C. 605.

ENGLISH CASES.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH—APRIL.

(Sittings before Lord Tenterden and Common Juries.)

Coxe vs. Anwyl.

The Attorney General (with whom was Mr Richards) stated that this was an action brought by Miss Susanna Coxe, a young lady now 22 years of age, against the defendant, who is about 40, to recover compensation in damages for a breach of promise of marriage. The plaintiff was the youngest of three daughters of Mr Coxe, who resided at Leicester. He had been in business as a cotton-manufacturer, on an extensive scale, but had retired from business for a considerable number of years, and had lived retired with his daughters, to whom he had given an excellent education. The eldest had married a Major Smith, of the East India service, and had gone out to India with him; and the plaintiff and Miss Sarah Coxe, her sister, who was two years older, now resided with their father. The defendant was the son of a Clergyman of the Church of England, residing in North Wales, and was engaged in the silk trade, in partnership with a brother of his; and also in another trade with a person of the name of Evans; and, from his own representations, it would appear that he had been successful in both, and that he had considerable expectations besides. On a certain day in December 1827, it happened that Mr Coxe was in the public room at Leicester, and was inquiring whether any body there was at that time about to proceed to Newcastle-upon-Tyne, as he had to send a power of attorney to a person at that place to sell a vessel called the Albion, at that port, of which he was owner. The defendant was in the room at the time, and, addressing Mr Coxe, of whose name he appeared to have heard, although Mr Coxe did not know him, said that he was in a short time going on business to Newcastle, and would be glad to undertake to carry the document to that place and deliver it to the person mentioned, and that he would call at Mr Coxe's house when he should be ready to set out, and in this manner the acquaintance began. The defendant did not call so soon as was expected, but at length he did call, and stated that his journey had been unavoidably delayed longer than he had anticipated. Upon being introduced into Mr Coxe's house, he discovered that his daughters were very elegant and accomplished women; and, on further acquaintance, he became warmly attached to the plaintiff, and did everything in his power to gain her affections, and obtained her consent to make proposals to her father for their marriage. Having obtained it, he mentioned the matter to Mr Coxe, who, having been before satisfied that the defendant, who was known in Leicester, was in a good way of business, answered that he had no objections, as he was a man of good manners and unobjectionable moral principles; but the father at the same time distinctly apprised the defendant that he could give no fortune to his daughters on their marriage, having spent so much money on their education, and on that of a son. He added, that at his death his daughter, the plaintiff, would be entitled to something, as he meant to make no difference between his daughters, but at the same time that it would be so little that it was not worth his consideration, and that if he was to marry his daughter he must consider himself as marrying her without fortune. This was from the beginning perfectly open, candid, and fair, on the part of the father; and prudent also, as it would remove any ground of subsequent reflections with respect to fortune, and the defendant was of an age to be perfectly capable of judging for himself, and taking care that when he married he should have a sufficient provision to maintain a wife and family in comfort. In reply to the statement of the father, he said that he had already gained half as much as his utmost ambition aspired at, and that he wished to marry the plaintiff on her own account, and not on account of her fortune; that, besides his own accumulations, he had expectations from his family, and that he had no doubt but he would soon be able to keep for the plaintiff a close carriage and horses; and he then requested that he and the plaintiff might be allowed to correspond together. The correspondence accordingly commenced by a letter from the defendant to the plaintiff, dated 1st September, 1828, in which he expressed himself highly gratified at the prospect of his union with the plaintiff, and observed that it was unnecessary to resort to extravagant terms to express his happiness, and particularly requested that the plaintiff would place the fullest reliance on his honor and sincerity. It happened that the plaintiff had occasion to be bled at different times, and this had caused a stiffness and soreness in the arm, so that the plaintiff, although she could write a finer hand than her sister, could not write without pain; and it also happened that about this time there was superadded a sprain, as the defendant knew. In the answer sent to the defendant, therefore, the sister (Miss Sarah Coxe,) who, as the defendant well knew, was on the most intimate terms with the plaintiff, and on the most confidential footing both with plaintiff and defendant, was employed by the plaintiff as an amanuensis, and wrote from her dictation. The plaintiff never doubted but that the defendant knew this, and it might be thought a circumstance of little importance, but he mentioned it now because they would find that the defendant afterwards relied on it as some excuse for himself. So matters went on till the close of the year 1828, the defendant expressing his fixed purpose to marry the plaintiff. When on his visits at Leicester, he usually attended the family to church, and on these occasions publicly paid the most marked attention to the plaintiff, stayed behind with her in the church till the rest went out, and then walked with her alone; and in this manner held it out to the observation of all that they were destined to be married. The defendant also strongly urged the plaintiff immediately to fix a day for their marriage; but, as young ladies did not like to show themselves over precipitate in appointing, she declined making any appointment till the following day, that she might have an opportunity of consulting her father. On the following day the 17th March, 1829, was appointed for the marriage. The defendant, after remaining some time at Leicester, proceeded to different parts of the country on his business, and on the 19th Febuary he wrote a letter to the plaintiff, stating that he was under the necessity of proceeding to Wales, on account of the illness of his father, and that he would probably remain there for some time. In this letter he made no mention of his engagement for the 17th of March, but neither the plaintiff nor any of her family had any doubt of his honor and integrity, and she proceeded to get her bridal dress ready, and they all made preparations for the marriage. On the 27th of February the defendant again wrote to the plaintiff, in which he said that he had to go to Wales, on account of the illness of his brother, where he might have to remain for some weeks.—The plaintiff had written to the defendant on the 22d of February, in answer to his letter of the 19th, and expressed her hopes that the defendant would not fail to attend at Leicester on the 17th of March, as he had promised. But in his letter of the 27th he made no allusion to this, and yet there was some reason to suspect that the time during which he might remain in Wales would over-ride the day appointed for the marriage. On the morning of the 17th, the defendant did not attend according to his engagement, and the Jury might conceive the consternation of the plaintiff and her family. Miss Sarah Coxe, however, received a letter from the defendant on that morning, in which he requested her to reconcile her sister to the delay, and asked whether she had not written the plaintiff's letters for her. From this time the correspondence ceased till the 18th May, when the defendant, sent a letter to the plaintiff, in which he reproached her for want of candor and plain dealing, in imposing upon him her sister's letters as her own. The plaintiff, however, had practised no deception, but had merely employed her sister to write at her dictation, for the reason which he had already mentioned. The defendant, however, by this time had evidently become less ardent than he was before, but still he did not put an end to his engagement, and desired the plaintiff to write to him again. On the receipt of this letter it was determined that the father and daughters should proceed to London, where the defendant then was. On their arrival, Mr Coxe left his daughters at an inn or hotel, and proceeded to the counting-house of the defendant, and brought him along with him to the hotel. The defendant stretched out his hand to the plaintiff, but she very naturally drew back, and asked him what he meant by that? He said that he meant to forgive her, alluding, as it might be supposed, to the letters. The plaintiff said that she had merely desired her sister to write for her on account of the pain in her arm, and that he was aware that her sister was on terms of the utmost confidence, both with her and the defendant; and she said that before she gave him her hand he must explain his conduct, and declare what his intentions were. And what did the Jury think was the explanation? He said, 'I am a villain, and have acted like a villain!' The plaintiff said that she would not allow him to call himself a villain' and, considering this as an apology for his conduct, she said that if he would perform his engagement, which she considered necessary, as matters had proceeded so far, she would forgive him, and they would be on the same terms of affection as before. The defendant renewed his protestations of affection and promise of marriage, and said he had never been happy since he wrote the letter of the 18th of May, relative to the sister's writing the plaintiff's letters. The father then said that he hoped matters were arranged to the satisfaction of all parties, and asked the defendant whether he would come down to Leicester in a month. The defendant said that he would come in a month, or two months, at most, and marry his daughter. The family then returned to Leicester. The defendant afterwards wrote three letters to the plaintiff, in which he renewed the old subject about the letters, and the correspondence again began to relax. At length, on the 1st of September, Miss Coxe, at the desire of her father and sister, wrote a letter to the defendant, calling on him peremptorily to perform his engagement, and stating that otherwise she (plaintiff) would resort to the legal measures which, in case of his refusal, would become necessary to clear her reputation. A copy of this letter was sent to town, and another to Hastings, where it was thought the defendant might be. The copy sent to town was returned, marked 'Not at home,' and 'refused.' The copy sent to Hastings was not returned, but no answer was sent. The family then came to town, and in the month of October this action was commenced. As to the question of damages, he had only a few words to say. The plaintiff was compelled to bring the action to vindicate her character and honor, and any amount of damages that they would give would be but an imperfect compensation. As to the means of the defendant, they had it from himself that they were ample, and he hoped the Jury would give ample damages.

Miss Sarah Coxe, sister to the plaintiff, examined by the Attorney General—Her father resided in Leicester. He had three daughters—herself, the plaintiff, and another sister, married to Major Smith, and now in India. Saw defendant first in December 1827, and knew that he subsequently visited the family, and became very intimate in it. He stated that his father was a clergyman in Wales, and that he himself was engaged in the silk trade with a brother, and with the brother and a Mr Evans in the caulking and distillery trade. He paid the plaintiff the most particular attention from the beginning; and, in August, 1828, he declared his attachment to her in the witness's presence, for she was on terms of strict confidence with both parties. Her sister referred him to her father, to whom he applied. He then went away, and returned on the 1st of September, and then mentioned what her father said to him with respect to fortune; and he said that his reply was, that it was not fortune, but Susan only that he wished for. He said that he himself had already gained half what he desired, and what in the country they would call a good fortune, but what he (in London) would not consider so; but that, in a short time after the marriage, he would keep a close carriage for her. Her sister had sustained some injury in the arm in consequence of frequent bleeding, and the witness wrote her letters, at her sister's dictation. The witness was present in February 1829, when the defendant urged her sister to fix the day of the marriage, and she said she would consult her father, and the 17th of March was fixed upon. Her sister provided her wedding-dress, and prepared for the marriage. Her sister asked him whether his father could come to Leicester to marry them? and the defendant said that his father was too far advanced in age to undertake the journey, and that his sister could not leave him. The defendant frequently went to church with the family, and, on those occasions, publicly paid particular attention to the plaintiff.

The first letter of the defendant to the plaintiff was here read. This was dated from Hull, and gave an account of a loquacious little woman of the name of Mrs B., whom he had met on one of his journeys, who spoke of the Misses Coxe as well-educated women, who had been under the tuition of Miss Linwood; and said that she bronght up her own daughters in much better practices than going to see Madame Vestris; it was remarkable, he said, that she had five sons and eight daughters; he then gave her directions as to her manner of addressing him—such as to call him Robert in private, and Mr Anwyl in public; and the letter concluded with the following lines:—

At night and morn,
When, on bended knee
Praying, dearest Susan,
Think on me.

The letter of the 19th February, from the defendant to the plaintiff, in which he stated that he was under the necessity of being absent for some time on business, was then read, and also one of the 22d February, from the plaintiff, in which she stated her expectation that the defendant would attend at Leicester at the time he promised. She mentioned that her dress-maker had said that her bridal dress was very elegant, and asked what his tailor thought of his. The letter of the 27th of February was then read, in which he mentioned that he had another journey to perform. The witness, on the 17th of March, in the morning, received a letter from the defendant (which was destroyed), in which he requested her to reconcile her sister to the delay of the marriage, and asked her whether she had not written the letters for her sister. She sent him an answer. After this he discontinued the correspondence till the 18th of May. On that day the plaintiff received a letter from the defendant, in which he accused her of deception and want of candor in imposing on him her sister's letters as original and requested her to write to him again.

The witness stated, in continuation, that on the receipt of this letter the family went to London, and her father left them at an inn, and soon after returned with the defendant, who held out his hand to her sister, but she drew it back and said she would not take it till she knew what were his intentions. He answered as usual, 'To be sure.' She then talked to him on the subject of his last letter, he said that he never had known peace since he wrote it. He then said, 'Susan, I am unworthy of you—I am a villain.' The plaintiff replied, 'I will not hear you say so, if you are prepared still to act honorably.' He said he was; and, in allusion to the letters, he asked witness why she had not written in her own name? and at last said, 'hang the writing—say no more about it.' He then further said to her father, 'everything shall be properly settled according to your desire. I shall be at Leicester in a month—certainly at the end of two months—and marry your daughter.' They parted as good friends, and the family returned to Leicester. The defendant afterwards sent her sister three letters, but then relaxed in the correspondence; and at length, on the 1st of September, she wrote him by desire of her father and sister, and sent two copies or duplicates—one to London and one to Hastings. The former was returned 'refused'—the other was not.

Cross-examined by Mr Denman—Her father resided in a private house in Friar-lane, Leicester; he had been in business, but had left it off for 20 years. She was older than her sister. Her father at one time (not within her recollection) kept a grocer's shop, but latterly was a cotton-manufacturer on a large scale.

The last letter written by the plaintiff's sister to the defendant was then read, in which she reproached him with again mentioning the letters, as she had only done for her sister what thousands had done for others—and stated that, after matters had gone so far, it was necessary for the plaintiff's credit and character that he should perform his engagement. The witness, in continuation, said that her sister was now in town, and in a very bad state of health. She was, a few days ago at the house of Mr Jones, an attorney in the Temple. A brother of the defendant was there, and she conversèd with him in a dreadful state of agitation. The action was brought in October. Her sister wrote to the defendant since that time.

The Attorney-General objected to anything being said as to the contents of the letter without its being produced. The truth was that the defendant had been making protestations which the plaintiff and her friends had reason to believe to be sincere.

The witness, in answer to a further question by Mr Denman, said, that her sister was not attended by any medical man. The Doctor could not 'Administer to a mind diseased.'

Mr Denman, for the defendant, said that he stood in a very difficult situation, as the minds of the Jury must be strongly prepossessed by the statement of the Attorney-General, and the evidence of that ingenious and intelligent young lady who had just quitted the witness-box. But in the administration of justice all prejudices ought to be studiously discarded. In this case the plaintiff had really sustained no such serious injury as called for large damages. They would observe that no evidence had been given that the defendant had a fortune to enable him to pay large damages, for they could trust but little to the exaggerated representations of the defendant, wishing to place his circumstances in the best point of view in the eyes of the plaintiff and her friends. Upon a calm view of those circumstances, the defendant felt that he could not prudently marry. He totally disclaimed all imputation on the character of the plaintiff; but the Jury would observe that Mr Coxe, the father was not called, although he would have been the best witness to explain all the circumstances. But the case was left to the plaintiff's sister, who was a better advocate in the cause than the Attorney-General. The Jury would also observe that it did appear that the Coxes of Leicester had even communicated the circumstances of the projected union to the defendant's family: and there was no evidence that they knew anything about the matter even at this day. He then commented on some passages in the first letter, particularly that in which the defendant, as he said, went to the very heavens for metaphors to describe his celestial affection, and turned poetical on the occasion:—

When, night and morning, on your bended knee
Praying, my dearest Susan, think on me.

Letters of this kind, accompanied with the bad spelling, on account of which he so much dreaded the clever sister, were not such as very much to attract the affection and admiration of such a well-educated young lady as the plaintiff, and she could hardly feel so much distress for her loss. Mr Denman then adverted to the deception as to the letters, and said that this was very natural in a matter of this kind, and was even noticed as material in this Court in a trial yesterday (in Atkinson v. Acton) the case of a person hiring himself as a clerk and traveller. The defendant thought he had Susanna in his arms, and lo! it was Sarah. The defendant, to be sure, forgave the plaintiff; but then that affair was very cleverly managed, and in the result, the defendant was convinced that he could not prudently contract this marriage so soon as the plaintiff's family wished. There was no particular day fixed for the marriage at the time of the renewed promise, and yet they insisted that there should be no longer delay; and on the refusal of the defendant to comply immediately they brought this action. The sister said that the plaintiff was very ill; but it did not appear that she had any medical attendance, and the witness was ready with a reason for it, for she knew that the Doctor

'Could not minister to a mind diseased.'

On the whole, this was not a case for heavy damages.

Lord Tenterden observed that, if the Jury believed the evidence of Sarah Coxe, there could be no doubt but the plaintiff was entitled to their verdict; for she had proved two distinct promises of marriage; and besides the matter did not rest merely on the evidence of Sarah Coxe; for the promises appeared from the defendant's own letters; and he, when he wrote them, was in business, and of the age of 40—an age at which he must have been able to judge for himself. His Lordship then recapitulated the evidence, and said that there was sufficient proof of the breach of promise, and the plaintiff was entitled to their verdict. The next question was the amount of damages. The plaintiff himself had represented his circumstances as being good; whether he might not have represented these as something better than they really were, in order to secure an accomplished young lady so much younger than himself, it was for the Jury to consider. Something had been said about the eloquent manner in which Miss Sarah Coxe had given her testimony. She certainly appeared to be a well-educated and accomplished young lady, but he thought that she had given her evidence with the utmost propriety. The Jury would give such reasonable damages as they thought the case warranted.

The Jury, after consulting together for a few minutes, found for the plaintiff—Damages 500*l*.

---

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.—JUNE.

Sittings at Guildhall, before Chief Justice TINDAL and a Common Jury.

Strange vs. Wigney and others.

Mr Sergeant Wilde (with whom was Mr Kelly) stated that this was an action in trover, and was brought to recover 100*l*. being the value of a Bank post bill received by the defendants, without due caution, and applied to their own use. Mrs Strange was the proprietor of the Kentish Hotel, at Tonbridge Wells. On the 15th of September last she came to town by one of the stage-coaches, having with her a silk reticule, in which she placed her purse, containing a 100*l*. Bank post bill, and some other money. On arriving in town she proceeded in a hackney coach to a friend's house in the neighborhood of Smithfield; when she was getting out she desired a gentleman who accompanied her to hold the reticule for a moment; he, however, placed it on the seat of the hackney-coach, and forgot to take it with him when he left the coach. In a few minutes Mrs Strange became aware of her loss, but the hackney-coach was gone; and, not knowing the number, no trace of it could be obtained. Notice was given at the Hackney-coach Office, and the loss was published in handbills, and in one or two of the newspapers; and the Bank post bill was ordered to be stopped at the Bank. In a few days afterwards it was presented at the Bank by Messrs Masterman and Co. They, it appeared, had received it from the defendants, who are bankers at Brighton, and who changed the Bank post bill on the 24th of September for a stranger of respectable appearance, who stated that he was going to Southampton and the Isle of Wight. The defendants asked him no other questions; although his manner of indorsing the note was enough to excite some suspicion, he having written his address 'Lincoln-inn-fields' instead of 'Lincoln's-inn-fields,' after signing his name 'John Wilson,' the defendants thought proper to give him Bank of England notes for the bill, deducting a quarter per cent discount, but omitting to take the numbers of the notes which they gave in exchange. The question for the Jury would be whether the defendants had used due and reasonable diligence in this transaction; and as it was clear from the above statement that they had not, he felt confident the Jury would give a verdict in favor of tho client for the amount claimed.

After evidence had been heard in support of the plaintiff's case,

Mr Sergeant Taddy addressed the Jury on behalf of the defendants. The questions for them were, first, if the plaintiff had conducted herself with due and proper caution to secure the bill; secondly, whether she had used due diligence in trying to recover it: and, thirdly, if the defendants had been guilty of negligence in giving cash for it to a person who had the appearance of a gentleman. There could be no doubt, from the evidence before them, that the plaintiff had showed a want of caution in not putting the bill in a secure place, and leaving it in a hackney-coach. She also neglected to give due notice to the commercial world of the loss she had sustained, and contented herself with merely distributing handbills among the hackney-coachmen, and advertising in only one of the London papers, so that the defendants had not the slightest information on the subject until they heard the bill had been stopped at the Bank of England. It therefore appeared evident that the defendants had acted with as much caution as could be expected from bankers under such circumstances, and he felt convinced that the Jury would view the matter in the same light, and would give a verdict for the defendants.

The Chief Justice having summed up,

The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages 100*l*.

DIGEST OF RECENT ENGLISH REPORTS.

Hendebourck vs. Langton.

If several parishioners in vestry sign a resolution in the vestry minute-book, stating that they approve of an action brought by the surveyor of the highways against A. and that they do thereby guarantee to him all legal expenses that are or may be incurred by him in prosecuting that suit; this binds them personally, and will render each person signing it incompetent to be a witness at the trial of the action. 3 Carr. & Payne, 566.

Hall vs. Rex.

One admitting himself to be a co-contractor is not admissible as a witness for the defendant; on the ground of his liability to contribute to the costs and damages occasioned by the action. 6 Bing. 181.

---

EQUITY.

(Tamlyn, Part 1; 2 Bligh, Part 2; 3 Younge & Jervis, Part 2; 12 Price, Part 3.)

Cockle vs. Whiting.

The master of a vessel in the South Sea whale fishery, agrees on behalf of the owners, that each of the crew shall have a specified share of the profits of the voyage. Before the return of the vessel, the owners sell a quarter of the cargo. The custom of the trade is for the cooper to estimate the quantity of oil; this was done, and the plaintiff settled accordingly; Held, that the owners had no right to sell part of the cargo; but the plaintiff having settled could not then come for relief to equity. 1 Tam. 55.

Lewes vs. Morgan.

In taking an account of the pecuniary transactions between an attorney and his client, the production of a bond entered into by the latter is not sufficient evidence of a debt to that amount, and actual payment must be proved. 3 Younge & Jervis, 230.

Barnham vs. Munn.

A. agreed to lend B. 600*l*. navy stock: he sold the stock for 522*l*., which he paid to B. A bond was drawn, to repay 'the sum of 522*l*. (being the produce of 600*l*. navy 5 per cents, or such other sum as would replace the stock) with lawful interest.' B. on discharging the bond refused to replace the stock. A. received the money and gave up the bond: Held, that after having received the money, he could not come to equity for relief. 1 Tam. 86.

Hicks vs. Morant

The testamentary guardian of an infant sold part of his estates for the redemption of the land tax: the vendee paid the purchase money to the agent of the vendor, who was also agent for the vendee, and the conveyance was executed; but the agent did not pay the money into the bank as required by the act 38 Geo. 3. c. 60. The purchaser entered and continued in possession for many years, paying the land-tax. Nearly twenty years after, attaining his age, the heir at law brought an ejectment against the purchaser, to restrain which, and obtain a confirmation of the contract, the purchaser filed his bill. The Court dismissed the bill without costs. 3 Younge & Jervis, 286.

Willis vs. Farrer.

The Court ordered a new trial of an issue directed in a tithe suit, where it appeared that the verdict had been obtained by surprise, and against the opinion of the judge. 3 Younge & Jervis, 264.

Jones vs. Green.

By an indenture a farm was demised at a yearly rent, with a covenant by the tenant, that if, during the last three years of the term, he should rsow more than seventy acres of clover in one year, he should pay an additional rent of 10*l.* a year for every acre above seventy for the remainder of the term: Held, that the additional rent was in the nature of stipulated damages, entitling the plaintiff to a discovery in aid of an action at law; and a plea that the discovery would subject the defendant to penalties, was overruled. 3, Younge & Jervis, 298.

Oxenham vs. Esdaile.

The lien of a vendor upon the land and title deeds until payment of the purchase money, does not apply to a conveyance to the purchases executed by some, but not all of the parties, where the contract has gone off by the vendor's default; and if there be any lien on such a conveyance, it is vested in the purchaser as security for his deposit. 3 Younge & Jervis, 263.

Capper vs. Spottiswoode.

A vendor who has taken, as security for part of the purchase money, the bond of the vendee and the mortgagee of part of the property sold, has not, on the bankruptcy of the vendee, a lien on the whole estate. 1 Tam. 21.

MAINE.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT,

Vol. 5, of Greenleaf's Reports contains the cases decided from May 1827, to April 1829.

Fellow's case.

Where a venire facias directed the constable to cause a juror to be drawn, not more than twenty, nor less than six days before the sitting of the court; and he made return that the juror was drawn 'as above directed,' but without date; the return was held sufficient.

So, where the language of the return was—'We have appointed J. C. a juror,' &c; for it shall be intended the language of the town, of which the constable was an inhabitant.

So, where the person drawn as a juror was the constable himself, who served the venire facias, and made the return.

So, where the constable styled himself 'constable of the town,' without saying of what town; the venire facias being directed to the constable of the town of M.

It is no good cause of challenge, that a juror has been called as a witness for the State, on a former trial of the same indictment, to testify against the general character of the prisoner.

A defendant has no right, in any case, upon the coming in of the traverse jury to have them polled, and each one separately interrogated as to his assent to the verdict.

Irish vs. Webster & al.

The Land agent cannot maintain an action in his own name, upon a promissory note not negotiable, given to him in his official capacity, for timber belonging to the State.

Cousins, ex parte.

A license to sell the land of a minor, under Stat. 1826. ch. 342, may be granted in the alternative, for public or private sale.

Manson vs. Gardiner.

The receipt of money for an outstanding debt, by an administrator, after the lapse of four years from the grant of administration, does not revive any creditor's right of action which had been previously barred.

Where a vessel on a voyage to Trinidad, and back to her port of discharge in the United States, was captured in the year 1797, by the cruisers of the king of Spain, and condemned; and a sum of money was allowed and paid to the owners in 1824, under the Spanish treaty, for the loss of the vessel and freight:—It was held that the receipt of the money by the owners, did not revive the claim of a seaman for his wages for the homeward voyage, even up to the time of capture.

Gardiner vs. Nutting & al.

An acknowledgment of debt, or a new promise, by the maker of a promissory note, takes it out of the statute of limitations only so far as he is concerned; but does not affect the rights or obligations of collateral parties.

Where the maker of a promissory note, of more than six years' standing, died insolvent, and a collateral guarantor of the note was appointed a commissioner on his estate; the allowance of the note by the commissioner, as a valid claim against the estate, being an official act, was held not to amount to a new promise on his part to pay the debt.

Heald vs. Heald.

The statute of limitations applies to civil actions at common law; and not to a claim made before the Judge of Probate against an administrator, for the rents of real estate occupied by him.

Moore vs. Smith

The Stat. 1821, ch. 62, sec. 14, limiting penal actions to one year from the time of forfeiture, may be given in evidence under the general issue.

Gardiner C. & W. Factory vs. Gardiner.

The capital employed in manufactures, within the meaning of Stat. 1825, ch. 288, includes whatever is essential to the prosecution of the business, whether it be fixed or circulating capital. And it is immaterial whether it is derived from assessments, or loans, or otherwise.

Cram vs. Burnham.

Cohabitation, known to be adulterous in its origin, a former wife being still alive, conveys no right to the guilty parties, against third persons; nor does the continuance of such cohabitation, after the death of the lawful wife, afford legal presumption of a subsequent marriage.

Stevens vs. Morse & als.

Where the proprietors of a township, in order to encourage its settlement, voted to give lands and a sum of money to any person who would build mills on one of the lots designated, and maintain them for ten years, which was done;—this was held to give no right to flow the lands of any individual proprietor, holden in severalty at the time of the vote, though more than forty years had elapsed since the mills were built, without any claim of damage.

INTERESTING TO RETAILERS.

We learn from the Portland Courier of Tuesday that the long agitated question as to the constitutionality of the law requiring retailers of spirituous liquors to pay a duty for their license, was finally decided at the late term of the Supreme Court in that town: the action was brought by agreement between the defendant and others, for the express purpose of testing the validity of the law. The following report has been furnished for publication.

The State vs. Lunt.

The defendant in this cause was indicted for undertaking and presuming to be a common retailer of spirituous liquors contrary to the statute; and was defended by Messrs Fessenden and Deblois on the ground that the statute regulating retailers of spirits, and requiring a license, and the payment of a duty, was unconstitutional. As there are understood to be other cases, in other counties waiting the decision of this, the publication of the following opinion of the Court, delivered last week in this county, will be useful to a large portion of the people.

MELLEN, C. J. The object of the defendant in submitting the motion in arrest of judgment in this case is, to obtain the opinion of the Court on the question whether the section of the revised statutes ch. 133, for the violation of which he has been convicted, is a constitutional one, or a violation of the constitution. All acts of the Legislature are presumed to be constitutional, and the Court will never presume to pronounce a statute to be otherwise, unless in a case where the point is free from all doubt. So far as a long continued practice of successive Legislatures in Massachusetts, pursued also in this State has a tendency to sanction the act in question, and others similar in principle, such practice is unquestionably in favor of their constitutionality. We have never before heard the question agitated, or a doubt expressed in a court of law concerning the subject. In the constitution of Massachusetts, at least as originally formed, there was, and we presume there is now, an enumeration of specific powers granted to the Legislature, and among them is the power of laying duties and excises; which were the subjects of particular examination in the cases of Portland Bank vs. Apthorp, cited in the argument. It does not appear to the court that the decision of that case has any direct bearing upon the case at the bar; because in the 4th article, 3d part, 1st section of the constitution of this State, the power given to the Legislature is general, 'to make all reasonable laws and regulations for the defence of this State, not repugnant to this constitution, nor to that of the United States.'—In all cases where the Legislature have a constitutional authority to pass a law, the reasonableness of it seems to be a subject for their decision. We do not say that there may not possibly be exceptions to the generality of the above proposition; but we are not disposed to consider them as among the probabilities of Legislation. In the case before us, the Legislature, in the exercise of their constitutional power, have judged it reasonable and proper to impose duties on certain classes of persons in the community, such as Justices of the Peace, Sheriffs, Coroners, Clerks, Attorneys, Innholders, Retailers, &c. On payment of these duties, they may exercise certain powers. No doubt, such a law must be general in its operation—including all persons of the classes specified. Of this character is the statute on which the conviction of the defendant is founded. The Legislature have deemed it reasonable and proper, in the mode above mentioned, to add to the revenues of the State. It would appear strange that a law should be deemed unreasonable, because it prohibits the retailing of ardent spirits without special license; that it should be an unreasonable restraint upon the liberty of the citizens, to check those measures which are known to have a direct tendency to promote intemperance, and multiply evils and crimes in society. The idea is not admissible for a moment. But though this law imposes the duty, it provides no mode by which the collection of it can be enforced without the consent of the person on whom it is imposed; for no person appointed to any of the before mentioned offices, or licensed for either of the purposes before mentioned, can be compelled to accept the appointment or the license; and till such acceptance the duty does not become payable. So that in all these cases, the person appointed or licensed, does in effect, tax himself with the duty, and voluntarily pays it. In such cases, a man surely has no reason to complain of the law; it only authorises him, on payment of a certain sum, to enjoy what he deems a privilege and a source of profit; and prohibits the exercise of such privilege, for public reasons, unless such payment be previously made. We are all of opinion that there is no legal ground that can sustain the motion. The proper legal sentence must be awarded against the defendant.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1830.

Jeremy's Equity Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery.—To England the honor justly belongs of first establishing a national judiciary upon a permanent and independent basis. And yet it is not a little remarkable that the highest Judicial Officer of that kingdom holds his office at the pleasure of the King, and is liable to be displaced on every change of Ministers. With a Jurisdiction, which is general, and which pervades every part of the kingdom and embraces almost every topic of litigation, he holds his office by a tenure more feeble and uncertain than that of the lowest of the Common Law Judges. We should suppose that the place of all others which should be kept free from political influences. Yet none is so much exposed to them. Hence, it is said, that the Chancellor is sometimes more anxious for the preservation of his office, than for the honest discharge of its duties, and not unfrequently passes those hours which should be devoted to the judgment seat, in posting between London and Windsor. With a power, in many cases, which almost amounts to an unchecked and unrestricted discretion, he is liable to the full operation of those personal and temporary considerations which would be regarded as disqualifying the humblest Judge for the discharge of his official duties. And, besides, his office is not merely Judicial, but, in some sort, political. 'He acts occasionally as speaker of the House of Lords—attends upon meetings of the Privy Council—and examines treaties, conventions, charters, &c. He presides also generally at the hearing of Appeals in the House of Lords. While inferior Judges hold their places quamdiu benè se gesserint, the highest Officer in the realm owes his existence to the stability of a political faction: and a squabble in the cabinet—a misunderstanding between two right honorable secretaries—in short, any "untoward event" may suddenly sink him into comparative insignificance and penury.'

And yet some of the purest, wisest, and most learned Lawyers in England have presided in that Court, and dispensed, with an equal hand, its Equities to the nation. The court has always been the subject of complaint and attack, and yet it has always been crowded with business. Lord Eldon has suffered more abuse, perhaps, than any other Judge in England, while scarcely an opinion, which he has ever given, has been overruled, and competent judges have declared that he has 'attained a standing of greater eminence than any Judge since Lord Coke; that he was profoundly skilled in jurisprudence, and marvellously learned in the English Law.' The High Court of Chancery is a complicated machine, and could be made tolerable in no other country. No one can understand its operations but those who preside or practise in it. There are three Heads, at least, and no one can tell how many subordinate members. There is the Lord Chancellor's tribunal—the Master of the Rolls', and the Vice Chancellor's. Any case may be brought before either of them except such as relate to lunatics, and those belong exclusively to the Chancellor. The Vice Chancellor not only attends to his own cases, but when his Lordship is otherwise engaged, he hears such as the Chancellor directs. After all, if the latter is dissatisfied with the decrees &c, of the former, he alters, discharges, or reverses them at pleasure. Besides these three leading functionaries, there are Masters, Clerks, Registrars and Commissioners almost without number.

It is no rare thing to obtain two opposite decisions, in the same hour, from different departments of the Court. It is no matter of wonder, then, that chancery suits should be proverbially long, and that the suitors should become hopelessly impoverished in their results. The whole chancery system has, heretofore, met with little favor in this country.

We seem now, however, to be fast introducing its principles into our courts, and shall soon find our litigants eagerly pressing into the Chancellor's tribunal or before the Master. In our own state the subject of Chancery Practice is beginning to excite considerable attention in the Profession. It has been, heretofore, but little regarded as a general study.

The treatise of Mr Jeremy is well spoken of by those who are familiar with the subjects embraced in it. It is a single octavo volume of 600 pages. The Table of Contents, which will be found below, sufficiently indicates the topics of discussion in the work.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

BOOK I.

Of the Exclusive Jurisdiction.

Chap. 1.—Of Trusts.
Sec. 1. Of the ancient trust.
Sec. 2. Of the modern trust.
1. Of express trusts.
2. Of implied trusts.
3. Of trustees.

Chap. 2.—Of Rights in Equity arising upon Mortgages.
Sec. 1. Of the equity of redemption.
Sec. 2. Of equitable mortgages.

Chap. 3.—Of the peculiar Rights in Equity of a Married Woman.
Sec. 1. Of her equity to a settlement.
Sec. 2. Of her separate estate.

Chap. 4.—Of Idiots and Lunatics.

Chap. 5.—Of Infants.
Sec. 1. Of their guardianship.
Sec. 2. Of their maintenance.
Sec. 3. Of their marriage.

Chap. 6.—Of Charities.
Sec. 1. Of the visitatorial power.
Sec. 2. Of charitable uses.

Chap. 7.—Of Receivers and of the Payment of money into Court.

BOOK II.

Of the Assistant Jurisdiction.

Chap. 1.—Of the enforcing the discovery of Facts and Circumstances which affect the merits of the qnestion at Law from Parties to the Litigation.

Chap. 2.—Of eliciting Evidence of Facts and Circumstances which affect the merits of the question at Law, from Persons not parties to the Litigation.

Chap. 3.—Of compelling the suppression of Facts and Circumstances which do not affect the merits of the question at Law, BOOK III.

Of the concurrent Jurisdiction.

Part. 1. OF THE PECULIAR MEANS OF ADMINISTERING JUSTICE.

Chap. 1.—Of the peculiar means of administering Distributive Justice.
Sec. 1. By making references to Masters.
Sec. 2. By directing Trials and Issues.
Sec. 3. By its mode of executing certain special decrees.
1. In ascertaining boundaries.
2. In making partition.
3. In setting out dower.

Chap. 2.—Of the peculiar means of administering Preventive Justice.
Sec. 1. By injunctions.
1. To restrain nuisance.
2. To restrain trespass.
3. To restrain waste.
4. To restrain proceedings at law.
Sec. 2. By decrees upon bills quia timet.

Part 2. OF THE GENERAL MEANS OF ADMINISTERING JUSTICE.

Chap. 1.—In cases of accident.

Chap. 2.—In cases of mistake.

Chap. 3.—In cases of fraud.

Chap. 4.—In cases where the remedies afforded by the courts of law are peculiarly inappropriate.
Sec. 1. By compelling the specific performance of agreements.
Sec. 2. By enforcing the delivery of specific chattels.
Sec. 3. By relieving against forfeitures and penalties.
Sec. 4. By rescinding agreements.
Sec. 5. By preventing abuses of the rules and practice of the courts of law.

Chap. 5.—In cases of Account.

ERRATA.—Several errors occurred in the Obituary notice in our last number. First line, after the word nature, insert 'which we call chance but' &c. 4th line for cases read causes. 2d column, 34th line, from top, for conformed read continued. 44th line for thirst read spirit.

BIGELOW'S SUPPLEMENT.

HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. have just published A Digest of Pickering's Reports, Volumes 2—7, being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports.—By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law. Oct. 2. eopis2w.

PROPOSALS for publishing by subscription an ANALYTICAL DIGEST OF ALL THE AMERICAN REPORTS. By WILLIAM HILLIARD, Jr. Counsellor at Law. Revised by BENJAMIN RAND, Counsellor at Law.

The study of American Jurisprudence will always form an essential part of the education of every accomplished American Lawyer. And to the practitioner, as well as to the jurist, the decisions of the various Courts of Law and Equity in the United States, are daily becoming more important. The Jurisprudence of the several States, with a single exception, is founded upon the Common Law of England. On most subjects of general importance, there is a great similarity in the legislative enactments of the several States. And the judicial decisions of the Courts of the several States, are often cited and respected as authorities in the Courts of other States than those in which they were pronounced. The decisions upon local or statutory law, merely, are comparatively few, and even in these, from the similarity in the statutes and usages of the several States, precedents and analogies may be found, of general application. Few, perhaps, are aware of the number of volumes of American Reports, which now exceeds two hundred and fifty. It is believed that an Analytical Digest of these Reports, upon the plan of Mr Jeremy's consolidated Digest of the English Reports, is a desideratum. The advantages of such a digest, judiciously arranged, so as to bring into one view all the adjudications of all the Courts in the United States, upon each particular subject, will be duly appreciated by every practical lawyer. It is intended that the work shall contain all the reported cases to the time of publication, without any exceptions; and a Supplement containing the subsequent decisions will be published annually.

The work will be published with despatch.

---

The work will be printed on a beautiful small type, and good paper, and will be comprised in four or five volumes, (probably not exceeding four,) royal octavo size, each volume to contain about 1000 pages; and will be delivered to subscribers at $5 per volume, in good law sheep binding, which is a very low price for a law work embracing so great a quantity of matter.

After publication the price of the work will be raised to $6 per volume.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From Hon. JOSEPH STORY, Judge of the Supreme Court of the U. S.; and Hon. ISAAC PARKER, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts.

The proposal of Mr Hilliard, to publish a uniform Digest of all the American Reports, upon the plan of the English Digest of Mr Jeremy, appears to me to be entitled to the patronage of the profession. No work of this kind, sufficiently accurate and extensive for general practice, at present exists. The want of one cannot but be felt by every lawyer, whose inquiries reach beyond the limits of the local law of his own State. Such a compilation, executed with the care, fidelity and ability, which so important a task demands, would be so highly useful, that it could scarcely fail of general approbation. As far as I have had the means of comprehending the plan of Mr Hilliard, from a personal communication with him, it appears to me entirely satisfactory. And the assistance and supervision of so distinguished a lawyer as Mr Rand, cannot but ensure an accuracy and completeness in the execution of the plan, correspondent with his just claims on the public confidence.

JOSEPH STORY.

---

I have no doubt the Digest proposed by Mr Hilliard will be highly useful, and that it will have a tendency to relieve the profession from the great labor of looking through hundreds of volumes, or of indices, to ascertain whether points sought for have been treated of and decided. I also feel assured that Mr Hilliard's professional acquirements, and assiduity in legal researches, qualify him to give such a book, under the revision proposed, all the usefulness which the plan suggests.

July 10. ISAAC PARKER.

---

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of administering and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire: and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Price $1,25.

Aug. 20.

---

NEW LAW BOOKS.—JOHN GRIGG, No. 9 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia, has just published the following valuable works.

CONDENSED REPORTS of CASES decided in the SUPREME COURT of the United States, from the organization of the Court at August term 1791, to January term 1828. Edited by Richard Peters, Counsellor at Law, and Reporter of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

This work is intended to contain the opinions of the Supreme Court, in the language of the Judges, in every case decided in that court from the establishment of the Government of the United States, to the commencement of Mr Peters's Reports at January term 1828. The reported decisions in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, upon similar points, are also collected and digested in the work, as notes; and abstracts of those Cases, and also of the collateral decisions of the Supreme Court are given, so that the Professional Gentleman and the Student will be in possession of all the adjudicated Law of all the Courts of the United States, in an authoritative, condensed, and arranged form.

The work will be contained in not more than six volumes; the first volume is now published; the second volume will be published about the 1st of August, and the balance of the work during the present year and 1831.

Those who wish to possess this work will do well to make an early application as the greatest portion of the edition is taken up by subscription. They are for sale by the principal Booksellers in the United States, with J. Griggs's other law publications.

Price six dollars to those who subscribe, and seven dollars to non-subscribers, payable on delivery of each volume.

PETERS' REPORTS.—Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Supreme Court of the United States, by Richard Peters, Esquire, Reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, 4 vols. royal 8vo.

FONBLANQUE'S Celebrated TREATISE ON EQUITY. A new edition, with considerable additions, from the last London edition, by a distinguished Member of the Philadelphia Bar, in 1 vol. royal 8vo.

CHITTY ON CONTRACTS. A new and Practical Treatise on the Law of Contracts not under Seal, and upon the usual Defences to Actions thereon, with Corrections and Additional References. By a member of the Massachusetts Bar, in 1 vol. 8vo.

SAUNDER'S REPORTS, in 3 vols. 8vo. The 4th American, from the 5th considerably enlarged London edition.

Say's Political Economy, new edition.

TOLLER'S LAW OF EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS. With notes and references to American Authorities, by E. D. Ingraham, Esq. new edition, in 1 vol. 8vo.

Sugden on the Law of Vendors in 1 vol. 8vo.

Jones on Bailments in 1 vol. 8vo.

CHANCERY REPORTS. JOHN GRIGG, has in press the Decisions of the English Chancery Reports, upon the plan which has been adopted and successfully executed with the 'English Common Law Reports.' The work will comprehend, in a condensed form, all the Reports which have not been republished in the United States; and it will be continued, so as to present to the profession, annually, the Chancery Reports as they shall hereafter appear in Great Britain.

The work will also contain references to the decisions of the chancery courts of the United States, and of the several states.

---

GRAY & BOWEN have received by late arrivals the following valuable Foreign Books, which they will sell at low prices.

Dibdin's Library Companion, second edition, one large 8vo. vol.

Bowring's Poetry of the Magyars.

Moore's Byron. Splendid quarto edition.

Belzoni's Researches in Egypt and Nubia.

Description of the Ruins of an Ancient City in South America, with plates.

Memoires de M. De Bourrienne, 10 vols.

Histoire De France. Par M. Bignon, 4 vols.

Dictionnaire de Maximes. Par J. L. Malire, 1 vol.

Histoire du Congress de Vienne, 3 vols. 8vo.

Lafayette en Amerique, with Plates, 2 vols. 8vo.

The Works of Lope de Vega, 21 vols. quarto, fine edition.

Obras de Quevedo, 11 vols.

Don Quixotte, 5 vols.

Las Eroticas Villegas, 2 vols.

Trabajos de Persiles y Sigismunda, 2 vols.

Teatro Italiano Antico, 8 vols. July 10.

---

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. This day published by HILLIARD, GRAY, & Co. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law: being a continuation of the Digest of Massachusetts Reports; and also a continuation of Metcalf's Digest of the same work. Neatly bound in Sheep, $3,50—Calf, $4,00.

---

DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS, TO WIT: District Clerk's Office.

BE it remembered, that on the seventeenth day of August, A. D. 1830, in the fiftyfifth year of the Independence of the United States of America, Lewis Bigelow of the said district, has deposited in this office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as author in the words following, to wit:

'A Digest of Pickering's Reports, volumes II.—VII., being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law.'

In conformity to the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned;' and also to an act entitled, 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled, 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned,' and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints.'

JNO. W. DAVIS, { Clerk of the District of Massachusetts.

---

NOW PUBLISHING, BY CARTER & HENDEE, A SERIES OF SCIENTIFIC TRACTS, designed for Instruction and Entertainment, and adapted to Schools, Lyceums and Families. Conducted by Josiah Holbrook and others.

The whole Series will contain simple and clear outlines of the various sciences, and their principal division, with their application to the common purposes of life.

TERMS.—Not less than 24 numbers of a 12mo size, containing 24 pages each, will be published in a year, at $1,50, payable in advance. July 10.

---

CARTER AND HENDEE have in Press, SELF EDUCATION; or, THE MEANS OF MORAL PROGRESS, Translated from the French of M. Le Baron Degerando. To this work was awarded the honor of being 'crowned' by the French Academy; a distinction annually confered on one or two works, deemed the most useful that have been published during the year. And a late Review remarks; 'We have no ethical work of any living English writer to be compared with that of Degerando.'

VIEW OF THE UNITED STATES, for the use of Schools, with Maps and numerous Engravings.

INFANT SCHOOL MANUAL, or Teacher's Assistant Second Edition. Enlarged and much improved.

SCRAP TABLE, containing Original Anecdotes and Sketches.

YOUNG LADY'S BOOK, with 700 engravings on wood, of a superior quality, intended as an Annual for 1831.

THE YOUTH'S KEEPSAKE, a Christmas and New Year's Offering for 1831.

A NEW COLLECTION OF PSALMS AND HYMNS, for Public Worship. By Rev. F. W. P. Greenwood.

---

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. Complete sets of this work (thirty volumes in all) can now be had, on application to the Publishers, on liberal terms. The number and variety of the topics discussed in this work, and the high reputation it enjoys both in this country and Europe, render it a most valuable addition to the library of literary men. A General Index of the first twentyfive volumes has also been published, in a style to match with the current volumes of the work.

Subscribers and others whose sets may be deficient, can be supplied with the missing numbers. Subscriptions to commence at any period, received at $5 per annum. GRAY & BOWEN.

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1830. NO. XI.

MERCANTILE LAW.

NO. IV.

[Continued.]

There is one species of contracts, which stands on a peculiar and somewhat precarious footing. Wagers are tolerated, but certainly not favored by the law. Indeed the pretexts, of which the courts have availed themselves for pronouncing them illegal, might occasionally provoke a smile. A wager, for example, on the event of a war was held invalid, because the person who lays such a wager has, it is said, a private interest *which may affect his wishes in a manner inconsistent with his public duty. Again, wagers concerning the produce of any particular branch of the revenue have been repeatedly declared void as tending to public inconvenience.† With a more pardonable subtlety the possibility, however remote, of personal annoyance to individuals who have chanced to be the subjects of the wagers, has been considered a sufficient reason for invalidating them.†

It will probably not have escaped notice, that in the various cases of illegal contracts, which have been adverted to, we have treated it as immaterial, whether the objection arose out of the stipulation sought to be enforced, or the consideration on which it was grounded. It was, indeed, formerly supposed that a deed (in which the consideration is not always stated) could not be invalidated at common law by an illegality not apparent upon the instrument itself. In such cases therefore, the interposition of a court of equity became necessary.§ But it has been now long determined that the most fair-seeming instrument which ingenuity can devise may be set aside even at common law, where the objection of illegality applies in fact, and is brought under the cognizance of the court by an allegation specially pleaded to the action. To C. J. Wilmot and his coadjutors belongs the merit of this decision. The instrument which was the subject of it was a bond drawn up in the usual form for the payment of money, but in fact substituted by way of indemnity for a note given by the obligee with a view to the compounding of a prosecution. And it is impossible not to admire the sentiments contained in the judgment, however, as critics, we may cavil at the language in which they are conveyed. 'The manner of the transaction,' said his lordship, 'was to gild over and conceal the truth, and whenever courts of law see such attempts made to conceal wicked deeds, they will brush away the cobweb varnish, and shew the transactions in their true light.' 'All writers upon our law agree that no polluted hand shall touch the pure foundation of justice.' Even the dignity of a record does not always protect it from impeachment; for a judgment which has been obtained by collusion between two to the prejudice of a third, though binding on the parties themselves may be avoided by the other upon allegation and proof of the fraud.*

Nor is the taint of illegality confined to the contracts of the immediate actors. It extends to all transactions done in contemplation or furtherance of the unlawful act by persons privy to, though not directly participating in it. Accordingly a druggist who, after the 42 Geo. 3. c. 38.† and before the 51 Geo. 3. c. 87.‡ sold drugs to a brewer, knowing that they were to be used in the brewery,§ and a person who lent money for the avowed purpose of paying stock-jobbing differences,‖ were not allowed to recover, the former the price of his drugs, the latter the money advanced. Again, where the seller of goods, a foreigner and resident abroad, had knowingly assisted the buyer in packing them in a way convenient for smuggling into England, the courts of this country refused to give him any remedy for the price.¶

But though the principle of the rule just stated has never perhaps been questioned, the courts have at times differed materially as to the extent of its application. On the one hand an inclination has been manifested in cases where there was no intrinsic turpitude in the agreement immediately before the court, to wink at the illegality with which it was avowedly connected, in order to do what was just, in a moral view, between the parties themselves. Thus where two persons jointly engaged in an illegal stock-jobbing transaction with a third, and, a loss having arisen, one of them paid the whole and took the bond of the other for his proportion, it was decided that the bond was good, the transaction as between the two being treated as a mere loan of money, the lender of which was not concerned in the use made of it by the borrower. And in a subsequent case, where one of the partners, under similar circumstances, paid the money with the authority and consent of the other, a majority of the Court of King's Bench decided that an action might be maintained against the other partner for a proportionate share.†† On the other hand, probably from an anxiety to give full effect to the policy of the law, it was in one case determined that money paid on account of an unlawful dealing could not be recovered by the person for whose use it was paid, even from an agent who was the mere instrument of transmission. The case occurred before Lord Kenyon at Nisi Prius. Two underwriters had engaged in an illegal partnership for the effecting of insurances, and one of them had paid his moiety upon a loss to the hands of a broker for the use of the other. His lordship ruled (and his opinion was adopted by the Court of King's Bench) that the latter could not maintain an action for it against the broker: no appeal, he said, could be made to a court of justice to enforce a contract founded in a breach of the law.* But after oscillating for sometime between these two extremes, the law has at length rested midway between them. The two former cases have been overruled by many decisions, in which the courts have taken cognizance, not merely of the contract technically presented to them, but of the unlawful transaction out of which it arose, and with which it was inseparably connected. The distinction between moral and merely prohibited offences, which was applied to those cases, has been, as we have said, denied, and the consent of the parties, which was a topic much insisted upon in the judgment, was designated by Lord Loughborough as 'a confederacy to break a positive law.'† On the other hand the case before Lord Kenyon seemed so outrageous a violation of the common principles of justice, that it was found impossible to support the decision. The law permits either of the parties to an illegal contract, however repugnant such conduct may be to honesty and good faith, to avail himself of that illegality as a defence to any action which may be brought for enforcing it. But this it does, not out of favor to the defendant, but because it will give no countenance to the plaintiff.‡ If the party who might on that ground have resisted the claim, think proper to waive the privilege, and fulfil the agreement, the courts will not permit another who is by accident only connected with the transaction, to take up the defence which the principal has abandoned, and make the law a cover for knavery and fraud. Whatever the nature of the original contract between the principal may have been, it would be grossly unjust that a man, whose hand merely is made use of for passing the money, should be allowed to intercept it in its transit, and appropriate it to himself. Undoubtedly, if by a contrary decision the court were furthering or even countenancing a transgression of the law, even this injustice would not warrant a departure from the strict rule. But in this case it is not so. The unlawful contract is already closed. It has been completed by what is virtually a payment to the party himself. Accordingly it has been since frequently determined that an agent cannot shelter himself by such a plea from paying the money over to the person for whom it was intended.§ Technically, the rule may be laid down thus. Whenever the illegal transaction forms a necessary and inseparable part of the subject matter of the action, the courts will neither enforce the contract when open, nor re-open it when closed: but if the case be so far independent of the illegal-

---

* 1 T. R. 57, n. (b.) 7 T. R. 535. 3 Bos. & Pul. 194. 4 Taunt. 290.

† 2 T. R. 610. 3 T. R. 693. 2 Bos. & Pul. 130. 467.

‡ Cowp. 729. 4 Campb. 152.

§ Treatise of Equity, b. 1. c. 4 s. 4.

* Collins v. Blantern, 2 Wils. 347.

† Which forbids the using of any ingredients but malt and hops.

‡ Which prohibits druggists from selling drugs to brewers.

§ 1 M. & S. 593.

‖ 3 B. & A. 179 These cases have overruled those of Holman v. Johnson, Cowp, 341, and Hodgson v. Temple, 5 Taunt. 181, in which the knowledge of the illegal purpose was considered as not precluding the recovery of the price.

¶ 5 T. R. 599. See also 3 T. R. 454. 4 T. R. 467; and 1 East, 98.

 4 Burr. 2069.

†† 3 T. R. 418.

* Sullivan v. Greaves, Park, Jus. 8. Lord Kenyon's principle is right. It is the application which is wrong. The contract was not founded on a breach of the law.

† 3 Ves. 373. The cases of Booth v. Hodgson, 6 T. R. 405.; Aubert v. Maze, 2 Bos. & Pul. 370; and Cannan v. Bryce, 3 B. & A. 179, have expressly overruled the decisions before alluded to. See also 6 T. R. 61. 1 M. & S. 594. 5 B & A 335, and 14 Ves. 192.

‡ The maxim is--in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis.

§ 1 Bos. & Pul. 3. Ibid 296.

ity, that it may be kept out of sight altogether without prejudicing the right of action, then the objection will not be admitted as an answer. For example: an agent sued his principal for commission and money expended in the purchase of shares in a company which was illegal under 6 Geo. 1. c. 18, and it was held that the action could not be maintained, and that the defendant, who had employed the plaintiff to purchase the shares, might nevertheless set up the illegality as a defence.* To be sure, the defence was a most iniquitous one; but the court, however disposed, could not shut their eyes to the unlawful transaction which constituted the very foundation and essence of the plaintiff's claim. On the other hand, in the case of the broker before mentioned, although the money was paid to him in pursuance of an unlawful contract, yet no such illegality appeared or even existed as between the parties to that suit; and to sustain the action it was merely necessary to shew that the money had been in fact received by the defendant, and that it had been received for the purpose of being paid over to the plaintiff.†

The law, out of the abundance of its generosity, compels no man to do that which is impossible, Such is the maxim:‡ and yet, to say the truth, this kind consideration of the law has more of seeming than reality. Undoubtedly, if two men are absurd enough, with their eyes open, to conclude a bargain, the stipulations of which, on either side, are such as it is manifestly impossible to perform, it leaves the sufferer to the consequences of his folly, and treats the impossible stipulation as a nullity.§ But if one party, for valuable consideration, undertake to do that which he only, and not the other, knows to be impossible, the undertaking is justly deemed obligatory on him, and he is answerable to the party imposed upon for the non-fulfilment of it.‖ Again, the impossibility which avoids an engagement, must be an absolute impossibility, not a mere personal inability. It is no excuse for a man to say, 'I cannot do what I have undertaken to do,' if it be such that another might.¶ There is, moreover, this distinction: an act may be impossible at the time of stipulating, or it may become so afterwards. Now the rule, as applicable to the latter case, is as follows:—If a person, upon whom the law has cast a duty or a charge, is, without default in himself, disabled from fulfiling it, and has no remedy against any other on account of the disabling circumstance, in such case the law will excuse him: but if he create the duty or charge by his own contract, he is bound to make good his engagement, even though prevented by inevitable necessity; because he might have contemplated and guarded against the contingency, and the law will protect no man from the consequences of his own improvidence. A single example will illustrate this. The charterer of a ship covenanted with the owner to send a cargo alongside at a foreign part. On arriving at the port, it was found that an infectious disorder was raging there, and that all intercourse was in consequence prohibited; yet the charterer was not released from his covenant.*

Contracts, it has been already said, are founded on a supposed reciprocity of advantage.† There may, indeed, be engagements purely gratuitous, proceeding from the impulse of kindly feeling, without an immediate expectation of return. But these, from their very nature, transcend the authority of law, the object of which is not, as we have seen, to enforce obligations merely honorary, but to regulate the intercourse of men in those transactions on which the maintenance of civil society immediately depends.‡ There cannot, of course, be a bargain without a consideration. It would be, as Lord Loughborough rightly observed, a contradiction in terms.§ But we go one step farther and say that neither can there be a contract without a consideration. Here, however, an important distinction must be observed. A consideration may be, to use the language of the law, either good or valuable. The affection of a father for his child, for instance, is a good consideration, but money, or money's worth is more—it is a valuable one. Now the former is sufficient to support and give validity to a certain description of deeds, and covenants evidenced by deed, but it will not, like the latter, sustain so as to give an obligatory force to an engagement not under seal. Even deeds, where natural affection is the only consideration, and à fortiori therefore deeds of mere gift may sometimes be set aside in favor, not only of after purchasers for valuable consideration,‖ but in certain cases, which will come under notice hereafter, of the bonâ fide creditors of the grantor. So carefully does the law (as indeed its legitimate province is) watch over the rights of those who deal together on the footing of a direct mutuality of benefit.

---

* 3 B. & C. 639.

† We are aware that we have assigned a disproportionate space to the consideration of this subject. But the numerous cases which daily occur, and the confusion which has prevailed in it, are, we think, a sufficient justification.

‡ Lex neminem cogit ad vana, seg impossibilia.

§ Co. Lit. 179 a. 197 b. 206 a. By the civil law, an impossible condition rendered a contract void: for it was concluded, that by adding a condition which they know to be impossible, the parties intended that the agreement should have an effect. Inst. lib. 3. tit. 20. 11.

‖ 'Suppose,' says Lord Holt, 'A., for money paid him by B., will undertake to do an impossible thing, shall not an action lie against him for not performing it, and shall he not answer for damages?' 2 Lord Raym. 1165.

¶ 2 Lord Raym. 1165. 1 Lev. 111. and see 1 Freeman, 83. 1 Salk. 172.

 Aleyn, 27. Noy, 70. Sir Wm. Jones on bailments, 65. 68. 115, 116. 5 T. R. 217. 8 T. R. 267. 10 East, 530, 3 Bos. & Pul, 291, 3 M. & S. 267.

* 3 M. & S. 267.

† There is a long and very unimportant controversy about the legal acceptation of the word CONTRACT in Fonblanque's notes to the Treatise of Equity—a work which in our opinion has been puffed beyond what it deserves.

‡ Mr Fonblanque objects to our law, that it is defective in not enforcing these honorary obligations. To us the objection seems very unphilosophical.

§ 2 Ves. J. 188. The judgment in this case will well repay a perusal.

‖ By stat. 27 Eliz. c. 4. the good consideration mentioned in this stat. and that of 13 Eliz, c. 5. is construed to mean a valuable consideration.

---

MR JEFFREY.

There is an amusing passage in one of the comedies of Aristophanes, where the foolish old Strepsiades is brought in by some disciples of the Grecian philosopher, exclaiming impatiently, 'Open the door, gentlemen, open the door, and show me immediately the great Socrates!' Feelings of similar anxiety animated me, during a recent sojourn at the northern metropolis, to see, and judge for myself, of one of the most celebrated men of modern times; of one whose fame as a critic and a politician is so extensively diffused throughout Great Britain—who has exerted so powerful and permanent an influence on the literature of the age,—who is, in short, gazed on with admiration, as the very star of whiggism—I mean Mr Jeffrey. I had for years been familiar with the writings of this distinguished individual, and in common with thousands of others, often trembled beneath the fulminations, and exulted in the victories, of this far-famed autocrat; and I could not, but with feelings of awe, approach the very Olympus of the Jupiter Tonans. I did not, in short, lose the opportunity of contemplating Mr Jeffrey, under another than the usual aspect. I carefully considered his character and demeanor as a public speaker, curious to see whether his tongue was as powerful as his pen—whether he was equally great as a popular advocate, and an 'Edinburgh Reviewer.' The result of my observations, I have thought, might be interesting and acceptable to the reader.

Next to the Great known Unknown, Mr Jeffrey is, undoubtedly, the most prominent and admired character in Scotland. In Edinburgh, he is, in a manner, idolized. Walter Scott is his countrymen's ornament; Francis Jeffrey, their champion,—their tower of strength. He is their oracle, both of politics and literature; the theme of universal and untiring encomium. I had not mingled long in Edinburgh society, before I began to express an ardent curiosity to see and hear Mr Jeffrey in the courts. My inquiries were answered by a reference to the Parliament House with an intimation that, at eleven o'clock, on a certain day, he was expected to speak in a cause involving the liberty of the press. To the appointed place I repaired, a full half hour before the opening of the court, and had leisure to contemplate the stirring scenes of the Outer House—a long, noisy, legal promenade, filled with all grades of the profession. While I was gazing thoughtfully on the bee-like throng around me, the ringing of a bell announced that the Jury Judge had taken his seat. There was a general rush towards the door of the Jury Court, which I approached in the rear of the throng, just in time to be—too late. Whispers of 'Jeffrey 's up,' were tantalizingly exciting—for I could squeeze in no more than half my left foot and one arm, and after remaining in this interesting position for some twenty minutes, I was compelled to return with my curiosity unsatisfied, and await some future opportunity. That soon presented itself in the late important trial of Cooper versus the Marquis of Bute. Jeffrey was retained by the noble defendant, and was expected to make a powerful and splendid effort to save a hopeless cause. In my way to the Parliament House, I pictured to myself the person of Mr Jeffrey, according to the ideas of a man which one cannot help forming from a frequent perusal of his writings. He is certainly a tall thin man—I thought,—somewhat elderly, with a rich Italian countenance, an eye full of brilliance and acuteness, an expanded forehead, a head thinly covered with black hair. There will be, I amused myself with conjecturing, both conscious power and dignity in his bearing, with some tendency to hauteur. Such was the portrait occupying my fancy—and similar ideas, I am convinced, are entertained of his person by nine tenths of those who have never seen him. On entering the Jury Court, Lord Chief Commissioner Adam was seated on the bench, and Mr Robertson was opening the plaintiff's case. A little behind him sat the Great Unknown, with his slovenly black gown, his huge walking-stick, and a pile of MSS. before him; and on his right sate Jeffrey! I do not think I removed my eyes from him for nearly half an hour. But how shall I in words adequately picture him, whom every artist, from Sir Henry Raeburn downwards, has uniformly failed in representing? Sir Henry exerted his utmost skill, but to no purpose; he produced a work, beautiful for its coloring and proportion; but the spirit and life and character of the original were wanting; it was not Jeffrey. The first thing that struck me as peculiar in Mr Jeffrey's appearance was, the absence of a wig. On inquiry, I found that, for some reason or other he has uniformly refused to wear one. The figure of Mr Jeffrey was far different from the beau ideal I had so long cherished. Let the reader fancy himself standing in front of a gentleman busily employed in writing; of short stature—say, five feet and an odd inch or two—dressed in a plain suit of black, his slight figure enveloped in a black gown, hanging negligently over his shoulders; over and above all, wearing a pair of heavy tortoise shell spectacles; and he will have a tolerably accurate notion of Mr Jeffrey, as he sits day after day in the Jury Court at Edinburgh. To descend, however, a little more to particulars. As to his forehead, although some have characterised it as 'superbly intellectual,' I confess I could not discover in it anything remarkable. Considering that the head is small, the forehead is certainly full and well developed, especially in those parts which the phrenologists have been pleased to allot to ideality; but as a forehead, it cannot be called either very lofty, or very capacious. When he looks up, it is furrowed all over with anxious wrinkles. His hair, short and thick, and once black, is now of an irongray color, and unaffectedly combed forward towards each temple, while the crown of the head is rather bald. His complexion is dark; and his features small, regular, and, when viewed in profile, rather handsome: his dark eyes are very brilliant and penetrating. Mr Jeffrey's countenance is evidently that of a thinking man, and is never destitute of expression. That expression, however, did not appear to me to be power—such as frowns in the rougher lineaments of Mr Brougham—but acuteness, energy, and vivacity. If I am not mistaken, there appeared, also, a settled expression of nervous irritability, or dissatisfaction, brooding over his features. On the present occasion, he was sedulously employed in taking notes of the facts and evidence of the case, not at all discomposed by all the noise around him. When I reflected that I was gazing on Jeffrey, in that slender, quiet, unassuming individual, apparently inferior in consequence to all his bustling brethren, I could scarcely persuade myself that my eyes were contemplating so far-famed a literary autocrat; or that so much power, so much bitter and searching sarcasm, so much refined subtlety, so much brilliant wit, in a word, so much versatility of parts, could, to use a homely English phrase, he packed in so small a compass.

Although the leading counsel of the noble defendant, and pitted against the formidable Solicitor General, Mr Jeffrey did not manifest any symptoms of anxiety. He did not cease writing, except for one moment, when he suddenly rose and put a question, which exceedingly discomfited a very fluent witness. He then resumed his pen; and continued so apparently indifferent to what was going on, that I began a second time to curse my ill luck in being disappointed, when I was assured by one of the counsel, that 'Jeffrey would be up in a few moments.' The Solicitor General had been on his legs for about an hour, answering several objections which had been started by one of the opposite counsel. As soon, however, as Mr Jeffrey perceived him drawing to a conclusion, he collected his papers, which lay scattered on every side of him, and began to chew hastily some small lozenges, with which his left waistcoat pocket is always filled. After swallowing a cup of coffee, he moved on towards the jury, and stood within a yard or two of the foreman: I stood between the two. Taking off his spectacles, he put them into a case, slowly and deliberately, and commenced speaking with the most perfect ease and nonchalance: he might have been addressing a friend at dinner. There is something very attractive in his voice and manner of speaking. His lively and intelligent eye glances freely around him, and his motions, though few, are graceful and natural. The only thing that appeared to detract from his perfect agreeableness (one has a right to be fastidious about such men as Jeffrey) was a certain mincing and over-refined Anglicism of intonation and phraseology, which seemed too artificial to be pleasing. He uniformly pronounces, for instance, the vowel i, with the quick and sharp sound of the English word eye, as in the word idea: 'I can't conceive,' is his favorite expression. For some time he spoke with rather a pensive and thoughtful air, which seemed to me extremely prepossessing, as indicating a consciousness of the difficult struggle he was commencing and that he was marshalling into array all his resources. He kindles as he proceeds, slowly but perceptibly, into a less and less subdued vivacity and animation: nothing, however, of boisterousness of voice, no ungainly attitudes or motions, are ever to be detected in Mr Jeffrey, even in the moments of highest excitement. There is perceptible throughout, the power, precision, and calmness of the thoroughly practised intellectual gladiator. I had heard much of his extraordinary fluency, but, truly the half of it was not told me. Though I have listened to celebrated speakers in my time, I never heard any that rivalled the delightful fluency of Jeffrey; reminding one, at every step, of the mellifluous line of Horace,

'Labitur et labetur in omne volubilis ævum.'

Though every sentence he uttered was worded with sufficient accuracy, and rounded with sufficient polish, to appear admirable in print; though at one time his declamation was chaste and elegant, occasionally glowing with the richest flowers of rhetoric, and then, manly, bold, and spirit-stirring,—now the honey of dulcet sentiment turned into the gall of bitter irony and fierce invective; though, throughout, his phraseology was choice and appropriate; yet the eloquent speaker never once faltered or hesitated during a speech of three hours and a half—never appeared the least confused, embarrassed, or exhausted. I soon saw how much I had erred in thinking him indifferent to the interests of his client, by his apparent remissness during the earlier stages of the trial. The exquisite adroitness with which he strung together whatever had fallen from the opposite side capable of being tortured into a discrepancy or contradiction—the acuteness with which he detected and exposed the most artful fallacies—the calm, confident, and masterly style in which he contrived to make 'the worse appear the better side,' and plucked all the weaknesses of his own case from the recollection of the jurors, to replace them with those of his adversaries; all this convinced me, that he had concentrated the whole powers of his mind on whatever had transpired during the trial, and afforded an apt illustration of the beautiful language of the late Mr Canning, when speaking of a first rate ship of war,—'Though apparently passive and motionless, yet silently concentrating the force to be put forward on an adequate occasion.' I never before hung on the lips of a public speaker with such delightful suspense, for the long space of three hours and a half: his tones are so various, his allusions so extensive—in a word, his resources so inexhaustible, that he is never monotonous or tedious.

How I pitied the poor jurors! The Solicitor General had marshalled on his side a strong phalanx of law, so that when he sat down, each looked on Jeffrey as a man in the forlorn hope, with not a leg to stand on. Their faces were turned towards him with an air of listless expectancy, approaching to indifference; but as the speaker proceeded, I could perceive their features quickening into excitement and uneasiness, as though indicating a suspicion that they had jumped rather too quickly to a conclusion. Jeffrey perceived his advantage, but did not suffer it to hurry him. He kept his keen eye fixed on that of the foreman, and continued speaking with such a calm and convincing air as seemed to insure conviction. He called for a cup of coffee, and on its being brought, took it into his hand, stirred it with the utmost indifference and sang-froid, and continued sipping a little at short intervals. He looked as if he were at breakfast in his own study. Strangers, attorneys, jury, advocates, and the judge, all gazing on him with fixed earnestness, and he sipping and speaking, and speaking and sipping, as if he were dictating at home to an amanuensis. The Solicitor General looked at the Judge, and he at the Solicitor again, and they smiled. About an hour afterwards, Jeffrey perceived the latter drinking out of a tea-cup. 'Is that tea, or coffee, Mr Solicitor General?' he inquired, pausing a moment—'If it's coffee, I'll thank you for a cup, for mine is done.' This certainly appeared rather artificial. He would occasionally fold his arms on his breast, and say, 'Now gentlemen of the Jury, let us pause for a moment or two, to look about us, and see where we have got to;' and then, with a few emphatic pauses, recapitulate his leading arguments, and thus keep them full in the recollection of his hearers. The facts of the case were shortly these:—'The late Lord Bute had appointed a Mr Cooper, a theological student at Glasgow University, to be private tutor to his son, and after a few years, in compensation for his services, had presented him with a bond of annuity for life. Sometime afterwards, his Lordship procured Mr Cooper some livings in Wales, to the amount of £300 a year, and in 1811, Mr C. surrendered to his Lordship the bond of annuity. In 1820 he died; and the present action was brought by the father of the deceased, to claim from the present Marquis the annuity due from 1811 to 1820 inclusive. The case was tried on the two following issues: was the deceased sane or not, at the time of giving up this bond? and was the obligation extinguished by its surrender? The great point which the plaintiff's counsel labored to establish was the insanity of Mr Cooper, at the time of giving up the bond; and, certainly, evidence was adduced, which was irrefragible. It was, however, wonderful to see the confidence and apparent sincerity with which Mr Jeffrey undertook to grapple with the whole body of the obnoxious testimony, and explain away the most incontrovertible manifestations of madness, into anything but madness. He had a reason ready for everything. One circumstance adduced in strong corroboration of the alleged insanity of the plaintiff was, that he one morning leaped from his bed, with nothing on but his shirt and a night-cap, and sallied forth with a sword in one hand and a pistol in the other, in pursuit of a hen, which he chased thrice round the garden. This was a desperate fact, and stoutly sworn to; but our counsellor 'found nothing in it indicative of madness'—and, after convulsing the court with laughter by a ludicrous caricature of this insane exploit, instructed the jury to look at it in no other point of view, than as the frolicsomeness of an eccentric young man! On one occasion, he said to the Jury, with the most impenetrable sang froid, 'Gentlemen, I address you as men of plain and simple understandings.' I observed the Jury; and each of them looked at the other with an odd air of wonder and concern, to hear themselves the subjects of such a sorry compliment! What I chiefly admired in Jeffrey was, his choiceness of expression and singular felicity of illustration.

To be concluded next week.

ENGLISH CASES.

PREROGATIVE COURT.—MAY.

Before Sir John Nicholl.

Simpson vs. Choppin and Skelton.

Sir John Nicholl gave judgment in this case. It was a suit to determine as to the validity of the will of the late Mr Charles Frederick Schweitzer, which was opposed by the relatives on the ground of the insanity of the testator. When the case was before the Court on the arguments, we stated the facts so fully that it is unnecessary to do more at present than to allude to a few of those which were the most prominent.

The testator was a man of most eccentric habits from his very childhood. His father sent him abroad for his education, but he behaved in such an extraordinary manner in several of the Continental cities, and uttered his sentiments on religion and politics so freely, that he was continually getting into scrapes with the authorities. Upon his return to this country, his father purchased a commission for him in the 27th regiment, which he soon after quitted without leave, and his commission was superseded. When his father died, the property came in equal shares between the testator and his brother, being about 1000*l.* a year to each. The brother ran through his share in the speculations of 1825. The testator lent him 1000*l.*, but, upon his spending that also, he would lend him no more, saying, that he deserved to suffer. From this period he continued residing at one coffeehouse or another until his death. He had made several wills, one in favor of a lady whom he had seen at a party only once, and whom he declared to be the finest woman in England. Another will gave his property to a Miss Morris, but this will he revoked, because Miss Morris had gone unattended in the evening from her father's house to a house a few doors off. The will in question was in favor of a child of three or four years of age, named Elizabeth Huggins, the grand-daughter of Mr Simpson, the proprietor of Simpson's Coffeehouse, Cornhill, at which place he frequently took up his residence. He had in former wills left legacies to the children of Mrs Choppin and Mrs Skelton, but in this will he had wholly omitted their names. He had taken, at an early period, to excessive drinking, and this habit increased on him towards the close of his life, and though he committed various irregularities, yet still he kept an account at the Bank, and transacted all his pecuniary matters there, without assistance, up to the period of his death. He was in the habit of wearing solid gold buttons on his coat, and he carried his money in something similar to a shot-belt. On one occasion he wrote to old Mr Skelton a letter, which he addressed 'To old Skelton,' and dated it 'This day of our Lord Jesus Christ the carpenter's son.' He was a professed atheist, and was in the habit, when intoxicated, of swearing oaths of the most horrible description. He also carried blasphemous prints in his hat, to assist him in his irreligious arguments.

Sir John Nicholl, after adverting to the principal facts adduced in evidence, said that the question for the Court was whether the testator was of unsound mind, or the contrary. The facts in support of either view of the case were pretty strong, and it appeared almost as if the relatives themselves appeared to think him sane, for they left to him the sole management of himself and of his property, up to the period of his death. It had, however, been proved in some instances that persons who had always conducted themselves and their property well, were nevertheless insane, and this was done by taking a view of the whole course of their lives. The partition between eccentricity and insanity was so thin, that it was difficult to say where the former terminated, and where the latter began. He was certainly both odd and eccentric, and had latterly given way to habits of intoxication to such a degree, that he would take nothing but champaign or brandy for breakfast. He was irritable, passionate, malicious, violent, suspicious, and given to groundless aversions. The combination of all these feelings had generally been taken as indicative of insanity. With respect to his atheism, he did not think that that necessarily indicated insanity, and he would not give judgment upon such a ground; but he did think the manner in which it existed in the mind of the testator, and the extraordinary mode which he took of communicating it to others, did indicate unsoundness of mind.—Under all the circumstances of the case, he must come to the conclusion that the deceased was not only an eccentric man, but that he was insane, and the will, therefore, must be set aside, and Mr Schweitzer be taken to have died intestate. The Court, however, would order the costs to be paid out of the estate.

Kerr vs. Phillips and others.

This was a question as to the testamentary intentions of Mrs Charlotte Phillips, the lady whose sudden death at Finchley excited so much public attention a short time since.

Dr Lushington supported an allegation praying the Court to admit two unfinished papers to probate, as they contained the intentions of the deceased with respect to her property. The deceased, under her mother's will, became entitled to a sum of 5,000*l.* and she had executed a regular will on the 31st July, 1829, disposing of this sum in a particular manner. Five days afterwards she drew up another paper of instructions, containing a different disposition of her property, which she placed in the hands of a Mrs Vesset, requesting they might be given to Mr Scott her attorney, to be put into a legal form. Before this was accomplished, Mrs Phillips died, and the admission of these papers to probate was opposed by her next relative, Mr Atkinson, who would be entitled to the property had she died intestate.

The King's Advocate appeared on behalf of Mr Atkinson, and contended that this paper ought not legally to operate, as the probability was, she had not finally made up her mind as to the ultimate disposal of her property.

Dr Adams appeared for the husband, Mr H. Phillips, and contended that the will of July, 1829, was not procured by undue influence of the husband, as had been asserted. With respect to the allegation, he declared it was a matter of indifference to his party whether it was admitted or not. The only important difference between them appeared to be a bequest of 500*l.* to Mr Phillip's natural daughter, and a different disposition of the moiety of 2,500*l.* to her husband.

The Judge said it was evident that the intentions of the deceased were contained in the will of 1829, and the instructions now propounded; and he should, therefore, direct the allegation to be admitted.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.—MAY.

Sittings in Banco at Westminster Hall.

Loder vs. Rowbottom.

Mr Sergeant Jones on a former day obtained a conditional rule to set aside the declaration in this case, on the ground of want of service of the writ upon the defendant.

Mr Sergeant Wilde now showed cause against the rule, and read an affidavit to prove that the writ had been regularly served upon the defendant. The deponent stated that he called, at five o'clock in the morning, at the defendant's in James-street, Covent-garden, at the house commonly known by the name of 'The Finish,' of which he was the proprietor. He waited there until six o'clock, when he saw a man come up from the cellar with his coat off. He proceeded to the bar, and helped himself to some mixed spirits. From the description deponent had no doubt he was Mr Rowbottom. He addressed him, and said 'Pray, Sir, are you Mr Rowbottom?' 'Yes,' replied the person with his coat off, 'that is my name.' Deponent then asked him if he knew the plaintiff, and he said 'Yes, he is a d——d v——.' He (the Learned Sergeant) understood that Mr Rowbottom kept the Finish, and, no doubt, from his language, he was a finished man—(laughter). From the terms of the affidavit it was evident that the writ was regularly served, and he therefore hoped the Court would discharge the rule.

Mr Sergeant Jones thought there was no proof that the process had been served upon the defendant. The mere fact of seeing a man without his coat was no proof of his being the proprietor of the house.

The Chief Justice—It was rather a familiar way for him to help himself to liquor with his coat off.

Mr Justice Park—And take the spirits without paying for it—(laughter.)

Mr Justice Gaselee said that the defendant's affidavit was not sufficient: he must swear that he did not know that the writ was served. If the whole of his affidavit had been read, the Court would never have granted the rule.

After some further observations from the Counsel on both sides,

The Court discharged the rule for setting aside the declaration.

JUNE.

Pictou vs. Chapman.

This was an action for slander, and the declaration charged the defendant with having said of the plaintiff, who was a wine-merchant, 'He is a swindling rascal, and pays nobody; take care of him, as he is connected with bad people.' These words were proved at the trial before Mr Justice Gaselee, and evidence was also given to show that the plaintiff had suffered special damage in consequence of the alleged slanderous expressions. It was contended, on the part of the defendant, that these words were uttered in confidential communications, and consequently were not actionable. The Jury found a verdict for the defendant.

Mr Sergeant Wilde moved to set aside the verdict, on the ground of misdirection on the part of the Learned Judge. It was proved at the trial that the communications in question were not confidential, but the Learned Judge, in summing, directed the Jury to say whether they were or not. He (Mr Sergeant Wilde) should submit that that was a misdirection, as there was positive evidence (uncontradicted by the defendant) that the communications were confidential, and the Jury could not, in justice, find otherwise.

Mr Justice Gaselee read his notes of the trial, and observed that he was very much surprised at the finding of the Jury; so much so, that after the verdict was given, he asked Mr Sergeant Taddy (the defendant's Counsel) if he would consent to their reconsidering the verdict, but he objected. He (Mr Justice Gaselee) summed up with a great bias in favor of the plaintiff, and he was not aware that he had given any misdirection. The only question now was, if he should have directed the Jury to find for the plaintiff?

It was stated, in the course of the arguments, that the plaintiff and one of the witnesses were in prison for debt.

The Chief Justice said it appeared to him that there had been no misdirection by the Learned Judge who tried the case, and he should strongly recommend the parties to carry the proceedings no farther, and that there should be a stet processus.

Mr Justice Park observed that under the peculiar circumstances of this case he thought it would be cruel to suffer protracted litigation, and it would be well if this Court (like the House of Lords) adopted the plan of adjourning certain matters sine die—(laughter). He therefore hoped that the parties would consent to a stet processus.

Mr Sergeant Wilde said he should be glad to recommend such an arrangement, but his client objected to anything of the kind.

The Chief Justice said that the plaintiff could not have a new trial, without the payment of costs.

After some further observations from the Learned Judges and the Counsel,

The Court granted leave for a new trial, upon the payment of costs by the plaintiff; or that a stet processus should be entered, but strongly recommending the latter course.

---

POLICE—MANSION HOUSE.

A man named Simmons applied to the Lord Mayor for advice in what manner to act under the following circumstances:—

Being in want of a lobster for his wife's supper, the applicant went to a fishmonger at Billingsgate, and choosing a very fine-looking fish, agreed to give the sum of 1*s.* for it. The salesman had many other lobsters on his board, but he particularly recommended the aforesaid. When the applicant turned round the fish for the purpose of examining what he called the 'bowel part,' the salesman desired him to handle it in a particular way, for fear the beauty or the shape should suffer detriment. He accordingly handled the lobster—not by holding it up by the tail, as is the usual way, but by merely putting it on its back. All seemed right, the body of the lobster had a full appearance, and Mr Simmons went away perfectly satisfied with his bargain, and presented it to his wife. Mrs Simmons, however, perceived a blemish, which had escaped the eyes of her husband—there was not a morsel of 'bowel' in the enormous shell, so that, supposing her husband had been treating some unworthy woman to the contents, and that he thought proper to insult her, she flung his purchase at his head, and 'blowed him up most terribly.' He did all he could to pacify her, and took her to the fish-salesman, who made things worse, because he said he 'knowed nothing about the lobster.'

The Lord Mayor said the fish-salesman had no more bowels than the lobster, to deny the knowledge of the fish, when one word from him would have restored perfect harmony. His Lordship regretted that he could not punish so cruel and unjust a salesman; but he really thought the claws, which appeared to be full, were worth the shilling. 'I know,' said his Lordship, 'if I were to send for a lobster, they would charge me eight or nine shillings for such a one as that was.

Mr Simmons hoped the Lord Mayor would cause the salesman to be brought before him to account, not for the deficiency, but for the deception.

The lobster was here exhibited—the skin had been neatly tucked under parts of the shell, so that the hole through which the most delicious portion of the fish had been scooped was not visible until the tail was unfolded.

The Lord Mayor felt the lobster, and thought it was so light, that he doubted the furniture of the claws very much. He smelt it, but nothing could be more sweet. His Lordship then held it up to the light, and, to the surprise of all, said, 'Bless me, why, I could read a newspaper through any part of it!'

Mr Simmons exhibited the greatest possible indignation, and begged that a summons, at least, might be served upon the salesman. He, however, admitted that he had selected the lobster because it was ticketed 'one shilling,' and he produced the ticket, on which was discovered, under the words 'A fine lobster,' in very small letters, the word 'Shell.'

The Lord Mayor advised Mr Simmons to buy a lobster for his wife as soon as possible.

With this advice the applicant was dismissed.

---

MAINE.

The President, &c, of the Kennebec Bank vs. Tuckerman.

Assumpsit by the plaintiffs as payees of a promissory note, against the defendant as maker. The note was dated Oct. 27, 1817, in the usual form of a joint and several note, payable in fifty-seven days with grace, signed by Benjamin Adams, with the names of two persons underneath, as sureties, payable to the plaintiffs, and discounted at their bank. Before it was offered for discount the defendant wrote his name across the back of it.

At the trial before Weston J. the defendant contended that the note did not support the declaration. But this objection was overruled. The jury, being requested to determine certain facts, found that the defendant requested the plaintiffs to collect the note of the principal; that afterwards the plaintiffs did verbally agree with the principal to allow him further time; that the interest was paid in advance by the principal debtor, every sixty days, up to July, 1815; the last payment having been in May of that year; and that the plaintiffs, if they had used all the means in their power, after the request made to them by the defendant, might have collected of the principal debtor more money than they did, by the sum of $226,83.

The judge directed the jury to return a verdict for the plaintiffs, upon this evidence, reserving its legal effect for the consideration of the court; the parties consenting that the verdict might be amended accordingly, or set aside, and a nonsuit entered.

Mellen, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court, at the ensuing November term, in Cumberland.

The defendant having signed his name in blank, on the back of the note in question, has made himself answerable in the same manner as though he had signed it in the usual form, as the other promissors did. All the four persons are to be considered as having promised jointly and severally. The only question is, whether the defendant, who, it is admitted, was only a surety, with others, for Benjamin Adams the principal, has been discharged from his original liability, by reason of the transactions which took place between the bank and the principal. This original liability of the defendant as a copromissor, seems established by the cases of Carver vs. Warren, 5. Mass. 545. White vs. Howland, 9. Mass. 314, and Moies vs. Bird, 11, Mass. 436.

As to the main question, the facts are few and simple. The note continued to be in the bank, from the time it was discounted, until May, 1825—nearly eight years—not renewed in form; but the plaintiffs agreed with the principal, to allow him further time, and the principal, every sixty days, paid the interest on the note in advance, during the above period. This course of proceeding was pursued, probably, for convenience; and as between the bank and the principal, at least, was equivalent to a renewal of the note every sixty days; and the receipt of interest, in advance, for sixty days, was an agreement to give credit for that term. The transaction can admit of no other construction, consistently with honesty and fairness; and it could not have been considered in any other manner, by the parties immediately concerned. It has been said that parol agreements cannot be made by a corporation; but they may be, and usually are by bank directors, in relation to subjects of this nature; we, therefore, do not deem this a valid objection. By the report it does not appear that this long delay and course of proceeding, were even known to the defendant; it is stated to have taken place after he had requested the plaintiffs to collect the note of the principal. It remains for us only to apply the law to these facts. A mere delay to sue the principal, and collect the money of him, does not discharge the surety; as is admitted by the defendant's counsel, and is established by Locke vs. The United States, 3. Mason, 446; and by numerous other decisions, which are collected in the case of Hunt, executor, vs. Bridgham & als. 2. Pick. 581; provided such delay be unaccompanied by fraud, or an agreement not to prosecute the principal. But in the same case, and those therein cited, it is also settled that such an agreement does discharge the surety; and in Pain vs. Packard, 13. Johns. 174, and King vs. Baldwin, 17, Johns. 384, in each of which there was a request by the surety to proceed against the principal, and a prolongation of credit to him, though there was no contract for delay; it was decided that the surety was discharged. In the case at bar, all three of the circumstances which have been considered as tending to the discharge of a surety are found to exist; there was long delay and repeated credit given to the principal; there was a request by the surety to collect the note of him: and there was an agreement on the part of the plaintiff, to give further time; pursuant to which, all proceedings against the principal have been delayed. On these facts, the action cannot be maintained. Verdict set aside and nonsuit entered.

[See 8 Pick. 458—Oxford bank vs. Lewis. Ib. 422, Oxford bank vs. Haynes.]

---

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT,

Vol: 5, of Greenleaf's Reports contains the cases decided from May 1827, to April 1829.

Chamberlain vs. Harrod.

The purchase of a ship, in a foreign port, by the master, at a sale by authority, is generally to be considered as made for the benefit of the owners, if they elect so to regard it.

Winslow vs. Prince.

The provision of Stat. 1821, ch. 164, sec. 46, exempting the clerk of a militia company from the payment of costs to the defendant in any suit where the captain has indorsed on the writ his approval of the prosecution, extends to the costs in all subsequent stages of the proceedings, as well as to those accruing in the Justice's court.

Sawtel vs. Davis.

The forms of militia returns, prescribed and furnished by the Adjutant General, pursuant to the act of Congress of May 8, 1792, sec. 6, are of the same binding force as if they were contained in the act itself.

The day on which the name of a person, coming to reside within the bounds of a militia company, is placed on the muster roll, should be entered in the proper column on the roll. And parol evidence is not admissible to supply the omission of such entry.

Ripley vs. Berry & al.

Where land is conveyed by deed, referring to a plan, between which, and the original survey, there is a difference in the location of lines and monuments; the lines and monuments, originally marked as such, are to govern, however they may differ from those represented in the plan.

Bean vs. Mayo & al.

Where a fulling-mill and land were sold, and mortgaged back to the grantor to secure payment of the purchase money, and by his bond of the same date he entered into certain stipulations respecting the liberties and immunities which the grantees should enjoy, in the use of the water and dam, &c, and covenanted that he would forthwith build for them certain machinery for their mill; and that he would not follow nor permit others to pursue the same business there, while it should be followed by the grantees; and reserved to himself the use of a room in the premises for a limited term;—it was held that these stipulations amounted to a covenant that the mortgagors should occupy the premises, so long as they continued to fulfil the conditions of their deed of mortgage; and that they constituted a good bar to a writ of entry at common law brought by the mortgagee.

Read vs. Jewett.

Where both parties proved that a bill of sale, though absolute in its terms, was intended only as collateral security for a debt due, and this done with good faith; the transfer was holden valid as a mortgage.

Whether such proof is open to the vendee, if objected to, in a question between him and an attaching creditor of the vendor—quære.

Baylies & als. vs. Bussey.

Where a mortgagee joined in making a second mortgage to another person, who entered for condition broken, and afterwards, before the mortgage was foreclosed by the lapse of the three years, executed and tendered to them a deed of release of the premises according to a previous stipulation, which they refused to receive till five years after the time of entry; it was held that the effect of the release was merely to replace the estate in them as they held it before the second mortgage, restoring them to the original relation of mortgagor and mortgagee.

Bullard vs. Hinkley.

Land being under mortgage, A. a creditor of the mortgagor attached his right in equity of redemption. Afterwards B. another creditor, attached the fee. A. having obtained judgment, caused the right in equity to be seized in execution, and sold by the sheriff; after which the mortgagee made a deed of release and quitclaim of his right in the land, to the mortgagor.—It was held that by this deed the original mortgagor became the assignee of the mortgagee, invested with the character of a mortgagee;—and that B. the second attaching creditor, who subsequently obtained judgment in his suit, could not take the land for his debt, there having been no entry to foreclose the mortgage;—and that a deed of release and quitclaim afterwards given by the original debtor to the purchaser of the equity of redemption, vested in the latter the title to the whole fee.

A deed of quitclaim from the mortgagee to the mortgagor does not operate to extinguish the mortgage till it is delivered, although it may previously have been put on record by the mortgagee.

Holbrook vs. Baker.

The possession of a personal chattel, by the mortgagor, is not inconsistent with the mortgage, and furnishes of itself, no conclusive evidence of fraud.

Nor is it a valid objection, by a creditor against a mortgage of personal chattels, that it is made to cover future advances, if it is also made to secure an existing debt.

Parsonsfield vs. Dalton.

Where a town had become a congregational parish, by building a meeting house for that denomination, and settling a minister; and afterwards an act was passed incorporating certain individuals by name, with their families, having B. R. for their pastor, with their associates and such others as might afterwards associate with them, as the congregational society in the same town of P,;—it was held that this act did not create a new corporation, but only recognized and confirmed the rights of the parish already existing and entitled to the parish funds, and to the lands reserved for the use of the ministry in the town.

Sewall & als. vs. Ridlon.

It is no valid objection to an ancient record of partition by petition, under Stat. 1783, ch. 41, and Stat. 1786, ch. 53, that no interlocutory judgment was formerly entered, if it appear that notice was regularly given, and no one appeared to object, and that thereupon commissioners were appointed to make partition.

It is not necessary that commissioners, appointed to make partition under the statutes, should be inhabitants of the county in which the lands lie.

Proceedings in partition, in the Supreme Judicial Court, by petition pursuant to the statutes, may lawfully be in any county in the State, if no person appear to contest the title of the petitioner, or if the controversy is an issue of law. But when an issue of fact is joined, the record is to be remitted for trial of the issue, to the county where the lands lie.

But if the trial is in any other county, and without consent of parties, yet the judgment will not be void for want of jurisdiction; but will be good, till avoided by writ of error.

---

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1830.

Another Number of Pickering's Reports is just published, and for sale at Hilliard, Gray and Co's. This Number completes the 8th volume. It contains the cases decided from Berkshire September to Middlesex October term, 1829. Many of them are important and interesting. We are quite sure that every gentleman in the Profession, as much as he may feel the expense and inconvenience which arise from the rapid growth of Books, is glad to meet with a new Number from the untiring hand of our Reporter. His Numbers come forth rapidly, not because they are filled up with useless and irrelevant matter, but because he is diligent and active in giving early to the public the opinions of an industrious Court, crowded with business.

We believe we can, in truth, say of Mr Pickering, what we should be glad to be able to predicate of many others in the same vocation, that he never makes up his report of cases with a view to swell his Volume. He seems content with giving a succinct and perspicuous statement of the case, the authorities cited by Counsel, and the opinion of the Court. And what is somewhat remarkable now-a-days, he is willing to let a case off with a single statement of it; whereas in some Books of high authority, it is no rare occurrence to be obliged to wade twice and even thrice through the same prosy development of facts and circumstances.

The Judgment or opinion of the Court not unfrequently makes the smallest figure in the case. It is no difficult matter to make as many Volumes of Reports as Booksellers will buy, and more than they can sell, if every lawyer who makes a good argument, and will take the trouble to write it out, may have it published at the expense of the Profession. Reports made up in this way would 'grow to be like elephantini libri of infinite length' —mere collections of forensic speeches—books of eloquent specimens for declamation in the schools. It would be only expressing what every one has thought, who has bought and read Wheaton's Reports, were we to say, that the arguments which are there published of some of the ablest Lawyers in the country, and on the most important questions which can engage the deliberations of a Court, although well worth reading and preserving, are too dearly bought, and not a little out of place in a series of Law Reports. However desirable it may be to preserve these efforts of our distinguished Jurists and to treasure up in some permanent form, what would be otherwise so easily and so soon lost, it is nevertheless very clear that a Book of Reports is the last place in which they should be recorded. They are as much misplaced as they would be in an Elementary Treatise. Being of no authority in themselves, they, for the most part, neither add to nor take from the weight of the opinion of the Court.

It is somewhere said that 'either the Judges of former times spoke less, or the reporters were not so ready-handed as to take all they said.' Both are probably true. Judges were then much less given to amplifying, and, as it is now called, exhausting a subject.

It was not thought necessary to carry the researches of the Court into every division and department of a class of principles, in discussing and deciding a single question which arises within it. There is with us, in some cases, a fondness for display of erudition and a parade of authorities, which on every favorable occasion, urges the Judge into the wide domain of principle, argument and precedents. The inquiry before the Court is often overwhelmed with illustration and learned commentary. A question on a Policy of Insurance, or the Statute of Limitations can hardly be discussed, much less decided, without laying the whole body of civil law under contribution, and selecting, comparing and classifying the whole list of analagous authorities from the Year Books down. If the opinion of a single Judge or a single Court, thus elaborately formed, could be regarded as binding and conclusive, there would be some hope left of reconciling conflicting authorities, and of narrowing the debateable grounds of the Law. But it is not so. Whenever the subject starts up again in some new form and new forum, the ground is to be perambulated afresh by some other Judge, and perhaps with different results. In the case above alluded to, of the Statute of Limitations, the subject was long ago supposed to be exhausted, and yet no topic in the law furnishes a wider range for discussion and learned amplification. Formerly, a party could be charged, as on a new promise, for saying nothing, and now he can hardly say enough for that purpose. He who learned his law upon the subject twenty years ago, will find it necessary to revise it, and that the recent decisions at Washington and Westminster Hall have entirely changed it. This is but one case out of many.

We have some doubt whether much progress is made in settling the law by the modern mode of expanding and dressing up opinions with so much real or affected erudition.

This much, however, is certain, that thereby authorities are manufactured, and books multiplied beyond all example and all hope of relief. While this latitude of discussion and statement of the grounds and principles of their judgments is indulged by the Courts, our Reports must, of course, be prolix and burthensome. It is a hard labor to be brief. Thought and effort are required to be concise. It is the perfection of Juridical skill and the height of legal learning to be clear, direct, conclusive. When the object is clearly seen, the way to reach it is rarely doubtful or difficult. If reformation is effected in this matter, it must come from the Courts. The remedy must be applied where the evil originates. We shall expect reform and correction here, when, and not before, Lawyers begin to learn that the fullest reports are not always the best, and the Judges to reflect that a collection of cases is not always a collection of law.

NEW LAW JOURNALS.

A weekly quarto periodical under the title of 'The Jurisprudent' has been commenced in Boston. A semi-monthly publication in an octavo form has also been recently issued in Philadelphia, called 'The Journal of Law,' which is edited by an association of gentlemen. Doubts have been suggested whether these periodicals, with those of the same nature already established, will meet with adequate support. For ourselves, we see no reason why they should not. Works of this nature, if conducted faithfully, cannot fail of being highly useful to the profession. The number of Law Reports, Treatises, Abridgments, &c, that now annually issue from the press, and the many new and highly important points of law that are determined throughout our extensive and rapidly growing country, certainly require the aid of more than one or two Law Journals and Reviews to enable the profession to keep their knowledge of the advancing state of jurisprudence regularly 'posted up.' Professional learning is not now, as it once was, contained in a narrow compass, but is spread over so wide a field, that unless there are certain members of the profession detached for the purpose of watching and reporting information, and in tracing the causes, and in considering the propriety of sudden innovations and gradual and imperceptible changes which are making, lawyers, generally, must necessarily remain ignorant of what it much concerns them to know. There are many subjects too, of vast importance to the practitioner, that require to be treated of, but which would not make a treatise sufficiently large to warrant their separate publication; and in this respect alone, as we conceive, works of the above description, which contain essays upon such subjects, must be highly useful. Considering the number of Theological and Medical periodicals that are now issued in the United states, four periodicals (and each somewhat different in its plan from the others) devoted to Law, will certainly not be deemed an unreasonable number. The whole expense of the present number of Law periodicals does not exceed $12,50 per annum, a sum which would go comparatively but a very little way in satisfying the wants of the lawyer, should these periodicals be discontinued on account of a meagre subscription list.—U. S. Law Intel. and Rev.

---

Extract from a Letter of a Professor in the London University, communicated to a gentleman of this city, in a letter from his correspondent, July 8th, 1830.

'I hope to be able to make some of the writings of the American Jurists better known than they are, at present, to the Lawyers of this country. I have read two volumes of Kent's Commentaries upon American Law, which are excellent, and make me very much desire to become better acquainted with any other works he may have published. Perhaps you could oblige me when you write your friend ——— next time, by mentioning that I have a great wish to have a list of the most approved Treatises written by gentlemen of the American Bar.'

---

Christian Examiner on Criminal Law.—A letter has been received in this city from the Commissioners in England, appointed to prepare the new statute for the Criminal Code, under the direction of Sir Robert Peel, addressed to the author of the article on Criminal Law, in the Christian Examiner for July, 1830, expressing 'a high sense of the just and enlightened sentiments which pervade that article,' and requesting the aid of the writer in conveying to the Commissioners a further history of that branch of jurisprudence within the United States.

The writer of the article was Hon. James T. Austin of this city.—Patriot.

---

GREENFIELD, OCT. 5.—Case of Dr Cooley.—At the recent Law Term of the S. J. Court, holden at Northampton, the motion in arrest of judgment in the case of the Commonwealth vs. Cooley, for disinterring the body of Pierce Chase, was argued last week. The Court on Saturday gave their opinion that the Statute regulating the subject had superseded the Common Law offence, and the defendant was discharged.—Gaz.

---

At the Law Term of the Supreme Judicial Court, holden at Northampton last week, Henry Chapman of Greenfield, Edward Dickinson of Amherst, and George Ashmun of Springfield, were admitted as Counsellors; and William G. Bates of Westfield, Henry Starkweather of Ware, Frederick H. Allen of New Salem, and William M. Lathrop of Enfield, as Attorneys of said Court.

The following gentlemen were admitted, the 5th inst, as Attorneys of the Court of Common Pleas, now in session in this city, viz: Messrs J. Winslow Whitman, jr., Chas. Cushing Paine, Hamilton Hutchins, Jas. M. Barker, Edmund Quincy, Richard Hildreth, and John H. Gray.

---

We regret to learn that some irregularity has occurred in the transmission of our paper to our New York subscribers. Such arrangements are now made, as will, we think, prevent any delay in future.

---

New Publications.

AMERICAN.

Vol. 8. No. 2. Pickering's Reports.

A Practical Treatise on the Law of Partnership by Niel Gow, Esq. 2d American from 2d London Edition, with Notes and References to American Cases.

ENGLISH.

Haggard's Ecclesiastical Reports, vol. II. part 4.

Judicial Letters, addressed to the Rt. Hon. Sir Robert Peel, in reference to the present crisis of Law Reform.

Cresswell's Insolvent Reports, part III.

Lloyd and Welsby's Mercantile Reports.

Barnewell & Cresswell's Reports, K. B. Vol. 9, part 4.

Brigham's Reports C. P. vol. 6, part 4.

Sir John Bayley on Bills of Exchange &c. 5th Edition, Edited by Francis Bayley.

Russell's Reports in Chancery. Vol. III. part III.

---

BIGELOW'S SUPPLEMENT. HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. have just published A Digest of Pickering's Reports, Volumes 2—7, being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports.—By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law. Oct. 2. eopis2w.

PROPOSALS for publishing by subscription an ANALYTICAL DIGEST OF ALL THE AMERICAN REPORTS. By WILLIAM HILLIARD, Jr. Counsellor at Law. Revised by BENJAMIN RAND, Counsellor at Law.

The study of American Jurisprudence will always form an essential part of the education of every accomplished American Lawyer. And to the practitioner, as well as to the jurist, the decisions of the various Courts of Law and Equity in the United States, are daily becoming more important. The Jurisprudence of the several States, with a single exception, is founded upon the Common Law of England. On most subjects of general importance, there is a great similarity in the legislative enactments of the several States. And the judicial decisions of the Courts of the several States, are often cited and respected as authorities in the Courts of other States than those in which they were pronounced. The decisions upon local or statutory law, merely, are comparatively few, and even in these, from the similarity in the statutes and usages of the several States, precedents and analogies may be found, of general application. Few, perhaps, are aware of the number of volumes of American Reports, which now exceeds two hundred and fifty. It is believed that an Analytical Digest of these Reports, upon the plan of Mr Jeremy's consolidated Digest of the English Reports, is a desideratum. The advantages of such a digest, judiciously arranged, so as to bring into one view all the adjudications of all the Courts in the United States, upon each particular subject, will be duly appreciated by every practical lawyer. It is intended that the work shall contain all the reported cases to the time of publication, without any exceptions; and a Supplement containing the subsequent decisions will be published annually.

The work will be published with despatch.

---

The work will be printed on a beautiful small type, and good paper, and will be comprised in four or five volumes, (probably not exceeding four,) royal octavo size, each volume to contain about 1000 pages; and will be delivered to subscribers at $5 per volume, in good law sheep binding, which is a very low price for a law work embracing so great a quantity of matter.

After publication the price of the work will be raised to $6 per volume.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From Hon. JOSEPH STORY, Judge of the Supreme Court of the U. S.; and Hon. ISAAC PARKER, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts.

The proposal of Mr Hilliard, to publish a uniform Digest of all the American Reports, upon the plan of the English Digest of Mr Jeremy, appears to me to be entitled to the patronage of the profession. No work of this kind, sufficiently accurate and extensive for general practice, at present exists. The want of one cannot but be felt by every lawyer, whose inquiries reach beyond the limits of the local law of his own State. Such a compilation, executed with the care, fidelity and ability, which so important a task demands, would be so highly useful, that it could scarcely fail of general approbation. As far as I have had the means of comprehending the plan of Mr Hilliard, from a personal communication with him, it appears to me entirely satisfactory. And the assistance and supervision of so distinguished a lawyer as Mr Rand, cannot but ensure an accuracy and completeness in the execution of the plan, correspondent with his just claims on the public confidence.

JOSEPH STORY.

---

I have no doubt the Digest proposed by Mr Hilliard will be highly useful, and that it will have a tendency to relieve the profession from the great labor of looking through hundreds of volumes, or of indices, to ascertain whether points sought for have been treated of and decided. I also feel assured that Mr Hilliard's professional acquirements, and assiduity in legal researches, qualify him to give such a book, under the revision proposed, all the usefulness which the plan suggests.

July 10. ISAAC PARKER.

---

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of administering and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire: and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Price $1,25

Aug. 20.

---

NEW LAW BOOKS.—JOHN GRIGG, No. 9 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia, has just published the following valuable works.

CONDENSED REPORTS of CASES decided in the SUPREME COURT of the United States, from the organization of the Court at August term 1791, to January term 1828. Edited by Richard Peters, Counsellor at Law, and Reporter of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

This work is intended to contain the opinions of the Supreme Court, in the language of the Judges, in every case decided in that court from the establishment of the Government of the United States, to the commencement of Mr Peters's Reports at January term 1828. The reported decisions in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, upon similar points, are also collected and digested in the work, as notes; and abstracts of those Cases, and also of the collateral decisions of the Supreme Court are given, so that the Professional Gentleman and the Student will be in possession of all the adjudicated Law of all the Courts of the United States, in an authoritative, condensed, and arranged form.

The work will be contained in not more than six volumes; the first volume is now published; the second volume will be published about the 1st of August, and the balance of the work during the present year and 1831.

Those who wish to possess this work will do well to make an early application as the greatest portion of the edition is taken up by subscription. They are for sale by the principal Booksellers in the United States, with J. Griggs's other law publications.

Price six dollars to those who subscribe, and seven dollars to non-subscribers, payable on delivery of each volume.

PETERS' REPORTS.—Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Supreme Court of the United States, by Richard Peters, Esquire, Reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, 4 vols. royal 8vo.

FONBLANQUE'S Celebrated TREATISE ON EQUITY. A new edition, with considerable additions, from the last London edition, by a distinguished Member of the Philadelphia Bar, in 1 vol. royal 8vo.

CHITTY ON CONTRACTS. A new and Practical Treatise on the Law of Contracts not under Seal, and upon the usual Defences to Actions thereon, with Corrections and Additional References. By a member of the Massachusetts Bar, in 1 vol. 8vo.

SAUNDER'S REPORTS, in 3 vols. 8vo. The 4th American, from the 5th considerably enlarged London edition.

Say's Political Economy, new edition.

TOLLER'S LAW OF EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS. With notes and references to American Authorities, by E. D. Ingraham, Esq. new edition, in 1 vol. 8vo.

Sugden on the Law of Vendors in 1 vol. 8vo.

Jones on Bailments in 1 vol. 8vo.

CHANCERY REPORTS. JOHN GRIGG, has in press the Decisions of the English Chancery Reports, upon the plan which has been adopted and successfully executed with the 'English Common Law Reports.' The work will comprehend, in a condensed form, all the Reports which have not been republished in the United States; and it will be continued, so as to present to the profession, annually, the Chancery Reports as they shall hereafter appear in Great Britain.

The work will also contain references to the decisions of the chancery courts of the United States, and of the several states.

---

GRAY & BOWEN have received by late arrivals the following valuable Foreign Books, which they will sell at low prices.

Dibdin's Library Companion, second edition, one large 8vo. vol.

Bowring's Poetry of the Magyars.

Moore's Byron. Splendid quarto edition.

Belzoni's Researches in Egypt and Nubia.

Description of the Ruins of an Ancient City in South America, with plates.

Memoires de M. De Bourrienne, 10 vols.

Histoire De France. Par M. Bignon, 4 vols.

Dictionnaire de Maximes. Par J. L. Malire, 1 vol.

Histoire du Congress de Vienne, 3 vols. 8vo.

Lafayette en Amerique, with Plates, 2 vols. 8vo.

The Works of Lope de Vega, 21 vols. quarto, fine edition.

Obras de Quevedo, 11 vols.

Don Quixotte, 5 vols.

Las Eroticas Villegas, 2 vols.

Trabajos de Persiles y Sigismunda, 2 vols.

Teatro Italiano Antico, 8 vols. July 10.

---

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. This day published by HILLIARD, GRAY, & Co. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law: being a continuation of the Digest of Massachusetts Reports; and also a continuation of Metcalf's Digest of the same work. Neatly bound in Sheep, $3,50—Calf, $4,00.

---

DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS, TO WIT: District Clerk's Office.

BE it remembered, that on the seventeenth day of August, A. D. 1830, in the fiftyfifth year of the Independence of the United States of America, Lewis Bigelow of the said district, has deposited in this office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as author in the words following, to wit:

'A Digest of Pickering's Reports, volumes II.—VII., being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law.'

In conformity to the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned;' and also to an act entitled, 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled, 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned,' and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints.'

JNO. W. DAVIS, Clerk of the District of Massachusetts.

---

NOW PUBLISHING, BY CARTER & HENDEE, A SERIES OF SCIENTIFIC TRACTS, designed for Instruction and Entertainment, and adapted to Schools, Lyceums and Families. Conducted by Josiah Holbrook and others.

The whole Series will contain simple and clear outlines of the various sciences, and their principal division, with their application to the common purposes of life.

TERMS.—Not less than 24 numbers of a 12mo size, containing 24 pages each, will be published in a year, at $1,50, payable in advance. July 10.

---

CARTER AND HENDEE have in Press, SELF EDUCATION; or, THE MEANS OF MORAL PROGRESS, Translated from the French of M. Le Baron Degerando. To this work was awarded the honor of being 'crowned' by the French Academy; a distinction annually confered on one or two works, deemed the most useful that have been published during the year. And a late Review remarks; 'We have no ethical work of any living English writer to be compared with that of Degerando.'

VIEW OF THE UNITED STATES, for the use of Schools, with Maps and numerous Engravings.

INFANT SCHOOL MANUAL, or Teacher's Assistant Second Edition. Enlarged and much improved.

SCRAP TABLE, containing Original Anecdotes and Sketches.

YOUNG LADY'S BOOK, with 700 engravings on wood, of a superior quality, intended as an Annual for 1831.

THE YOUTH'S KEEPSAKE, a Christmas and New Year's Offering for 1831.

A NEW COLLECTION OF PSALMS AND HYMNS, for Public Worship. By Rev. F. W. P. Greenwood.

---

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. Complete sets of this work (thirty volumes in all) can now be had, on application to the Publishers, on liberal terms. The number and variety of the topics discussed in this work, and the high reputation it enjoys both in this country and Europe, render it a most valuable addition to the library of literary men. A General Index of the first twentyfive volumes has also been published, in a style to match with the current volumes of the work.

Subscribers and others whose sets may be deficient, can be supplied with the missing numbers. Subscriptions to commence at any period, received at $5 per annum. GRAY & BOWEN.

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1830. NO. XII.

MERCANTILE LAW.

NO. IV.

[Continued.]

Our business then is chiefly with contracts properly so called, that is, mutual agreements founded on a valuable consideration. Now it is frequently said, that a consideration is essential to the validity of a simple contract, but not to that of a specialty; and the position for practical purposes is perhaps sufficiently accurate. But as it involves a seeming contradiction, it may be as well to explain that it is merely a secondary rule—the principle of which is this: that where an engagement is testified by a deliberate formality, such as is the sealing of a written instrument in which the terms of it are embodied, and the delivery of it, so authenticated, to the party for whose benefit it is intended, the law concludes, as common sense requires, that an act so solemn was not done without an adequate inducement, and will not, in general allow that conclusion to be questioned.* In short, as was intimated before, the party making the deed is estopped from denying the consideration. But a third person who has a claim upon the property conveyed by the deed, founded on a valuable consideration, is still at liberty to shew that no consideration passed to the giver, and thereby set up a superior title in himself. And where the transactions is not attested by those legal formalities which are presumed to indicate a deliberateness of purpose, the law will not recognise an engagement as obligatory, unless the consideration shall be made to appear by evidence. An undertaking wanting this is designated, by a term borrowed from the civil law, though applied in a somewhat different sense, as a naked engagement—nudum pactum. In order then to make a verbal promise binding, there must be either some advantage proceeding from the party in whose favor the promise is made, to the person by whom it is made, or to another at his request; or there must be some detriment sustained, at the instance of the party promising, by him to whom the promise is made. These distinctions have been adopted to meet the exigencies of particular cases, but they are all perhaps resolvable into the principle of a supposed mutuality of advantage. A simple instance of each kind will shew this. A. agrees to give B. 50*l.* for his horse, and B. agrees to let A. have the horse for that sum. Here the principle is obvious: the consideration of A.'s promise is the stipulated delivery of the horse, of B.'s the stipulated payment of the price. Again A. requests B. to supply C. with goods, undertaking that he shall be duly paid for them. This undertaking is binding upon A. and with reason: not, however, on account of the benefit to C., but because from the request there may be inferred a benefit to A. The same remark applies to the third case. Thus, a creditor, at my instance, forbears for a time to press his debtor, and this delay on his part is a sufficient consideration for a promise on mine. Here, undoubtedly, is no apparent advantage resulting directly to me; and yet the presumption of some advantage arises necessarily from the request. The transaction is in fact a bargain. Give me this forbearance, and I will give you so much in return.

To enumerate or even to classify the various considerations which will sustain a promise, would be as useless as tedious. It may be sufficient to give one or two examples in the negative. An undertaking to do what is merely a duty, obligatory even without the undertaking,* and a promise to forbear where there is no power to enforce, are considerations evidently nugatory and without value.† It has of late years been laid down that a moral obligation is a sufficient consideration for an express promise.‡ But it is a position which we consider at once dangerous and unnecessary—dangerous, as tending to introduce metaphysical subtleties as to the nature of a moral obligation; and unnecessary, because there is no instance in which the courts have had recourse to it, where the promise might not have been more truly referred to some other consideration, such as the law has always acknowledged to be sufficient. For example: A man who has been made a bankrupt and obtained his certificate, owed before his bankruptcy a sum of money to one who had advanced it to him in his necessities. By the operation of the law he is now discharged from all liability to the lender. But if after this discharge he voluntarily promise anew to pay the money, that promise is binding upon him in law. Now the reason ordinarily assigned is this: that after the legal obligation was removed, there remained an obligation of conscience, the satisfying of which is such a consideration as the law will recognize. But this reasoning not only leads to anomalous results, but is not, as it seems to us, strictly true in fact. Is not the process in the mind of the debtor rather this? 'You lent me so much money, and therefore, although I am not bound by law to do so, yet I will pay you.' The consideration is not so much the moral obligation as the pre-existing debt. And observe, that the law, when it exonerates the debtor by a certificate, does not extinguish the debt; it merely takes away, or rather suspends, the legal consequence, which consequence the debtor revives by a subsequent promise attaching upon the original consideration.

It has been already mentioned incidentally, that under the term parol agreements are included those which are reduced into writing, but not attested by the legal formality of sealing and delivering. The distinction between a simple contract and a specialty evidently had its origin in times when writing was a rare accomplishment. It has, however, been continued, with certain statutory exceptions, down to a period when the reason is no longer applicable. An opinion was indeed once intimated by two distinguished judges, that where the promise was in writing, want of consideration was not a valid objection;* but the doctrine was new to our law, and was not long afterwards solemnly denied.† There is one species of written instruments not under seal, which is somewhat favored in this respect. Bills of exchange and promissory notes, the former by the established usage of trade, which has been adopted into our law under the name of the custom of merchants, the latter partly by the common law, and partly by the operation of a statute,‡ carry with them primâ facie evidence of consideration. But although the holder is not called upon to shew, as a preliminary title to sue, that he has given value for the instrument, still, as between the acceptor and drawer of a bill, the maker and payee of a note, or any two parties, from one of whom the instrument has been transferred immediately to the other, it is a good and available defence that no consideration passed, or in other words, that it was an accommodation transaction. It is true that this will, in general, furnish no answer to the claim of a subsequent indorsee who has received the instrument from another; yet even in this case, if the party sued can shew, as he is at liberty to do, that no value has been given by the holder, his right of action is destroyed. The rule, in short, must not be understood as dispensing with a consideration altogether, but merely as shifting the burden of proof. Instead of requiring the plaintiff as in the ordinary case of a simple contract, to shew that there is a consideration, it calls upon the defendent to prove that there is none.

The effect of unlawfulness or impossibility in the consideration has been already sufficiently discussed. It remains only to point out one distinction. Where the consideration consists of several parts, of which some only or one is impossible, the contract may nevertheless stand good; but illegality in any part of the consideration incurably vitiates the whole transaction.

It seems to follow from the very notion of a contract, that the engagements should be contemporaneous as well as mutual. At first sight, therefore, it looks like a contradiction to read of a consideration as past. But it must be recollected that the term 'consideration' is used relatively to the 'undertaking' of the other party; and it is evident that although the duty and even the legal obligation may attach immediately on the performance of the consideration, the specific undertaking may be long subsequent. There is an inchoate contract subsisting before, which is made complete by the actual promise. In such a case the promise it said to be founded on an executed consideration; so the validity of which it is essential that the act which constitutes it should have been done at the request of the other. It is then a good foundation not only for an express but an implied promise. If the act were the consequence of a previous

* The civil law proceeded exactly on the same principle, though in a different mode. A verbal undertaking might be binding without shewing a consideration: but then it must have been entered into with certain prescribed solemnities. The person to whom the promise was to be made, proposed a question to him from whom it was to proceed, as 'Dare spondes? Facere spondes?' &c. If he answered 'Spondeo,' the obligation was complete. This sort of engagement was called a stipulation.

* Peake's N. P. C. 72. 2 Campb. 317.
† 4 East, 455. 1 B. & C. 373.
‡ See 3 Bos. & Pul. 249. (n.)

* Van Mierop v. Pillans, 3 Burr. 1663.
† 7 T. R. 350 (n.) ‡ 3 & 4 Ann. c. 9.

request, it is clear that a promise would be inferred immediately upon the performance. In such case, however, the consideration and the implied undertaking would be manifestly contemporaneous, and the former could not, therefore, with propriety, be said to be executed with reference to the latter. But it is not always necessary that there should be an express request. A subsequent adoption of the act done is considered by the law as equivalent to, or rather evidence of, a previous request; and here, as the implied promise does not arise until that adoption, it may truly be said to be founded on a past or executed consideration. What amounts to such an adoption may be gathered from the following instances. If a man, without any request from me, or even knowledge on my part pay a sum of money or buy goods for me, I am not in the first instance bound to repay him; but if I afterwards agree to the payment in the one case, or receive the goods in the other, this is equivalent to a previous request on my part, and binds me to repayment. And further, if the act done on my account be such, as there was a legal obligation on me to perform, the law will at once infer a request, and a promise to remunerate.*

A consideration is said to be executory, when although the promise is immediate, the act which is the subject of it is to be performed at a future time, and concurrent when the acts mutually stipulated are to be carried into execution at one and the same time. The ordinary case of a sale in which the purchaser is not entitled to the goods without payment or tender of the price, nor the seller to the price agreed without delivering or offering to deliver the goods, will serve for an example of the latter; and an agreement to pay in a month's time for goods to be delivered immediately is an instance of the former. These distinctions may perhaps seem too minute and trifling; and they are mentioned, not so much for their intrinsic importance, as on account of the frequent allusion which is made to them in practice. Occasionally indeed there arise out of them nice and somewhat difficult questions as to the construction and relation of the several covenants on the one side and the other. For instance, if two concurrent acts are stipulated for, as delivery by the one, and payment by the other, no action can be maintained by either party without shewing a performance, or what is equivalent to a performance, of his part of the agreement. It becomes therefore of importance to ascertain, whether the stipulations are independent as to the time of execution, or whether they are so connected, that the one is a condition necessarily preceding the other. But this would lead us into a wide field of inquiry as to the interpretation of contracts, into which we are at present forbidden to enter.

*1 H. Bl. 90. 2 East, 506. 1 B. & A. 105.

NO. V.

If we were to listen to the invectives which have of late years been so liberally bestowed on the science of law, and upon no part of it so unsparingly as upon legal construction, we might be inclined to think that there existed a conspiracy against truth and justice, hatched by the founders of our system, and propagated through the successive generations of lawyers, from Glanvil even to Lord Tenterden.* According to these railers, the rules of interpretation, instead of being a lanthorn to guide unto truth, are but

> 'An ignis fatuus which bewitches,
> And leads men into pools and ditches.'

They never speak of law without an immediate association of quirks and subleties. 'Let us view the question,' they say, 'not according to the rules of legal nicety, but as men of common sense, and sound practical understanding'—as if law and common sense had solemnly divorced each other, and no man could hope to be a lawyer who had not first taken leave of his reason. The student who has heard these things (and who in our day has been fortunate enough not to hear them?) may not unreasonably, therefore, be startled at approaching so perilous a subject as the legal interpretation of contracts, and may, perhaps, think it necessary to sharpen his wits for an encounter with the powers of darkness and chicane, armed with every kind of sophistry and ingenious device for puzzling. We can assure him, nevertheless, that his apprehensions are groundless, and that he will need only the moderate exercise of his everyday understanding; that, so far from being intricate and perplexing, the rules of construction are remarkable only for their simplicity, and are in fact exactly such as every man of sound, well-cultivated mind, would adopt unconsciously for the attainment of the same object.

Let us consider, for a moment, what that object is. Contracts, we have already said, (and we are not ashamed of repeating a principle) proceed on a supposed reciprocity of advantage. Each party expects to gain something. Whenever, therefore, the interference of law is rendered necessary by a breach of faith in either, the first inquiry naturally is, what was the mutual understanding of the parties as to the terms of the bargain at the time of entering into it. To ascertain the real intention of either, is not, as has been rightly observed by Paley, to the purpose; one may have designedly misled the other; and to give effect to the real intention in such a case, would be to countenance and reward dishonesty. To do justice between the parties, the undertaking of each must be construed in that sense, in which he supposed it to be by the other;* and it will easily, we think, be perceived, that the rules of interpretation have been framed with a steady reference to this principle. We shall, for the sake of simplicity, consider them with reference chiefly to a written contract; because, in general, whatever is applicable as a rule of construction to words spoken, is of course equally so to words written. One important distinction however there is, which it may be as well to notice here; that, whereas an ambiguity in the terms of a merely parol contract may be removed by extrinsic evidence, (as, for example, the previous course of dealing between the parties) an ambiguity apparent on the face of a written instrument admits of no explanation but from the instrument itself; a distinction, the soundness of which we may find occasion to justify hereafter.

Premising then, as a preliminary limitation, that, when the language of the contract is plain and unequivocal, no interpretation is admissible, which is at variance with the obvious meaning of the words;* and secondly, that construction must never be pushed beyond that sense which the words are fairly capable of bearing;† the law sets out with the following concise maxim: verba debent intentioni inservire. We are first to consider what appears upon the whole to have been the general purpose of the parties in the transaction before us; and having ascertained this, we are to understand the terms of the contract in such a sense as is most agreeable to that purpose. 'The law,' says Chief Justice Willes, 'commends the astutia, the cunning of judges in construing words in such a manner as will best answer the intent.'‡ They must be construed, therefore, not according to any arbitrary standard of classic propriety, but with a due allowance for that inaccuracy, with which the generality of men in their ordinary communications express themselves—they must be taken in a free and popular sense—in that sense, in short, which such persons, so dealing, may be reasonably supposed to have attached to them.§ If an expression admit of two meanings, that must be preferred, even though somewhat strained, which seems consistent with the general scope of the agreement;‖ and constant regard must be had to the subject-matter, both for the explaining of what is doubtful, and the qualifying of what is general.¶ Suppose, for instance, a man having a flock of sheep for sale, at a fair, were to bargain with another chapman thus: 'I will sell

*Nay, the censure, to be just, should be carried still higher, and ought to fall on the sages of the Roman law, such as the Appius Claudiuses and Sulpiciuses of old—to say nothing of the comparatively modern names of Ulpian, Papinian, Trebonius, and the like; for as moral truth is the same at all times and in all places, the rules of interpretation will be found almost precisely the same in the civil as in the English, law.

*This has been carried so far as to overcome even the express words of an instrument. Thus a note made by a debtor, and delivered by him to the creditor, expressed to be 'for 20*l.* borrowed and received,' but adding, 'which I promise never to pay,' was held to be properly described as a promissory note, on which the maker was liable. See 2 Atk. 32. And on the same principle a bill of exchange, made payable to a fictitious person, has been treated in law as a bill payable to bearer. 1 H. B. 569.

Quoties in verbis nulla est ambiguitas, ibi nulla expositio contra verba fienda est.* This, of itself, ought to redeem the law from the scandal of departing from common sense.

† Doug. 277. 7 T. R. 214. 2 B. & P. 168.

‡ 3 Atk. 136.

§ 'Where the intention is apparent, too much regard must not be had to the native and proper definition, signification and acceptance of words and sentences.' Shepherd's Touchst. c. 5. p. 87.

It is impossible while on this subject to omit noticing the very apt and pertinent illustration given by Mr Chitty, in his Code of Commercial Law—'The words and language of a deed,' he says, 'must bear the sense which is attempted to be put upon them, and this sense must be understood to mean their plain, ordinary and popular sense, rather than the strict grammatical and etymological one.' And now comes the example: 'AS if a person borrow a horse, he is bound to provide for its keep, unless an agreement be made to the contrary.' The idea of borrowing a horse by deed, indented, of course, and delivered with the proper formalities, is certainly original; and the distinction between the etymological and popular sense of the word 'borrow' is so profound, so philosophical, so satisfactory, that it leaves nothing to be desired in the way of further comment or illustration.

‖ If an absurdity would result from strictly pursuing the expression of the instrument, courts of law will, equally with courts of equity, cast about to discover the mean by which the real intent may receive effect, notwithstanding the untechnical language in which such intent is expressed; 'for though an interpretation or construction ought not to be made against the letter of a deed, yet in some cases a strained and secondary interpretation may be admitted; and if the letter will bear a second and less genuine interpretation, it may be admitted, ne detur absurdum; but where the intention of the parties is not clear and plain, but in equilibrio, in such case a secondary and strained construction shall not be made, but the words shall receive their more natural and proper construction.' Per Bridgman, Ch. J. Carter's Rep. 108, 109. The above is note n of Mr Fonblanque to the Treat. Eq. b. 1. ch. 6. s. 18.

¶ Verba generalia restringuntur ad habilitatem rei vel personæ. Bac. Max. 'The matter which he is about is always supposed to be in the mind of the speaker.' Treat. Eq. b. 1. ch. 6. s. 16. See 4 Rep. 48.

you all the sheep I have for 50*l*.' Would it not be manifestly absurd as well as unjust, to consider these words as comprehending his whole stock of sheep, not only in the market but elsewhere? And yet in themselves they imply so much. We are almost ashamed to dwell on what is so plain and obvious, and we will confine ourselves therefore to one real example by way of illustration. A person warranted upon a life insurance to be in good health, was in fact, at that time subject to the gout. It was contended that this was a wilful misrepresentation, and the policy therefore void. Now the question was plainly this: what was mutually understood by the term 'in good health?' and the following is the judgment of Lord Mansfield—whether right or wrong is immaterial to our purpose. 'The imperfection of language,' he said, 'is such that we have not words for every different idea, and the real intention of the parties must be found out by the subject-matter. Such a warranty can never mean that a man hath not the seeds of disorder. We are all born with the seeds of mortality in us.' And he concludes thus: 'A man subject to the gout is a life capable of being insured, if he has no sickness to make it an unequal contract.*

* Park. Ins. 439. See also on this subject, 1 Powell, 403. and for instance 1 T. R. 701. 2 T. R. 436. 3 T. R. 525. 2 M. & S. 363. 5 B. & A. 416. 8 B. & C. 575.

MR JEFFREY.

Concluded from page 82.

After all I have said, I fear it will be thought a hazardous experiment, if I presume to present the reader with the substance of one or two loose notes which I took of many happy sallies of Mr Jeffrey. Those who heard him well know the difficulty of the task. A further proof of Mr Cooper's insanity, was that during his residence at Pembroke College, Cambridge, he groundlessly fancied himself the aversion of the whole University—shunned by the students and hated by the tutors—and, in consequence, abruptly took his departure.

'And now gentlemen of the Jury,' continued Mr Jeffrey, folding his arms on his breast, and standing in an easy and negligent attitude, 'we come to another of the card-built castles of our opponents. Mr Cooper, conceiving himself an object of ridicule to both students and tutors, abruptly leaves Cambridge; and is, therefore, forsooth, if we were to admit the clever casuistry of my learned friend, (Mr Robertson,) insane. Why gentlemen, every man who does a very absurd and unaccountable action, with his eyes open, may be called, to a certain extent, insane: that is, not of a sound, well-ordered mind. But with regard to this Mr Cooper, I am apt to think his conclusions were not quite so chimerical and groundless, as to his being an object of curious speculation and droll remark to those around him. I will go so far as to say, that if I or Mr Robertson were at Cambridge, and received similar treatment to that which Mr Cooper received, we should be apt, at least I know I should, to decamp without much ceremony. It is, I say, very possible that Mr C. might be shunned at Cambridge, and therefore feel inclined to run back to dear Scotland, and her consolations. This, I am apt to imagine, shows rather sagacity and spirit, than madness. Let it be remembered that Mr Cooper went to Cambridge at a comparatively late period of life, when he would be no meet companion for his light-hearted juniors. And in what character did he mingle with the gay, spirited, and high-bred crowd, at an English University—with the bright tribes of Eton, Harrow, and Westminster? What did he appear to them, other than a great, gloomy, hulking Scotch Dominie, wandering about like a 'statue stepped from its pedestal to take the air,' having nothing in common with the vivacious youngsters around him, but his cap and gown? And then again, when the fastidious ears of the Etonians would be shocked by hearing the strains of Virgil or Horace shouted in the rich Northern brogue, and ghastly guttural intonations of Mr Cooper, not unaccompanied, perchance, with a false quantity to add to its attractions; is there, I ask, anything extraordinary in supposing them to be amused with these and similar gaucheries of the raw Caledonian? Nothing more natural, I am sure, gentlemen:—the simple fact of the case is this; Mr Cooper was very eccentric—a Scotchman—an elderly eccentric Scotchman, and his companions were very free and quizzical; the consequence was unavoidable. He was fair game for them; and not being able to stand the chase, he took to Scotland again for shelter.—Now was not this the very best thing he could do?—I think it would have been a much more unequivocal symptom of insanity, had he remained at Cambridge. I cannot, therefore, but admire the ingenuity and hardihood of my learned friend, in grounding on this part of Mr Cooper's conduct, a plea of insanity. Had I, in short, as I said before, been in Mr Cooper's circumstances, I am sure I should have taken a similar step; but to be brought in mad for it, oh, it is preposterous!'

I am conscious that this is but an imperfect attempt to embody in words the subtle, ethereal, and evanescent spirit of Mr Jeffrey's wit and sarcasm. Had my reader been present at the delivery of the above passage, and witnessed the ease, readiness and spirit with which it was uttered, he would have been charmed indeed. After having been speaking for rather more than three hours and a half, Mr Jeffrey sat down, apparently no more hurried, heated, or exhausted, than if he had been merely whispering a word or two across the table; sipped the remainder of his cup of coffee, drew on his spectacles, and recommenced writing as before. Most of the auditors left the Court; and after a sitting of six or seven hours more, the Jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. Though the Court did not break up till midnight, Mr Jeffrey was at his place the next morning to conduct another equally arduous and much more complicated case.

In Court Mr Jeffrey is not chatty or communicative with his legal brethren; but, on the contrary, is silent and reserved. I do not recollect seeing his anxious and restless countenance once relax into a smile. He has his full share of lively sensibility, nay rather irritability, which is so frequently allied to great powers. I never saw a man more apparently free from vanity or conceit. His chief failing is an impatience in minor matters. The few opportunities I have had of observing Mr Jeffrey more closely, convinced me of the truth of a remark made by one of his warmest admirers; that a 'too restless display of talent, a too undisguised statement of all that can be said for and against a question, is, perhaps, the greatest fault that can be attributed to him.' This remark applies equally to his writings and to his pleadings in Court. He appears too apt at times to sink the counsel in the reviewer; but, at the same time, he contrives to effect a corresponding change in his hearers. Whether, however, in his character of writer or speaker, it is delightful to follow his rapid and graceful movements from one sparkling sentence to another, and from one harmonious cadence to another; always lively, always ingenious, always piquant. As a lawyer, Mr Jeffrey appears rather familiar with principles than practice; but paramount as he is in so many other characters, it is surely no heavy hardship for him to yield the palm of legal tact to others.

In company Mr Jeffrey is, as a friend styled him, 'a glorious creature.' His buoyant spirits never flag, his intellectual energies never droop. He is acute, eloquent, and communicative to the last. Without being that odious thing, a professed talker, he is the life of the select circle in which he moves, the centre of attraction, the mirror of courtesy. You cannot advance anything differing in any respect from his opinions, without being sure of a brilliant and often unanswerable reply. It is worth committing the fault, for the sake of the punishment. I cannot canceive a higher treat than to see Mr Jeffrey and Mr Coleridge brought together, and engaged in a metaphysical struggle.

'When Greek meets Greek, then comes the tug of war.'

No man can be long in Mr Jeffrey's company without a consciousness of being in communion with the concentrated spirit of the age. It is a man's own fault if he part from him without instruction;—without amusement, he cannot. I have little more to add. In the above sketch I have endeavored to describe Mr Jeffrey as he has not been described before; studiously avoiding the sickening tedium of repeating what everybody knows, namely, that Mr Jeffrey is a writer and a politician. I am not aware of the existence of any description similar to the one I have here attempted, of Mr Jeffrey as an advocate: and if I have been in some places too minute in my sketching, my only apology is anxiety to do justice to the character of one of the most distinguished individuals whom Great Britian can enrol among her many highly gifted sons.

ENGLISH CASES.

COURT OF CHANCERY.—FEBRUARY.

Rawsthorne vs. Parr.

The arguments of counsel were heard to an end in this case. The question was as to the effect of a promissory note. Messrs Ewing not being able to meet certain demands against them, applied to their creditors for time, which was granted, on condition that they would procure some person to guarantee the future payment. They then applied to Mr Parr, who consented to become their surety, and a promissory note, the subject of the present suit, was drawn and signed by Messrs Ewing in favor of the person to whom the debt was due, and Mr Parr signed his name under theirs, adding the word 'surety' to his signature. Messrs Ewing afterwards became insolvent, and Mr Parr died. The creditors filed a bill against his representatives, alleging that the note was a joint and several note, and that therefore his estate was liable, and praying for an account, &c. The Vice-Chancellor, on the cause coming before him, decided that the note was joint and several, and made an order for a reference to the Master accordingly. Against that order the present appeal was brought.

The Lord Chancellor, having heard counsel, said, he could not help coming to a different conclusion from that which was appealed against. It had been alleged that it was the intention of the parties that Mr Parr should become liable as a joint and several drawer of the promissory note in question, and that it was by a mere mistake that he had signed it as a surety only. It was impossible for the Court to say whether any such mistake had been committed; and he did not see how, if it had been made, the construction so contended for would rectify that mistake. It certainly did not appear upon the face of the note that it was intended to be joint and several, for Mr Parr had expressly signed it as surety only. In that case he could only be liable in the default of the principal: but if it had been a joint and several note, he might have been sued, in the first instance, jointly with the Messrs Ewing. His Lordship could not alter the effect of the note, nor would the construction now sought to be established carry the alleged intention of the parties into effect. The decision of the Vice-Chancellor was therefore overruled, and the deposit ordered to be returned to the appellant.

---

COURT OF KINGS BENCH—FEBRUARY.

Burrough vs. Moss.

Mr Justice Bayley stated, that this case had been argued in the Bail Court before the three Judges sitting in banco. It was an action on a promissory note, given by the defendant, to a person of the name of Fearne and his wife, in respect of a debt due to the wife before her marriage. The note had been indorsed to the plaintiff after it became due. The defendant claimed a sum of 28*l*., as a debt due from the wife of Fearne, before her marriage; and insisted that he had a right to set off that debt against the note in question in the hands of the plaintiff. The learned Judge said, that at the time the case was argued, the impression on his mind was, that the defendant had a right to deduct the 28*l*., but the opinion of the rest of the Court seemed to be that an indorsee, although he took the instrument after it became due, was liable only to those equities which appeared on the face of it, and not to any collateral equities to which the endorser might be liable. The verdict must therefore stand for the amount of the note.

---

ARCHES COURT—JUNE.

Rogers vs. Rogers.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Consistory Court, as to the inadmissibility of the allegation of the wife, charging connivance against her husband, in order to bar his right to a divorce which he sought against her, on the ground of adultery.

Sir John Nicholl now gave judgment. The principle, he said, of volenti non fit injuria had long been recognised in these Courts, and was a good bar to the right of a husband claiming a divorce on the ground of adultery; and though passive acquiescence might constitute connivance, still that passive acquiescence must be more than mere negligence or extraordinary confidence; it must be more than over dulness of apprehension; it must, in fact, amount to an intentional concurrence. The question for the Court to decide was, whether, in the present case, the allegations, if proved, would be sufficient to establish an intentional concurrence, on the part of the husband, in the criminality of his wife. It was alleged that the husband, in the present case, was cruel, morose, and penurious, and that he allowed his wife no society suited to her station in life, although she had brought him a fortune of 30,000*l*. It then went on to say that he accompanied her to Scarborough, with her sister; after which he returned to his own residence, near Retford; and, during several months that she remained there, he never visited her but once, and then stopped for two days only. This only showed that he had no want of confidence in his wife; and as it was at Scarborough that she became acquainted with Mr Whitaker, he was in no way accessory to the formation of the intimacy between them. Besides, there was at this period, no ground for supposing that there was any evil intention on the part of Mr Whitaker and Mrs Rogers; and still less could there be any such on the part of Mr Rogers. With respect to that part of the allegation which set forth that Mr Whitaker had, on one occasion, kissed her in the presence of her husband, even if proved, it might admit of explanation to show that it was innocent and harmless; and then it appeared that the husband was displeased; and, though quickly pacified, yet he showed a sufficient feeling on the occasion to prevent any renewal of such freedoms, for no kiss or indecent familiarity was alleged from that time, which was in 1820, up to the period of elopement in 1829. From all the facts of the case he could not fix the intention that these parties should commit adultery upon the husband, so as to bar him of his right to relief. In the case of Morsam v. Morsam, it was proved, that the seducer was in the habit of sitting with his arm round Mrs Morsam's waist in the presence of her husband; and though he dealt with the husband for timber, yet he came to the house in such a way, and at such hours, that the husband must have known that business was not his object. He was remonstrated with by Mrs Morsam's mother, who represented to him that her daughter's reputation must suffer from the visits of the gentleman; to which Mr Morsam replied, that he must not affront his best customer. In that case the Judge held, that negligence, even though it was so great as to make the husband an accessory to his wife's criminality, was not sufficient; and though it appeared evident that he was willing to keep his trade at the risk of his wife, still, as there was no proof of criminal intention on the part of the husband, that the wife should commit adultery, the Court felt bound to pronounce for the separation. The case of Crewe v. Crewe was also much stronger than the present; for in that case Sir Harry Eagleton visited Mrs Crewe at very late hours, and when the husband came home, instead of going to the drawing-room where they were, he went to the kitchen, where he remained until Sir Harry was gone; and so little care was there lest it should come to his knowledge, that when Sir Harry was let out, the slamming of the street-door might be heard all over the house. There was, in fact, no circumspection used to prevent its getting to his knowledge; and yet, in that case also the Court on the same principle, felt itself bound to pronounce for the separation. The case of Hodges v. Hodges, however, was the strongest of any; it was, in fact, a case of notorious connivance; for the wife had been guilty of great freedoms in the presence of her husband. The Judge, in that case, however (Sir Wm. Wynn), held that, if a husband connive at his wife's adultery with two or three persons, and that they subsequently live together and have issue, and if she afterwards commit adultery with another, the husband was not barred of his right, but was entitled to relief. The question whether he would have been barred of his right had the wife committed adultery subsequently with the party or parties, at whose intercourse with her he had formerly connived, did not arise in that case. In the present case, however, even if all the facts alleged were proved, they would not fix connivance on the husband. He might have been severe, inattentive, and negligent—and these facts would be important in any application to the Legislature; but such an application would rest on very different grounds from the present, which was only for divorce a mensa et thoro. Under these considerations, the Court felt bound to confirm the decision of the Chancellor of London, that the allegation was inadmissible—to reject the appeal, and refer the cause back again to the Court below.

---

HOUSE OF LORDS—JUNE.

The Amicable Society of Insurance vs. Bolland and another.—The late Mr Fauntleroy.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, under the following circumstances:—The late Henry Fauntleroy effected an insurance on his life in the Amicable Insurance office, in the year 1815, 6000*l*. In 1824 Mr Fauntleroy became bankrupt, whereby all his property, including this policy of insurance, became vested in the respondents, who are the assignees under the commission. Mr Fauntleroy was executed in November, 1824, and, in the month of January following, the respondents filed a bill in Chancery, praying that they might be declared to be entitled to the said policy of insurance, and the money payable thereon. In May, 1827, the cause came on, for hearing before his Honor the Master of the Rolls, who, after hearing Counsel on both sides, decreed that the appellants, as Directors of the Amicable Insurance Society, should pay to the respondents the sum of 6,084*l*. 7*s*. 6*d*. the sum acknowledged to be then due. From this decree an appeal was brought to the House of Lords, where it was argued by Sir C. Wetherell and Mr Rose, on behalf of the appellants, who contended that it was against the general policy of the law and established principles that the insured, or those claiming under him, should recover for a loss caused solely by the criminal act of the insured himself; that if there was an express contract between the Society and the insured, that the amount insured should be paid even if the person insured had committed a felo de se, or had suffered by the law of the land; the law would not enforce that contract, as being contrary to public policy, a fortiori should the Courts of Law discountenance an implied contract to that effect. This case was analogous to a marine insurance, where an underwriter insures a vessel against the detention of Princes. If the owner of the vessel entered a port that was in a state of blockade, and the vessel in consequence was seized and sold by the Prince, the underwriter would not be liable to pay the amount of the insurance, because the loss was caused by the illegal act of the owner in entering a blockaded port. The law did not permit a wager to be made respecting peace or war, or contra bonos mores, and e multo fortiori, should it enforce the recovery of sum insured, where the life had been forfeited for a felony?

The Solicitor-General, with whom was Mr Koe, on behalf of the respondents, maintained that, by the terms of the policy of insurance, it was valid at the death of Mr Fauntleroy. That the fact of the appellants having introduced new terms into their policies since that period, implied that in their former policies they had not provided against death by the sentence of the law.

The Lord Chancellor—Suppose there had been an express contract that the insurance should have been paid in case of death by the sentence of the law, it is evident that such a contract would be void as contrary to public policy; why then should the House imply a right which, if expressed, would be illegal.

Mr Koe—Such a contract would be undoubtedly illegal if expressed, because it might hold out an encouragement to commit a felony.

The Lord Chancellor—Will it not equally operate as an encouragement of crime if the House of Lords put that construction on the contract?

Mr Koe—The Court should be guided by the original intention of the parties. If the contract were expressed in such terms it would induce a presumption of an intention to commit a felony.

The Lord Chancellor—In this case the death was produced in consequence of the criminal and felonious act of the party himself, and if that party could not recover the sum insured, it was evident that those who claimed on his right could not recover it.

Mr Koe admitted that, if the intention of Mr Fauntleroy, in committing the forgeries, was to destroy his life, the respondents would not be entitled to recover; but as the forgery had only a tendency to cause his death, it did not amount to a forfeiture of the assurance money. The arguments on the other side went to say that the very fact of the commission of a felony operated as a forfeiture: if so, the same objection would apply if Mr Fauntleroy had died a natural death after he had committed the forgery. If Mr Fauntleroy had derived benefit from his own criminal act, by having his money left to his friends, it was not the necessary, but the accidental, consequence of that act.

Sir C. Wetherell having replied,

The Lord Chancellor felt that the question was attended with some difficulty. He doubted much whether the respondents were entitled to recover; but as it was a subject of general importance, he should take time to consider what took place in the Court below respecting it.

---

COURT OF KINGS BENCH—JUNE.

Sittings in Banco.

Beauchamp vs. Perry.

This was an action tried some time since, and was brought by the plaintiff to recover the amount of a promissory note for 65*l.*, which had been indorsed by the defendant. It appeared on the trial that the note in question had been given by a person named Wade, in lieu of two others which were for the same amount, but had not been paid when they became due. The note was discounted by the plaintiff, who is a pawnbroker at Holborn-bars, and not being paid when it became due, the present action was brought. The defence to the action was, that the notes had been given in consequence of a gambling transaction, and therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the amount. It was proved that Wade had declared he had given the notes for the amount of a bet which had been made between him and Perry on the Derby races at Epsom. On this being proved the plaintiff was nonsuited. Mr John Williams had obtained a rule to show cause why the nonsuit should not be set aside, and a new trial had, on the ground that the objection to the plaintiff's claim to recover the amount of the note was not valid. He contended that the evidence which had been produced by the defendant had nothing to do with the plaintiff. He had not known that the notes had been given illegally, and it was not to be supposed that he was to be the innocent sufferer.

Lord Tenderden today read the notes of the trial, and

Mr Campbell (with Mr Hutchinson) showed cause against the rule. He cited one or two cases, and submitted that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the amount of the note, as it had been given on an illegal consideration.

Mr Williams having replied shortly,

Lord Tenderden said he was of opinion that the plaintiff had not known for what the note had been given, and, as he was unconscious of that when he discounted it, he thought that he could maintain the action for the recovery of the amount.

The other Judges concurring in this view of the case, the rule for a new trial was made absolute.

---

ROLLS COURT.—JUNE.

Vaughan vs. Millingham.

This bill was filed to obtain the opinion of the Court on a will, and was occasioned by an amusing mistake. The testator made his will upon six half-sheets of paper, each of which was regularly signed andat tested. He bequeathed to his wife and her heirs for ever all his estates real and personal, &c, and he recommended that certain of the lands should be sold by her. The wife, having been privy to the contents of this will before the testator's death, communicated it to a female friend, a Miss Rawlinson, when the latter suggested a difficulty which sorely puzzled both herself and her friend—viz. that the estates being settled on the latter and her heirs for ever, this alarming transmission of interest to generations unborn must deprive her of all that power of sale which the testator wished her to exercise. Full of this fancied error, Mrs Millingham communicated her feelings to the testator (her husband,) who, in order to rectify the mistake, on the very day of his death tore off the offensive first half-sheet of the will, and wrote out its contents again, with some variation, omitting the heirs for ever. The new half-sheet was signed by him, and stuck to the will, and the old one consigned to the fire. Unfortunately, the new signature was not attested, and, as the conveyance of real property was involved, a doubt was thrown over the validity of the entire will. This bill was filed to obtain the opinion of his Honor on the subject. From the situation of the testator's family, no substantial differance could be occasioned to the parties beneficially interested in the will from its affirmation or negation, except that it rendered the sale of the property in question difficult, from ambiguity of title. It is unnecessary to add that the obnoxious expression in the original will had an import directly contrary to what occurred to the imaginations of its ingenious interpreters.

His Honor, being of opinion that a question of considerable nicety, in respect to the validity of the entire will, was involved in this substitution of the unattested first sheet, directed, in conformity with the wishes of the parties concerned, an issue of devisavit vel non, to be tried at the Carnarvon Sessions.

---

COURT OF EXCHEQUER—MAY.

Griffiths vs. Williams.

The defendant in this case is a Minister of the Presbyterian denomination, and the action was brought to recover compensation in damages for a breach of promise of marriage. It was tried at the last Assizes for the county of Pembroke, and a verdict returned for the plaintiff, with 200*l.* damages. A rule had been obtained on a former day to show cause why there should not be a new trial, on the ground that that verdict was contrary to the evidence, Counsel on both sides were then heard at great length, and the Court this morning pronounced judgment.

Mr Baron Garrow, at great length, recapitulated the facts of the case. The Court, observed the Learned Judge, was not in the habit of giving way to feelings of indignation, such as was generally understood from that word; yet this was one of those cases which justified him in saying that his feelings of indignation, using the word in a qualified sense, or, perhaps, more properly speaking his feelings of the strongest disapprobation, were excited. The plaintiff's mother was a milliner, and a most respectable woman belonging to the Presbyterian congregation at Pembroke. At her house all the Ministers of the Presbyterian persuasion who visited the town were in the habit of taking their family dinners; and the defendant in this case was one of her visiters, and formed an intimate acquaintance with her family. The plaintiff first attended the chapel where the defendant used to preach in the year 1825, and continued regularly to attend his ministry until the year 1829, in which year she gave birth to a child. On the trial two questions were raised: the first whether the defendant was the father of the child, and the second, whether a letter, written to the plaintiff in a disguised hand, was the hand-writing of the defendant. The Jury found that he was both. In the commencement of the correspondence the defendant, as if fearful of alarming her, commenced his letter with 'My dear young lady;' he soon, however, waxed warm, and began to talk of the impression her angel image had upon his heart, and of her warm embraces, which appeared to be coming to closer quarters than the commencement of the letter warranted. In his subsequent letters, he begins with 'My dear Ann,' 'my dear, dear Ann,' 'My dearest Ann,' 'My ever-dearest Ann,' 'My dear wife.' And he concludes these letters by subscribing himself her affectionate husband. Now it really appeared that the defendant was not able to look the words husband and wife in the face, for he spelt them only with the consonants, leaving out the vowels. This showed a degree of art and cunning which weighed with the Court in considering whether he was or not the author of the anonymous letter. The Court were of opinion that he was the author of the letter and the father of the child. The defence set up was that she was the mother of a bastard child. If he was not the father of that child, it might have been a good defence for not fulfilling his promise. The letters of the plaintiff, written in April and May, would have been a perfect release to the defendant, if it had not been for this anonymous letter, which threw such light on the subject, that it was impossible for any man to wink hard enough to believe that the letters were not the result of fraud and imposture on his part. Instead of writing this anonymous letter, what ought to have been his conduct towards a young lady, over whose religious conduct he had been four years watching? Such a circumstance as this came like a thunderbolt upon him. He would have written in his own name and character; he would have stated his regret that some vile and abominable man had taken advantage of some unguarded moment, and seduced her from the paths of virtue. He (Mr Baron Garrow), under such circumstances, would not say in what manner he ought to have addressed her, for it appeared that the Rev. Defendant was an eloquent man, for in one of his letters he expressed his sorrow that the plaintiff was not present on the previous Sunday evening, when he had been most happy in delivering a sermon, which was received with the unanimous approbation of a crowded congregation, and which he thought could only be the result of a visit to his 'dear wife' on the evening previous. After all this, he had now married another woman, since which period the plaintiff has died. Under such circumstances he was clearly of opinion the rule for a new trial ought to be discharged.

Mr Baron Vaughan said he never found greater difficulty in coming to a decision in any case than in the present. Putting out of view the last letter, it was clear the defendant must have obtained a verdict. The letters of April and May furnished him with a good and sufficient excuse for not performing his promise, and he thought there was a great deal of difficulty about the anonymous letter. That, however, was for the decision of the Jury; and, though he was not prepared to say that they came to a wrong decision, yet he must say, had he tried the cause, it were possible he might have found a contrary opinion: that, however, was no ground for setting aside the verdict, more particularly as the plaintiff was dead, and the cause, in consequence, could never be fairly tried again.

Mr Baron Bolland said he felt no difficulty about the anonymous letter; by comparing the orthography of that letter with those admitted to be written by the defendant, it clearly proved that he was the author. He fully concurred in the opinion of his Learned Brothers, that the rule ought to be discharged.

The Chief Baron gave no opinion.

Rule discharged.

RECENT AMERICAN DECISIONS.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

At the last term of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of M'Cluny v. Silliman (3 Peters' Rep. 278,) Mr Justice M'Lean, who delivered the opinion of the Court observed: 'Of late years the courts in England, and in this country, have considered statutes of limitations more favorably than formerly. They rest upon sound policy, and tend to the peace and welfare of society. The courts do not now, unless compelled by the force of former decisions, give a strained construction, to evade the effect of those statutes. By requiring those who complain of injuries to seek redress, by action at law, within a reasonable time, a salutary vigilance is imposed, and an end put to litigation.

As still further evidence of the favor with which statutes of limitations are now regarded by the courts of the United States, we shall cite from the opinion of Marcy, J., in the very late case of Purdy v. Austin, in the Supreme Court of the state of New York. In this case, the judge observed: 'The statute has been looked upon in times past with disfavor by the courts of England, and their example has been too generally followed in this country. Construction formerly went far towards depriving defendants of all the benefits designed for them by it. A different and better view of this salutary statute has been since taken, and more correct and liberal construction is now given to it. Defences under it are not now regarded, as they once were, discreditable, or at least are not so viewed to the same extent as formerly. It is assuming, as it was intended it should always have had, the character of a statute of repose. If the more recent decisions in relation to the effect of acknowledgments are to be sustained, defendants may speak of dormant claims preferred against them without necessarily losing the benefits of this law. As courts have been latterly receding from the positions taken by them in the construction of this act, and as we regard this movement as correct, it will be unnecessary to look at any but the latest decisions for authorities in the present case.' (3 Wendell's Rep. 189.)

---

An account that is closed, is not therefore necessarily a settled account. Bass vs. Bass. Pick. 8 v. 187.

An account 'concerning the trade of merchandise, between merchant and merchant,' is not barred by the statute of limitations, although none of the items are within six years before the action was brought. Ibid.

The death of one of the parties to such an account, does not operate as a settlement or statement of the account, so as to bar it by the lapse of six years from the time of his death. Ibid.

Whether accounts concern 'the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant,' is a question of fact to be decided by the jury. Ibid.

Such accounts are not merely accounts for merchandise bought and sold between the parties, but also include demands for money growing out of the trade of merchandise. Ibid.

The lapse of twenty years from the time of a debt's becoming due, does not operate as an absolute bar to its recovery, but affords a presumption of payment; which presumption may be rebutted by evidence, tending to show that payment has in fact been made. Ibid.

The defendant in an action upon a promissory note said 'he supposed that the note was paid by the land mortgaged as collateral, that he was willing to do what was right, that he should be willing to make some small additional payment, for the purpose of settling the business, but if the plaintiff thought proper to sue, without taking the land, he should resist the suit.' Held, that this did not take the demand out of the statute of limitations, although it was proved, that the value of the land was much less than the amount due on the note. Gardner vs. Tudor. 206.

A person, who sees the promiser of a note sign it, has no right, at another time, to subscribe his name as a witness to the note, without the consent or knowledge of the promiser; and therefore his thus subsequently putting his name as a witness, will not bring the note within the exception in the statute of limitations in regard to witnessed notes. Smith vs. Dunham. 246.

A note was signed by the maker in the presence of the attorney of the payee, the attorney having previously written upon it the word 'Witness' in the usual place, and intending to subscribe it himself as a witness. But he did not inform the maker of his intention of witnessing the note, and accidently neglected to put his name to it as a witness while the maker of it was present. Two or three hours afterward the attorney subscribed his name as a witness, the maker not being present and not knowing or consenting to his so subscribing, and then delivered the note to the payee. Held, that the note was not so witnessed as to avoid the statute of limitations. Ibid.

But it seems, that the attorney having acted bonâ fide, his thus signing as a witness was not such an alteration as would render the note void. Ibid.

---

The statute of 1791, c. 28, limiting suits against executors and administrators to four years, may be pleaded in bar to a suit at law. Burditt vs. Grew. 108.

In pleading the statute of limitations respecting suits against executors and administrators, it is sufficient for the defendant to allege that he posted up notifications of his appointment 'in public places in the city of B,' without specifying the places. Ibid.

It is not necessary to set forth in such a plea to a bill in equity, that such city was the place of the testator's residence at the time of his death, where that fact appears in the bill itself. Ibid.

It is sufficient in such a plea to aver, that the executors gave 'bonds according to law,' without saying that they were given to the judge of probate. Ibid.

An administrator's first account of his administration may be allowed by the Court of Probate, although not rendered until after the expiration of four years from the time of giving notice of his appointment. Dickinson vs. Arms. 394.

The same person being administrator on the several estates of A and D, and the estate of D, which was solvent, being indebted to the estate of A upon a promissory note, the administrator, in his administration account of the estate of D. charged the amount of the note as paid by himself at a date more than four years after he had given notice of his appointment as administrator on that estate, with interest to that date. Held, that the date was not conclusive against him as to the time of payment, but that the law would presume he paid the note as soon as he had sufficient funds in his hands. Ibid.

GUARANTEE.

The act incorporating an insurance company required all policies to be signed by the president. A policy of insurance, which provided that a loss should be payable to the assured or his assigns, was assigned, and the company's assent to the assignment signed by the secretary only, and the assignee guarantied the premium note, the company having refused to assent to the assignment without this guarantee. In an action against the guarantee of the note, held, 1. That the assent of the office to the assignment was a sufficient consideration for the guarantee, as without it, an assignee, in case of loss, could sue only in the name of the assignor: 2. That the act of incorporation did not require the assent to the assignment to be signed by the president: 3. That the secretary's signature primâ facie bound the company, and that having accepted the guarantee, it had adopted the act of the secretary. New England Mar. Ins. Co. vs. De Wolf. 56

Where upon the back of a promissory note made by S and A to the plaintiffs, were written the words, 'I guaranty the payment of the within note,' which were signed by the defendant, it was held, that he was a guarantee and not a surety. Oxford Bank vs. Haynes. 423

The guarantee of a promissory note will be discharged by a neglect of the holder to demand payment of the maker and to give the guarantee notice of non-payment, provided the maker was solvent when the note fell due but has since become insolvent. Ibid.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1830.

THOMAS ON UNIVERSAL JURISPRUDENCE.

We cannot better introduce the above named work to the attention of our readers than by offering them the following notice of it from the Law Magazine. If they are not sufficiently satisfied with their brief acquaintance with the Author and his Book from reading the Review, they may be further gratified by reading the work for themselves and judging of this 'entirely novel attempt to condense the whole science of law into a small Volume and in a popular form.'

'We take shame to ourselves for not noticing long ago a work possessing such high claim to attention as Mr Thomas'; a work which has been honored with the approbation of one noble judge and several eminent judges, and warmly patronised by our most gracious sovereign and his most christian majesty of France.

'I look back,' says Mr T. in his dedication to George the Fourth, 'with unmixed joy to lucubrations which are recompensed by the exalted honor of your majesty's approval: and in the advertisement to the second edition, 'he takes the opportunity of acknowledging the condescending patronage of His Most Christian Majesty the King of France, with which he has been honored since the publication of the former edition.'

Most assuredly we ought to have seen and called attention to the work on the appearance of that former edition; but, odd as the apology may seem, we were really prevented from doing so by 'the condescending patronage' alluded to above. Not more eagerly was gold bought up in the most depreciated state of our currency, than this sterling work was singled out by foreigners from the flimsy productions of the day. We can confidently state that very few copies of the first edition were ever seen in this country, and are credibly informed that the greater part of the impression was almost instantly purchased, by the advice of the jesuits, for the King of France. We have experienced no difficulty, however, in procuring a copy of the second edition, and shall now endeavor to atone for the delay by a hasty sketch of Mr T.'s plan and a few specimens of his style.

Mr Thomas, it seems, having in the early part of his professional career felt the want of some clear and simple guide to instruct him in the rudiments of the science of law, determined, 'after surmounting the difficulties attending a general survey of political institutions,' to endeavor to remedy the evil. This, accordingly, 'is an entirely novel attempt to condense the whole science of law into a small volume and in a popular form.' The attempt, he admits to be one of great boldness. 'It seemed calculated to excite many prejudices, and to rouse much opposition;' but he confidently expects the gratitude of his country, as he has spared neither pains nor expense to deserve it, and has not failed to direct his mind 'to the pursuit of every science which appeared to have any analogy with the theme;' while 'the eternal dictates of truth, justice, and benevolence, have been the constant objects of his humble yet zealous solicitude.'

Now this is just as it should be: there cannot be a more gratifying spectacle than such a man so devoting himself; and we have great pleasure in assuring him that he has excited no prejudices, roused no opposition: that, so far as we have been able to learn, all his readers are in the best possible humor with him, and have derived amusement as well as instruction from his work.

The judgment shown in the execution is universally admitted to be on a par with the soundness of the plan. The author, in short, is not one of those ambitious, flashy writers who think original views or striking modes of expression essential merits in a work. On the contrary, he seems to have pursued with care the most celebrated of his predecessors for the purpose of picking out the most generally admitted truths, which he gives in plain, common, intelligible language, neither obscured by terseness, perverted by antithesis, nor unduly lowered by idiomatic familiarity. He has proved unanswerably that everything of real worth in jurisprudence and morals was long ago found out; and, had the treatise no other merit, we could conscientiously recommend it as an excellent illustration of the best saying of Solomon, 'There is nothing new beneath the sun.' When, too, he is compelled to touch upon a disputed point, he never tries to solve the difficulty, as a writer of less tact would do. Instead of playing the advocate and so exposing himself to the suspicion of an undue bias in favor of a particular side, he states both sides of a discussion and adopts neither; and we will venture to assert (which is no slight praise) that, from his remarks on legal reform (which, comprised as they are in three octavo pages, must be allowed to be an unparalelled instance of felicitous compression,) no man would discover whether he was for it or against it—nay, even that he had ever heard of the agitation of the question in this country.

Thus he tells us that 'the age of prophecy has ceased, and if the laws made today infallibly suit the purposes of the time, it does not follow that they will be expedient a century hence:' that 'Plato has probably expressed himself too positively upon the alteration of public laws:' that 'malum notum et cui jam assueris tolerabile, is an argument not well applied by Louis le Roy in his edition of Aristotle's Politics;' that it should afford no surprise that no laws were made in Locris for 200 years, since, 'as Demosthenes informs us in his oration against Timocrates,' the Locrians were in the habit of hanging the proposer whenever a motion was negatived: that 'systems of national jurisprudence are generally found to be complicated in proportion to the antiquity, opulence, and civilization of the people.' And having thus supplied both principle and authority, he leaves the reader to draw conclusions for himself.

We shall now proceed to support our opinion of the work by a few brief quotations; simply begging the reader to beware of what appear to us the only faults in the work. In the first place, whatever it contains is either set down on respectable authority or is obvious to the common sense of mankind; but the propositions are now and then so placed and applied as to lead a student to consider rules of municipal as rules of natural law, et vice versa. A very young student, therefore, had better read the book with a tutor; but the propositions may be safely studied by any man who knows beforehand the mode of applying them and the limitations and exceptions to which they are subject. Thus, in ch. 4. sect. 22. Of Arbitrations (all the law of which is comprised in half a page,) he remarks, 'The written decisions of arbitrators, who have been authorised in writing, are entitled to judicial respect;' meaning, we presume, that parol awards authorised by parol are not so entitled. But is this natural justice or universal law? If so, the law of this country should be modified, for it certainly recognises what Mr T. impliedly condemns. As another instance of this sort of inaccuracy, we may mention sect. 5. ch. 8. On Promises. 'A promise, being a mere personal obligation, does not bind a man's heirs or next of kin.' 'Promissory notes are, as positive evidences of debts, binding against the deceased's estate, unless by other evidence, equally positive, it appear that they were given not evidentially, but in the nature of accommodation or loan, to the payee.' p. 70.

We never heard that any obligation, whether real or personal, would be binding on a man's next kin, contradistinguished, as in this passage, from heir. As for evidentially, we do not pretend to understand the term.

We have also occasionally detected what is called a non sequitur in argument, and an over readiness to draw conclusions from premises, from which they do not seem regularly deducible. Thus—

'Our right to use living creatures for food, is founded on the following reasons:—They cannot be the subject of common right and obligation with us; for they are not rational creatures. (d) A kind of war, therefore, exists between us and them. If they were all permitted to live, we could not. It is better for us to kill them, than that they should seriously annoy us.' (e) p. 45.

(d) See Count de Cat. S. of L. p. 89.
(e) See Hobbes. Harl. MSS. 1325. p. 207.

Now here Mr T. has not made out his point. We allow that it is better to kill than be killed; but he has wholly forgotten to prove that we are justified in eating whatever we are justified in killing. He might possibly confess and avoid the objection by slightly varying the terms and saying —it is better to eat than be eaten. Yet even this does not carry conviction; and, though a good reason enough for eating a lion, it is but a poor one for feeding on beef. As for greens—'Our right,' we agree with Mr T., 'to use vegetable substances in a reasonable manner will not be disputed.' p. 46.

But these are minor blemishes, and we prefer devoting the remainder of the short space we can afford to the indisputable beauties of the work.

To be concluded next week.

PROPOSALS for publishing by subscription an ANALYTICAL DIGEST OF ALL THE AMERICAN REPORTS. By WILLIAM HILLIARD, Jr. Counsellor at Law. Revised by BENJAMIN RAND, Counsellor at Law.

The study of American Jurisprudence will always form an essential part of the education of every accomplished American Lawyer. And to the practitioner, as well as to the jurist, the decisions of the various Courts of Law and Equity in the United States, are daily becoming more important. The Jurisprudence of the several States, with a single exception, is founded upon the Common Law of England. On most subjects of general importance, there is a great similarity in the legislative enactments of the several States. And the judicial decisions of the Courts of the several States, are often cited and respected as authorities in the Courts of other States than those in which they were pronounced. The decisions upon local or statutory law, merely, are comparatively few, and even in these, from the similarity in the statutes and usages of the several States, precedents and analogies may be found, of general application. Few, perhaps, are aware of the number of volumes of American Reports, which now exceeds two hundred and fifty. It is believed that an Analytical Digest of these Reports, upon the plan of Mr Jeremy's consolidated Digest of the English Reports, is a desideratum. The advantages of such a digest, judiciously arranged, so as to bring into one view all the adjudications of all the Courts in the United States, upon each particular subject, will be duly appreciated by every practical lawyer. It is intended that the work shall contain all the reported cases to the time of publication, without any exceptions; and a Supplement containing the subsequent decisions will be published annually.

The work will be published with despatch.

---

The work will be printed on a beautiful small type, and good paper, and will be comprised in four or five volumes, (probably not exceeding four,) royal octavo size, each volume to contain about 1000 pages; and will be delivered to subscribers at $5 per volume, in good law sheep binding, which is a very low price for a law work embracing so great a quantity of matter.

After publication the price of the work will be raised to $6 per volume.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From Hon. JOSEPH STORY, Judge of the Supreme Court of the U. S.; and Hon. ISAAC PARKER, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts.

The proposal of Mr Hilliard, to publish a uniform Digest of all the American Reports, upon the plan of the English Digest of Mr Jeremy, appears to me to be entitled to the patronage of the profession. No work of this kind, sufficiently accurate and extensive for general practice, at present exists. The want of one cannot but be felt by every lawyer, whose inquiries reach beyond the limits of the local law of his own State. Such a compilation, executed with the care, fidelity and ability, which so important a task demands, would be so highly useful, that it could scarcely fail of general approbation. As far as I have had the means of comprehending the plan of Mr Hilliard, from a personal communication with him, it appears to me entirely satisfactory. And the assistance and supervision of so distinguished a lawyer as Mr Rand, cannot but ensure an accuracy and completeness in the execution of the plan, correspondent with his just claims on the public confidence.

JOSEPH STORY.

---

I have no doubt the Digest proposed by Mr Hilliard will be highly useful, and that it will have a tendency to relieve the profession from the great labor of looking through hundreds of volumes, or of indices, to ascertain whether points sought for have been treated of and decided. I also feel assured that Mr Hilliard's professional acquirements, and assiduity in legal researches, qualify him to give such a book, under the revision proposed, all the usefulness which the plan suggests.

July 10. ISAAC PARKER.

---

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of administering and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire: and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Price $1,25.

Aug. 20.

---

NEW LAW BOOKS.—JOHN GRIGG, No. 9 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia, has just published the following valuable works.

CONDENSED REPORTS of CASES decided in the SUPREME COURT of the United States, from the organization of the Court at August term 1791, to January term 1828. Edited by Richard Peters, Counsellor at Law, and Reporter of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

This work is intended to contain the opinions of the Supreme Court, in the language of the Judges, in every case decided in that court from the establishment of the Government of the United States, to the commencement of Mr Peters's Reports at January term 1828. The reported decisions in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States, upon similar points, are also collected and digested in the work, as notes; and abstracts of those Cases, and also of the collateral decisions of the Supreme Court are given, so that the Professional Gentleman and the Student will be in possession of all the adjudicated Law of all the Courts of the United States, in an authoritative, condensed, and arranged form.

The work will be contained in not more than six volumes; the first volume is now published; the second volume will be published about the 1st of August, and the balance of the work during the present year and 1831.

Those who wish to possess this work will do well to make an early application as the greatest portion of the edition is taken up by subscription. They are for sale by the principal Booksellers in the United States, with J. Griggs's other law publications.

Price six dollars to those who subscribe, and seven dollars to non-subscribers, payable on delivery of each volume.

PETERS' REPORTS.—Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Supreme Court of the United States, by Richard Peters, Esquire, Reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, 4 vols. royal 8vo.

FONBLANQUE'S Celebrated TREATISE ON EQUITY. A new edition, with considerable additions, from the last London edition, by a distinguished Member of the Philadelphia Bar, in 1 vol. royal 8vo.

CHITTY ON CONTRACTS. A new and Practical Treatise on the Law of Contracts not under Seal, and upon the usual Defences to Actions thereon, with Corrections and Additional References. By a member of the Massachusetts Bar, in 1 vol. 8vo.

SAUNDER'S REPORTS, in 3 vols. 8vo. The 4th American, from the 5th considerably enlarged London edition.

Say's Political Economy, new edition.

TOLLER'S LAW OF EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS. With notes and references to American Authorities, by E. D. Ingraham, Esq. new edition, in 1 vol. 8vo.

Sugden on the Law of Vendors in 1 vol. 8vo.

Jones on Bailments in 1 vol. 8vo.

CHANCERY REPORTS. JOHN GRIGG, has in press the Decisions of the English Chancery Reports, upon the plan which has been adopted and successfully executed with the 'English Common Law Reports.' The work will comprehend, in a condensed form, all the Reports which have not been republished in the United States; and it will be continued, so as to present to the profession, annually, the Chancery Reports as they shall hereafter appear in Great Britain.

The work will also contain references to the decisions of the chancery courts of the United States, and of the several states.

---

GRAY & BOWEN have received by late arrivals the following valuable Foreign Books, which they will sell at low prices.

Dibdin's Library Companion, second edition, one large 8vo. vol.

Bowring's Poetry of the Magyars.

Moore's Byron. Splendid quarto edition.

Belzoni's Researches in Egypt and Nubia.

Description of the Ruins of an Ancient City in South America, with plates.

Memoires de M. De Bourrienne, 10 vols.

Histoire De France. Par M. Bignon, 4 vols.

Dictionnaire de Maximes. Par J. L. Malire, 1 vol.

Histoire du Congress de Vienne, 3 vols. 8vo.

Lafayette en Amerique, with Plates, 2 vols. 8vo.

The Works of Lope de Vega, 21 vols. quarto, fine edition.

Obras de Quevedo, 11 vols.

Don Quixotte, 5 vols.

Las Eroticas Villegas, 2 vols.

Trabajos de Persiles y Sigismunda, 2 vols.

Teatro Italiano Antico, 8 vols. July 10.

---

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. This day published by HILLIARD, GRAY, & Co. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law: being a continuation of the Digest of Massachusetts Reports; and also a continuation of Metcalf's Digest of the same work. Neatly bound in Sheep, $3,50—Calf, $4,00.

---

DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS, TO WIT: District Clerk's Office.

BE it remembered, that on the seventeenth day of August, A. D. 1830, in the fiftyfifth year of the Independence of the United States of America, Lewis Bigelow of the said district, has deposited in this office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as author in the words following, to wit:

'A Digest of Pickering's Reports, volumes II.—VII., being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law.'

In conformity to the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned;' and also to an act entitled, 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled, 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned,' and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints.'

JNO. W. DAVIS, { Clerk of the District of Massachusetts.

---

NOW PUBLISHING, BY CARTER & HENDEE, A SERIES OF SCIENTIFIC TRACTS, designed for Instruction and Entertainment, and adapted to Schools, Lyceums and Families. Conducted by Josiah Holbrook and others.

The whole Series will contain simple and clear outlines of the various sciences, and their principal division, with their application to the common purposes of life.

TERMS.—Not less than 24 numbers of a 12mo size, containing 24 pages each, will be published in a year, at $1,50, payable in advance. July 10.

---

CARTER AND HENDEE have in Press, SELF EDUCATION; or, THE MEANS OF MORAL PROGRESS, Translated from the French of M. Le Baron Degerando. To this work was awarded the honor of being 'crowned' by the French Academy; a distinction annually confered on one or two works, deemed the most useful that have been published during the year. And a late Review remarks; 'We have no ethical work of any living English writer to be compared with that of Degerando.'

VIEW OF THE UNITED STATES, for the use of Schools, with Maps and numerous Engravings.

INFANT SCHOOL MANUAL, or Teacher's Assistant Second Edition. Enlarged and much improved.

SCRAP TABLE, containing Original Anecdotes and Sketches.

YOUNG LADY'S BOOK, with 700 engravings on wood, of a superior quality, intended as an Annual for 1831.

THE YOUTH'S KEEPSAKE, a Christmas and New Year's Offering for 1831.

A NEW COLLECTION OF PSALMS AND HYMNS, for Public Worship. By Rev. F. W. P. Greenwood.

---

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW. Complete sets of this work (thirty volumes in all) can now be had, on application to the Publishers, on liberal terms. The number and variety of the topics discussed in this work, and the high reputation it enjoys both in this country and Europe, render it a most valuable addition to the library of literary men. A General Index of the first twentyfive volumes has also been published, in a style to match with the current volumes of the work.

Subscribers and others whose sets may be deficient, can be supplied with the missing numbers. Subscriptions to commence at any period, received at $5 per annum. GRAY & BOWEN.

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1830. NO. XIII.

MERCANTILE LAW.

NO. IV.

[Continued.]

It is a part of the same rule, that where, by known and established usage, certain words have acquired, in respect of a particular subject, a technical or secondary sense, this sense ought to be received in the exposition of contracts dealing with that subject. The usage of trade, as evidenced by persons conversant with it, frequently indeed determines the exact import of particular terms. Thus the words 'total loss,' 'average,' and many others in marine insurance, 'primage,' and 'dead freight,' in shipping, and even the more familiar terms of 'stock,' 'cash,' 'prompt,' and the like, have all a peculiar signification, defined by the practice of trade, and recognised accordingly by the courts.* Usage, however, though it may thus be called in aid to explain what is ambiguous, is never allowed to control a positive rule of law, or to interfere with the express agreement of the parties.† An express warranty, for example, is binding by the law; and the contract, so long as it continues open, may be rescinded, on the ground of a non-compliance with the warranty, within any reasonable time after the discovery. In a case therefore where an attempt was made to set up a custom in the trade by which the buyer was bound to reject the contract, if dissatisfied, at the time of examining the commodity, and neglecting to do so, was precluded from making any objection afterwards, such evidence was determined to be inadmissible.‡

With a like regard to intention, it becomes material sometimes to consider the time and place, at which the contract was entered into, or at which it is to be executed;—the time, for instance, in the ascertaining of value, as in the repayment of a loan, or in the case of fluctuating prices generally;§—the place, where the sense of certain terms varies in different districts. Thus, a pack of wool, a load of coals, a measure of wheat, denote perhaps different quantities in different parts of the country; and it is manifest that they must be construed according to their acceptation in that place in which the contract was made. In like manner, if anything be left, defective in the terms of an agreement, it may be supplied by a reference to local usage, for it is a maxim that in contractibus veniunt ea quæ sunt moris et consuetudinis in regione in qua contrahitur.‖ The rule must however, be understood with the same limitation which we before applied to the custom of trade.* Thus, the word 'bushel' having been fixed by law to mean the Winchester measure, evidence was not allowed to be given upon a contract for corn at a fixed price per bushel, that, according to the custom of the country, as well as the previous dealings of the parties, a different measure was intended.† The question of place is important also, as it respects the mode of performance. A man may undertake in London to pay 100*l.* in Dublin, and the undertaking will be satisfied by the payment of 100*l.* in Irish currency.‡ Upon the same principle, it is laid down in the case of foreign bills of exchange, that the time of payment is in general to be calculated according to the laws of the country where the bill is made payable;§ a rule which is reconciled with the foregoing maxim by the somewhat arbitrary dictum, contrax-isse unisquisque in eo loco intelligitur, in quo ut solveret se obligavit; but which is founded nevertheless upon the very reasonable presumption, that the parties to the contract must be supposed to have had in their minds the time and place, not of the formal engagement, but of the intended execution.

We have already seen in one or two of the above instances, that, where the terms of a contract are expressed in legal language, it is inferred that the strict and technical meaning must have been understood and intended by the parties. And it is a general rule, that such expressions shall be taken in their most comprehensive signification, as importing not only the ordinary meaning, but all which the law has thought proper to attach to them.‖ Yet this again is qualified by the more indulgent precept, that, where the strict construction would render the agreement unlawful,¶ or would tend to the injury of either party, it shall not be pressed to such a consequence; for the law does not willingly suppose that a man intends what is unlawful; and designs its rules, not for the prejudice, but the benefit, of those who are subject to them. Benigne interpretamur chartas propter laicorum simplicitatem, is the patronizing style of our once clerical lawyers.††

In accordance with the same principle, which we have seen pervading the whole, is the rule, that, in ambiguous expressions, that interpretation is to be preferred, which will give an effect to the words, rather than one which would render them useless and inoperative. Verba aliquod operari debent: for we are not, without necessity, to conclude that expressions are introduced idly, and without some corresponding ideas present to the mind of the speaker or writer. The same rule applies, and for the same reason, to distinct clauses and covenants in a formal instrument of contract; none of which are to be passed over as insignificant or immaterial, if fairly susceptible of an interpretation, which would assign them an operation.* And, in order that every part of the agreement may receive its due and proportionate effect, the law enjoins that the construction shall be made, not upon insolated passages or detached clauses, but upon the whole instrument viewed together. Ex antecedentibus et consequentibus optima fit interpretatio, is a maxim as obvious as it is just: for thus the several parts illustrate the whole, and the whole again reflects back light on each separate part. By referenceto the context, the intention is gathered, ambiguities are explained, even express stipulations (though not indeed without caution) are sometimes qualified,† and the whole is made effectual and consistent.‡ A rule so evident, it would be waste of time either to amplify or illustrate: a single day's attendance on the courts will probably furnish the student with a satisfactory instance of its application.§

Such, however, is the imperfectness, not so much of language itself, as of the ordinary mode of applying it—such is the obscurity in which a sentence is sometimes, either from inadvertence or design, involved, that cases do occasionally occur in which all these helps to interpretation fail to remove an ambiguity, or to reconcile a contradiction. For such cases the law has provided by declaring, first, that in the last resort, words shall be construed more strongly against the person in whose mouth they lie;‖ and,

---

* P. W. 396. 2 Salk. 443. 4 East, 135. 3 Campb. 16. 4 Campb. 385. 8 Taunt. 262. 1 Ves. 459. 2 Ves. 331. In the late case of Sigourney v. Lloyd. 8 B. & C. 622. this rule seems not to have been sufficiently attended to on the trial. Should not evidence have been given of the usage of trade in construing the effect of such an indorsement?

† Park. Ins. 416. 6 T. R. 320. 2 Marsh. 141. 3 Campb. 57. 8 Taunt. 92. 2 Dickens, 424. 1 Ves. 241. 333. 402. 6 Ves. 334. (n) 1 Sch. & Lef. 39.

‡ Holt's N. P. C. 95.

§ 2 P. W. 270. Com. Dig. Covenant. Treat. of Eq. b. 1. ch. 6. s. 12.

‖ Poth. 94. 6. T. R. 534.

* 6 T. R. 545. 2 B. & A. 746. So, now that the imperial measure has been fixed by law as the universal standard, it is clear that no other measure will ever be understood by the courts in construing a contract.

† 6 T. R. 543.

‡ Consuetudo et statuta loci in quem est destinata solutio respicienda sunt. Davis, 28. 2 B. & A. 307. 2 B. & C. 16. and see 1 P. W. 396. 2 P. W. 88. Ib. 696. Prec. Ch. 128.

§ Beawes, pl. 251. Mar. 102. Bayley on Bills, 112, 13.

‖ 1 Powell Contr. 402.

¶ Co. Lit. 42. n. 183. Sheph. Touchst. 88.

 1 T. R. 446. 2 T. R. 744. 2 M. & S. 363. Legis constructio nemini facit injuriam.

†† Co. Lit. 36.

* The rule of construction, ut res magis valeat quam pereat, is of very extensive and important application. In a case upon the construction of an instrument containing an ambiguous expression, Lord Mansfield has these words: 'Our construction is to support the deeds of parties, give effect to their intentions, and protect property; the other is a subtlety to overturn property, and defeat the intention of the parties, without answering any one good end or purpose whatsoever. "From" may, in vulgar use, and even in the strictest propriety of language, mean either inclusive or exclusive; the parties necessarily understood it in the sense which made their deed effectual; the courts of justice are to construe the words of parties so as to make their deeds effectual and not destroy them, more especially where the words themselves, abstractedly taken, will admit of either meaning. Pugh. v. Duke of Leeds. Cowp. 714. See also Treat. Eq. b. 1. ch. 6. s. 18.

† Where the purpose appears distinctly from the recitals of the instrument itself, there is little danger in restricting general covenants to that purpose, but where the object is not expressly stated, but is to be collected from the substance of the agreement, great caution is necessary in the application of the rule. See 4 Rep. 13 6. 1 Ves. jun. 59. 171. 1 Lord Raym, 235. 2 Saund. 414.

‡ 1 Burr. 282. 'The first sense makes everything consistent and effectual; the second sense destroys half the lease as repugnant and contradictory to the other; there ought to be no doubt, therefore, in which sense the words should be understood.' Verba Mansfield, C. J.

§ Ab uno disce omnes. There is a very good illustration of the rule in the case of Colvin v. Newberry, 8 B. & C. 166.

‖ Verba fortius accipiuntur contra proferentem. Plowd. 156, Bac. Max. 2 B. & P. 13. It is remarkable secondly, that where two clauses are found in direct opposition to each other, that which is first in order shall prevail.* And the reason is plain enough: in the former case the ambiguity is the act, possibly the intentional act, of the utterer: and in the latter, it is fair to suppose that what was really contemplated by the parties, would be uppermost in their minds, and consequently first reduced into form; and it would be absurd to imagine for a moment, that having once unequivocally expressed their purpose, they should intend by a subsequent clause in the same instrument to abrogate and defeat it.

We have said that, as it is forbidden, on the one hand, to travel out of a written agreement for the purpose of introducing doubts which do not exist in the words themselves; so, on the other hand, an ambiguity apparent on the instrument itself, or, in legal phrase, patent, can receive no explanation from without.† And the technical reason is this: The law places more reliance on written evidence than on the oral testimony of individuals. Wherever, therefore, a transaction has been reduced into writing, as it may then be proved by the production of the written instrument, it allows no parol evidence of the same facts. But if such evidence were admitted to explain something doubtful in the written document, it is evident that the proof of what the real agreement was would rest upon that evidence, and not upon the document, and so the rule would be infringed upon.‡ This may satisfy the lawyer: but the layman will probably reason thus: The writing is the deliberate act of the contracting parties, the formal record of their mutual obligations. It may be considered, therefore, as comprehending all which they contemplated in the bargain; and, consequently, the moment we quit it to seek for evidence from without, we are in danger of departing from what was mutually agreed, and introducing something which was not intended—a mischief far outweighing the possible hardship which may occasionally result from a strict adherence to the rule of exclusion. It may, however, happen, that a difficulty, not seen upon the face of the document, may present itself in the application, from a want of sufficient explicitness or particularity in description. This the law terms a latent ambiguity, and the rule is, that as the doubt is raised, so it may be removed, by a reference to extrinsic facts: nam quod è facto oritur ambiguum verificatione facti tollitur.§ Suppose a merchant were to sell by a contract in writing so many pipes of wine, described as 'wine now lying in bond in the warehouses of the London Dock Company,' and it turned out in fact that he had at that time both port and claret bonded there, each in sufficient quantity to satisfy the contract. It would thus be rendered doubtful what was intended by the description; and evidence would then be admissible for the purpose of shewing, either from a comparison of the current prices with the price agreed, or from the previous dealings, or from circumstances and expressions attending the bargain, which of the two wines was really the subject of the sale.

Except then in this instance of latent uncertainty (a case rarely occurring in mercantile transactions) parol evidence is inadmissible to explain or alter, much less to contradict the language of a written instrument.* It cannot even superadd a clause; for that would amount to an alteration. The rule is laid down by Lord Tenterden with his usual clearness thus: 'When the whole matter passes in parol, all that passes may sometimes be taken together, as forming parcel of the contract, though not always; because matter talked of at the commencement of a bargain may be excluded by the language used at the termination. But if the contract be reduced into writing, nothing which is not found in the writing can be considered as part of the contract.'† It is almost needless to remark that oral evidence is always received for the purpose of invalidating a contract on the ground of fraud or illegality, the object in such case not being to contradict the terms of the writing, but to defeat the transaction itself.

---

enough that the rule of the civil law is in terms exactly opposite to this, and in principle exactly the same. Fere secundum promissorem interpretamur. In their law the person speaking was not the promissor, but the stipulator; the promissor merely yielded an assent. The words were, therefore, to be construed against the speaker. Verba contra stipulatorem interpretanda sunt.

* Hard. 94.

† See the cases collected in 1 Phill. Evid. ch. 10. 2 Vern. 624, 625. 6 Co. 68 (b.) 2 P. W. 137. 3 Bing. 112.

‡ 3 Stark. Ev. 1000.

§ 2 Atk, 372. Ambl. 175. Bro. Ch. R. 472. 2 Id. 85. 3 Id. 355. 1 Ves. 259. 6 T. R. 671.

* For an instance see Thomson v. Brown, 7 Taunt. 656.

† 2 B. & C. 634.

MR BROUGHAM'S SPEECH

IN THE COMMITTEE ON THE FORGERY BILL, IN REPLY TO SIR ROBERT PEEL, JUNE, 1830.

I am sure, Sir, I rise to discuss this important question in the same frame of mind as the Right Hon. Baronet who has just sat down; and who, after considerable argument, has expressed his conviction that the punishment of death for forgery cannot with safety be abolished. After all that I have heard upon the subject, I confess that I am induced to come to an opposite conclusion; and I will at once proceed to state the difficulties which have occurred to my mind, and which lead me to think that the substitution of a secondary punishment would operate more powerfully to prevent the crime of forgery than that of death. The Right Hon. Baronet says that we are to look, in the first place, to the immense paper credit, especially in the City, and to the vast number of transactions which depend upon that species of currency. He next directs our attention to the amount of property risked in these transactions; and then, as I understand, to the very small number of forgeries which occur. As an illustration of these facts, he has particularly instanced the Bank of England. Whatever difficulties other persons may feel on account of the severity of the criminal code, the Bank of England, says the Right Hon. Baronet, never fails to prosecute wherever a case of forgery occurs; and he therefore takes the prosecutions of the Bank of England as a fair criterion of the number of forgeries which take place; and because the number of those prosecutions has of late years been very small, he thinks it a fair argument to suppose that the number of forgeries has dimimished. From these premises he contends that we ought not rashly to change a law which, as it at present stands, appears to afford a sufficient security for those transactions on paper credit that are so peculiarly exposed to fraud and forgery. Now, Sir, the difficulty which I perceive in this argument of the Right Honorable Baronet, is founded upon the statement of facts which he has made to us. He contends that secondary punishments are not safe to trust to; and argues that proposition at great length and with much ingenuity, backed by several very minute and perspicuous returns on the unsatisfactory nature of the secondary punishment, which my Right Honorable friend has proposed to substitute for the punishment of death. He has instanced the effects of confinement and prison diet on constitutions of every kind, but more especially on those who have previously led a life of ease, perhaps of refinement. These persons, he contends, would sink under the infliction of solitary imprisonment, and would soon excite the public sympathy in their favor in a stronger degree even than that which is at present created for such offenders. The Right Hon. Baronet then goes to the punishment of transportation, which he seems to object to on two grounds:—first, that it is inapplicable in many cases of forgery; and secondly, that the difficulty of keeping those in custody, at a great distance from this country,—who have acquired money,—will be extremely great. All these facts the Right Honorable Baronet adduces for the purpose of showing that any secondary punishment cannot be effectual. Now here arises my difficulty. The law, says the Right Honorable Baronet, works well; there were only two prosecutions by the Bank of England—that never-failing, that unflinching prosecutor—during the last year, and at the present moment, there is not one pending. The diminution of prosecutions by the associated bankers of London is in the same proportion. Therefore, says the Right Hon. Baronet, it is best to leave the law as it now stands, since it appears to operate most effectually to prevent the crime of forgery. That, if I am not mistaken, is the basis of the Right Hon. Secretary's argument. But, Sir, what then becomes of the secondary punishments which are at present inflicted? What is it that makes the law, which the Right Hon. Secretary describes as so satisfactory, which he lauds as affording the best protection to commerce, and by the operation of which the Bank of England, with its 300,000 Stock accounts, and the London bankers with their transactions of 500,000,000*l.* are protected from any great loss by forgery? What is it, I say, that makes this law so satisfactory? Whence is all this security? Whence is it that the law so well performs its office? I contend, Sir, that it is owing to those very secondary punishments which the Right Hon. Baronet condemns; and which he has taken so much pains to show must be attended with unsatisfactory results. I am arguing now from the Right Hon. Secretary's own premises, and I contend that it is owing to the present administration of the law by the infliction, not of death, but of those secondary punishments, that the crime of forgery has been so much diminished. Within the last seven years, we are told, there have been 217 convictions for forgery:—217 men, then, have been tried, convicted, and sentenced to death for the crime of forgery. Now, Sir, in how many of these cases has the satisfactory punishment of death been carried into effect, and in how many have secondary punishments been inflicted instead? I find, Sir, that in 24 cases, only, has the punishment of death been inflicted—so that the proportion of those who have received secondary punishments, to those who have been actually executed, is upwards of nine to one. The line of argument, adopted by the Right Hon. Baronet, is that the terror of this one execution is sufficient to deter men from forgery, because they can never calculate with certainty on the possibility of escape. I cannot agree with him in this view of the matter. I think that men enter into a different calculation on the subject, and at all times flatter themselves with the certainty of escape, because they find by the experience of other cases, that even if tried and convicted, the chances are nine to one in their favor. I know that the opposite argument to this has always been urged—it has been urged now; but I must beg leave to say, that it has never been satisfactory to my mind, and I think, indeed, that it is one of the most illogical inferences from simple premises that I have ever heard in my life. Let me remind the House, that the men who commit these offences are not such bad reasoners; they are, for the most part, practical, calculating men, who are not likely to overlook so important a fact as that the chances are ten to one in favor of their escaping capital punishment. If they do not so reason, audit quæstio; for then example has no influence at all upon them. But, besides all this, men who are about to commit this offence always picture to themselves favorable prosperity; men in such a disposition are always more sanguine than others. Now, Sir, are we to add to the sanguine hope of escape—are we to gild the fair prospect which these persons are apt to picture to themselves—or shall we awaken in them a true sense of the real danger which they run, by reducing the nature of the punishment to a certainty—as nearly as possible to an absolute certainty? Let me ask, Sir, whether we are not much more likely to deter a man from committing this offence by making it absolutely certain that he shall, if prosecuted and convicted, be punished, and severely punished—though not capitally—for it; than by leaving him subject to the punishment of death, with the chance of nine to one of escape? But, Sir, the chances of escape under the present law are even more than these; for, first, there is the chance of not being found out in time for prosecution—next, the chance of whether the injured party will prosecute or not;—then the chance of conviction;—and, lastly, the chance of ten to one against their being capitally punished. The Right Honorable Baronet will give me leave to observe upon a former part of his statement. But before doing so, I must beg to say, that he has treated this subject so candidly, that I do not look upon him in the light of an antagonist, but as one upon whom I may take my chance, at least, of making some impression. He has stated that, in one period of seven years, there were 700 and odd executions, being about 105 per annum; and that, in a subsequent period of seven years, the number was reduced to 400 and odd, being a diminution of nearly one half; but he did not state the proportions, in the two periods, of the convictions to the executions; so that I am at a loss to know whether, during the whole period, the diminution of capital punishment has been owing to the smaller number of prosecutions, or, the smaller number of convictions, or, in the third place, to the smaller number of inflictions. But I should rather think, from something he said in the latter part of his speech, that as regards this crime of forgery, the diminished number of executions in the last period of seven years, arises from the diminished number of prosecutions. Now I think the cause of this incident deserving of the most serious attention. It is said that one great difficulty is to find Juries who will convict for this offence of forgery. No doubt this operates to a great degree, and in some parts of the country more than in others, and I believe that it is a difficulty which is rather upon the increase; but this obstruction to the due administration of justice, great as it is, is not equal in practical effect to that to which I am about to call the attention of the House. The grand difficulty, then, is to prevail upon prosecutors and witnesses to come forward. That, I can assure the House, is much greater than the difficulty of getting Juries to convict; for when men are assembled together in a jury box, placed in an elevated situation before the eyes of their fellow citizens, and acting under the direction of a Judge,—the effects of which circumstances they best know who have most practised in Courts of Law—when, I say, you have men in that situation, forming part of a small select body, whose omissions, as well as commissions—whose errors, and whose ignorance, if you will,—are subject to review and criticism; it is more easy to induce them not to give way to their mistaken feelings, and to do what they ought to do, than if they were acting in their individual capacity, out of Court, placed in a situation where they have the power of following entirely and without control, the bent of their own inclinations. When an individual is not placed in the situation of restraint I have just described, let him be ever so callous and anxious to do his duty, he will meet with plenty to dissuade him from it. I shall not, now, argue the case of a man who carries his feeling to excess, but that of one as callous, if you will, as any solicitor ever employed by a public body or a committee of bankers, and who would be inclined to prosecute or not to prosecute just in proportion as he was certain or uncertain of procuring a conviction. Well, then, arguing the case of such a man, upon whom a forgery has been committed, he is sure to be surrounded with others of far different feelings. One will say to him, 'Oh, don't prosecute, the man is sure to be acquitted;' another will say, 'Here's Mr Justice so and so likely to come this circuit, and he leans against the punishment of death for forgery, so that you may as well save yourself the trouble of the prosecution;' and then another, perhaps, will say, 'Even if you convict him, you know he will make out a case for an application for mercy, and the Secretary of State for the Home Department is inclined to mercy;' and so they go on till, in most cases, even the callous are overcome. For the man of feeling, it is sufficient that he says to himself—'I will not put myself in the situation of being the cause of putting a man to death for such a thing as this,' and so he also refuses to prosecute. That this is the course of reasoning, not merely oftentimes, but times without number, all over the country, cannot be denied. To show that such is the effect of our law, I appeal, in the first place—to all men who have written upon the subject; in the second place, I appeal to all who have conversed on the subject; in the third place, I appeal to professional men, who have consulted their clients on the subject; and, in the last place, and this is the strongest appeal of all—I appeal to the petitions on your table. They come from practical men, from prosecutors—I mistake, I correct myself—they come from men who are not prosecutors—from men who complain that they are not prosecutors, who are sensible that they ought to be prosecutors, who fain would be prosecutors, who know and feel that daily depredations are committed on their property; but who cannot prosecute because they cannot convict. Some of them act from feeling; some from principle; but by much the greater number neither from feeling nor principle, but from a view of their own interests. Let, then, your calculations be what they may—it is clear that there are vast numbers of men whom you cannot get to prosecute and to convict unto death for depredations upon their property. I view the deference to be paid to public feeling exactly in the same light as the Right Honorable Baronet; for he has admitted, that in this question, of all others, we ought to carry along with us the feelings of mankind; as it is that concurrence alone which can make any punishment we may inflict effectual. So far I go along with him—but I go further, and contend that, not merely for this reason, is it right to have a punishment in which the people will sympathise—but for this other reason; that by another part of the Constitution, the law will not execute itself, and can be only executed by the participation of the people, whose feelings and principles, therefore, right or wrong, it becomes of the utmost importance to consult. For without their cooperation, you may make your law denounce what punishment it will; you may blacken or redden your Statute book as much as you please,—as it will in practice become mere waste paper, if not worse than nothing; for if it had been more merciful, it would have been sure to have been carried into effect by the people to whom its execution was confided. You have in this country no public prosecutor, as there is in Scotland, who, when forgery is committed, would take care that the forger is put upon his trial. That, I think, is a defect in our law, at the root of that bad impunity which crime often enjoys in this country, and certainly at the root of the capricious course often taken by criminal justice: this might be amended. But taking the law as it is, its execution depends upon the fancy of the individual who happens to be injured, or who, from being a witness to an offence, may happen to be bound over to prosecute. But the impediments to the execution of the law do not rest here. Witnesses must be had—and this is a difficulty which would arise whether there were a public prosecutor or not—but witnesses must be had; and who that knows anything of the administration of the law, is not aware of the difficulty of procuring witnesses to come forward, either against their convenience, or to speak against their feelings? Here let me remind the Right Honorable Baronet of one of the greatest abuses which exists in England, as regards the inconvenience to which witnesses are unnecessarily put; I allude to the assizes for one of the largest counties in England being held almost out of the county—I mean at Lancaster. Instead of being taken to Manchester or Liverpool, causes are twice a year taken for trial to that other remote corner of the country, to the great annoyance of the inhabitants. There is seen in the greatest perfection this difficulty of procuring witnesses. Even to persons who have some leisure, it is an annoyance to be taken forty or fifty miles as a witness; but, for a merchant of Liverpool or Manchester to be obliged to go to Lancaster, for fourteen days, perhaps, is the greatest injury that can be inflicted on him. He takes care, therefore, to say as little as possible of what he knows of any transaction, for fear it should reach the ears of the attorney of one of the parties, and that he might be summoned to Lancaster, and have a small sum put into his pocket, nominally, rather than really to pay his expenses. If that happen in civil cases, must not the same reasons operate in criminal trials? They inevitably must, and in a still stronger degree; for men do not like to run the risk of hanging another for what they think an inadequate offence. So much for the number of convictions. With respect to the number of prosecutions, till we can tell how many forgeries are committed, and compare them with the number of prosecutions, it will be in vain to make any calculation of what they ought to be. All we can do is to argue upon principle and analogy, and doing so I think it cannot be doubted that the crime of forgery is committed again and again, and not prosecuted, for fear there should be a capital conviction. Is it not obvious, that the true mode of dealing with this subject is to make the punishment certain? I take this to be undoubted; that no man in his senses—no man who is, by the constitution of his mind, so far a rational being as to be the object of criminal judicature at all, would—nay, could—commit an offence if he were absolutely, positively, certain that within three or four months he would be detected, prosecuted, convicted, and punished. No man would forge a bill for 1,000*l.* if he were absolutely certain that he would suffer at the end of a month, even a moderate punishment of two years;—certainly, unless he was a madman, he would not. We cannot have a system so perfect in all its parts as to make punishment absolutely certain, but we can bring it very near to certainty, sufficiently so to make a man say to himself 'If I do this I am sure to be punished.' We shall have brought the law to the best possible state, when we have the smallest quantity of punishment, consistent with the due degree of care necessary to deter others from committing the offence. The present state of uncertainty as regards the offence of forgery is most unfortunate. I only beg the Committee to look at the difference of the returns as regards murder and as regards forgery. Of 217 persons convicted of forgery in seven years, only 24 were capitally punished, while of 99 convicted of murder, 88 were executed. Here the law is in admirable state; there is some proportion between the number of convictions and the number of punishments; and accordingly, if a man commit murder, besides the horror which the crime naturally inspires,—and which I admit is to be taken into the account, as tending to aid the law more than any horror which can arise in the case of forgery—besides this horror, I say, and all the various circumstances, some physical and others of a moral nature, which all join together to render it difficult for a man, guilty of murder to escape—the man so guilty knows for certain, that if detected he is sure to be tried, and if convicted, that the punishment, owing to the feelings of mankind, is sure to be inflicted. Therefore I say, that the certainty combines with the severity, to deter men from the commission of the crime of murder.—The Right Honorable Baronet has said that in looking to the cases of murder, the same sort of argument may be founded upon them that is founded upon the returns relating to forgery; for, says he, there are 400 and odd trials for murder, and only 99 convictions. Now that, in my opinion, is clearly owing to this fact,—that indictments for murder included two different offences; so that out of these 400 and odd trials for murder, it does not follow that there was one more murder committed than those comprehended in the 99 cases in which convictions were obtained. A man may be indicted for murder or manslaughter, and he may be indicted for murder and convicted only of manslaughter; consequently the Right Honorable Secretary, when he says there were 400 trials for murder, and only 99 convictions, proves merely that there were 400 altogether tried for murder and manslaughter, of whom about one quarter were really guilty of the capital crime. There is no offence known to the law in which so many distinctions may be taken as in the killing of a man; no crime in which nice points so frequently arise; and, that, not from any imperfection of the law, but from the nature of things, and the difficulty of applying the law to the fact, all which increase the chance of the conviction not being for murder, but for the lesser offence. The Right Hon. Baronet introduced one fact, with respect to the Bank of England, which tended to perplex, if not to puzzle, the case, to some Gentlemen, I have no doubt, from not attending to all the circumstances connected with it. He stated that the Bank had had only two prosecutions for forgery in the whole year—at the last assizes none at all. That is a very unsafe way of calculating the number of forgeries committed upon the Bank of England; for that, like all public bodies, is most justly anxious not to be defeated in any of its prosecutions, so that their legal advisers, both Counsellors and solicitors—generally and certainly men of great experience, professional talent, and distinguished for knowledge—will take special care to bring into Court only the surest cases. And even if proceedings have gone a good way, they will withdraw them if there is a chance of being defeated. I will venture to say that, if the Bank of England were to prosecute in all cases of forgeries against them, a very far different number would appear on the returns than,'two,' and that, as many ciphers put after that unit, would not more than represent their amount. It must be considered, too, that although as is truly said, the Bank itself may not entertain the feeling of disinclination to prosecute, which operates so strongly upon others, yet the witnesses, as well as the Judge and Jury, to a certain degree share in the general sentiments of the community. All these are circumstances tending to make the number of the prosecutions instituted by the Bank of England so small. Once more let me remind the House of the testimony borne to the too great severity of the law by persons mainly interested in this subject. We are told that practical men wish the punishment of death to be retained; but they have come forward by the score, by the hundred—I may say by the thousand—and your table groans under their petitions denying the imputation, not upon their feelings, but upon their good sense. These petitions proceed from those to whom paper credit is the breath of the nostrils, from those who are ruined if forgery go unpunished, and who declare that it must go unpunished as long as death is inflicted for its commission. That, Sir, is the fact, and it is upon that fact that my whole argument rests—and it is upon that fact I fearlessly appeal to all impartial persons—to none with greater confidence than the Right Honorable Baronet—for a mitigation of the present disproportionate punishment. Now I really must say, that my idea of the great value of the labors of the Right Honorable Baronet in the department of law would not have been lessened had this Bill gone much further than it goes. In my opinion, it does not go far enough to justify, in any way, the eulogy which I heard pronounced upon it by an Honorable Friend of mine, a worthy Baronet, who I am concerned not to see in his place (Sir Michael Shaw Stewart) at an early period of the evening, when he presented a petition from a large body of his constituents at Glasgow, in favor of the remission of capital punishment. On presenting that petition he frankly and honestly stated that he differed in opinion from the petitioners, and said, that he agreed with the Right Honorable Baronet opposite, who was for going gradually and cautiously, and acknowledged the great progress made in repealing capital punishment in cases of forgery, and professed himself quite satisfied with what the Bill did, which he thought quite enough. In short, he remarked that it was a great step gained, and that he had no doubt the experiment would answer. I must say that I thought I had read the Bill; but when I heard this panegyric go so far, I again looked jealously through it, to see how far it really went, for I thought there might have lurked some clause which had escaped my first scrutiny. I should have been delighted had I found such a one, but there is no such thing. The Bill certainly does take away capital punishment in some cases, such as bonds, deeds, accountable receipts and others, acknowledging fines, acknowledging recoveries, and acknowledging judgments. Now, alas! these are cases so infinitely rare, that, practically speaking, the Hon. Baronet has flattered his constituents upon having made exactly no progress at all—that, practically speaking, the great improvement is so mighty gradual, so astoundingly slow, that its degrees may be rated at Zero. In point of convenience it makes a step backwards, in point of inconvenience it advances, and in point of principle it makes no progress at all. When we talk of the punishment of death for forgery, we always mean the forgery of negotiable bills, of bank-notes, and not of fines and recoveries, deeds, and bonds, of which there is not a forgery once in ten years, and of some of them so rarely as hardly to be known in practice. I can only say, that if it be any satisfaction to those who consider the present concession a great step, I will meet them with an equal step; and, all hostile as I am to retaining the capital punishment at all, I will make them a concession, which, if they list, they may retain to the end of their criminal code. They say, 'take away capital punishment from bonds, deeds, fines, and recoveries, and we shall make a great step.' I say to them, as the great advocates of capital punishments, 'Keep the forgery of the Great Seal a capital offence; nay, I even throw you in the Privy Seal into the bargain, and let him who would forge either be hanged; and if you think that a valuable step towards capital punishment, I think I have made as great a concession as you on the other side have, by abandoning it on bonds, fines, and recoveries.' That is to say, that practically speaking, about the same amount of good or evil would be effected by either concession. But for my own part I cannot see what reason there is for making any distinction in the punishment for forging an instrument with a fraudulent intent, be it of what kind it may. Why should the forgery of an accountable receipt be not capital, when the forgery of a promissory note to execute the self-same fraud is liable to be capitally punished? In law the effect is precisely the same in both cases, the consequence being to make a party liable to pay who ought not to pay. What reason then is there for any difference in the punishment of the offence? I beg pardon for detaining the House so long, but entertaining strong opinions on the question—opinions which I have entertained for many years, indeed ever since my lamented friend, Sir Samuel Romilly, first opened the eyes of the public upon this important subject, and having since joined with those good men who, in and out of this House, have at last done the work as I hope it has been done, I could not remain silent, although to speak were some inconvenience to myself. I cannot help congratulating the Committee on the progress made—I do not mean in the Bill, but in the discussion which the Bill has received within these walls, and still more on the important and overpowering testimony to the merits of the plan of mercy which these discussions have excited from the country; and I do tender heartily and respectfully to my Right Hon. and Learned Friend near me the tribute of my humble, sincere, and cordial congratulations that he has lived to see this his day of reward.

ENGLISH CASES.

SECONDARY COURT.—MAY.

Clements vs. Flanagan.

This was an action for libel; and the defendant having suffered judgment to go by default, the Secondary and Jury sat as usual under a writ of inquiry, to assess the damages.

Mr Brougham and Mr Earle attended for the plaintiff, and the Common Sergeant and Mr Evans for the defendant.

Mr Brougham said his client (Mr Clements) was the proprietor of a respectable and well-kept academy at Stoke Newington. The defendant was a learned gentleman, a friend of his, (Mr B.) and a distinguished member of the same profession. Whatever respect was due to the defendant's character, and notwithstanding his privileges as a barrister, he was amenable for any injustice which he had done to the plaintiff, if it appeared, as it did appear, that he had, through an overzeal, or, from any other cause, over-stepped his duty, and inflicted an injury upon the plaintiff; and it was for such injury (for injury had been done) the Jury were called upon to assess commensurate damages. It was not necessary for him, as the plaintiff's Counsel, to prove that the charges which had been brought against his client were without foundation; the defendant had himself, by allowing judgment to go by default, acknowledged them to be unfounded. This was the conclusion to be drawn by the Jury; indeed it was, he would say, the inevitable consequence. The facts of the case were these:—Mr Clements had at his school two boys, the sons of a Mr Homan, a tradesman of the City, who withdrew them without the customary notice, and in violation of a written agreement to give a notice of three months. A dispute arose between the parties; and Mr Clements, thinking he was entitled to the three months' pension, brought an action, which was tried in October last, in the Palace Court, and there recovered damages to the amount for which he sued. The present defendant was the Counsel who was instructed to resist the action; and the ground of defence was, that the boys had been taken away in consequence of the cruel treatment which they had received from Mr Clements. The case for the plaintiff was conducted with talent and discretion by his Learned Friend Mr Earl: and Mr Flanagan, as Counsel for Mr Homan, addressed the Jury with his usual force and spirit. The Learned Gentleman had certainly a right to act upon his instructions, and to establish, if he could, the defence—namely, that of cruel treatment, and general mismanagement of the school, on the part of the plaintiff; and he had the further right of making any comments germain to the subject, however painful they might be to the plaintiff, or injurious to his character. These privileges of the Bar were of great importance in the preservation of the properties, the liberties, and the lives of the community, and had been always guarded with great care—so much so, that no attempt to curtail them had ever been tried with success; so was it also with Members of the Legislature; they were invested, for the benefit of the people, with a perfect freedom of speech in Parliament, and whatever they might say there could not be called in question elsewhere. But to all these privileges there were boundaries. The doors of the legislative hall were the limits of a Member's privileges, and outside the walls of a Court-house the barrister was unprotected. An action had been successfully brought against the late Lord Abingdon, for the publication, in a pamphlet, of a speech which he had delivered in Parliament. The same doctrine had been held with regard to barristers, who had no right to publish elsewhere even what they themselves said in a Court of Justice. No doubt, the correctness of a report of proceedings in Courts of Justice, whether given by barristers, reporters, or booksellers, would go a great way in mitigation of damages; but the right to publish such proceedings had not yet been established. The law, however, gave a means of vindication, and a party sued for the publication of a report could justify himself by proving the truth of the statements which he put forward, and if, in a moment of excitement, the writer committed a slight inaccuracy, the circumstances under which he acted would go in mitigation. The libel complained of was contained in the Times newspaper of the 2d of November, and purported to be a report of the trial between Mr Clements and Mr Homan, at the Palace Court, on the preceding Saturday. This report was furnished by Mr Flanagan, and contained imputations most disastrous to the credit and reputation of Mr Clements' school. That such imputations were unfounded was admitted by the defendant's act of letting judgment pass against him, and he (Mr B.) had if he wished, a right to assume that no such trial had taken place; but he should not do so; a trial certainly did take place, but, as he was informed, what took place in Court was widely different from the report which the defendant had furnished. In that report Mr Flanagan is represented as having addressed the Jury in the following terms:—'If the application of the most cruel, brutal, unmanly, and ignominous torture for an offence, or rather an act which, to a man conscious of not having given any just grounds for its commission, would rather have excited laughter than revenge—if such an unnatural, wanton, and peevish exercise of authority can recommend a school-master, or a keeper of an academy, to the protection and support of the English public—if fathers and mothers will be induced to replenish the plaintiff's school, and give him an increased supply of scholars upon those grounds, then, certainly, Mr Clements, the plaintiff, had a right to make this supposed claim for the probable loss which he says he had encountered; and a still more solid motive for continuing to inflict, upon that new supply, the same cruel and ignominous marks of what then must be considered his diligence and attention to "school dicipline."' And in another part of the reported speech Mr Flanagan is made to call upon the Jury to say to their country 'whether they would, by their verdict, sanction those horrible practices which had been laid before them—whether they would further permit, so far as the influence of their verdict went, that unbridled and capricious indulgence in those tyrannous and cruel exhibitions which the plaintiff had so long wantoned in—whether they would record their horror and detestation of such barbarous practices by proclaiming to the country, by the verdict they would return, that such a system of what, in mockery, was called school discipline was no longer to be endured—that as fathers of families they abjured and reprobated it—or whether, on the other hand, by giving a verdict for the plaintiff, they would proclaim to their countrymen, that although in former days the halbert, and the scourge, and the brine, were the disgrace of our army, though now, thank God, nearly extinguished and abolished by the commanding influence of great and superior minds; yet that those instruments of torture were to remain in our public schools as the finest incitements to liberal learning, and the truest sources of honor, virtue, and every disposition which exalts and ennobles mankind.' Now, he (Mr B.) would at once admit, though he was not bound to do so, that a birch dipped in brine had been used, not however for the purpose of giving pain to the boys, but in order to render the punishment the more imposing in effect, Mr Clements thinking that it was better to produce a terror of committing offence on the mind of the boy, than to inflict any severe corporal punishment; and the fact was, that the application of the birch was light in proportion to the apparatus which was used. It was also true that young Homan, when brought up for punishment, produced a letter from his father, requesting that no corporal punishment should be applied to him; but the plaintiff had also a letter from Mr Homan, in which he approved of the plaintiff's conduct in chastising his son with a cane, upon a former occasion, and the letter in the boy's hands only objected to that mode of punishment for which Mr Clements substituted the birch, as described. The offence committed was that of running away from school, an act which in itself comprised a breach of all the rules of school discipline. The course which the defendant had taken precluded his client from proving all this in evidence, but Mr Clements, in bringing the present action, defied the most rigid scrutiny into his character as a teacher, and exposed at once to the defendant the whole economy of his school, for which he thus made himself responsible. It was to him of the last importance that no impression should go abroad that he treated his boys with cruelty, and yet these aspersions had been cast upon him merely at the suggestions of Mr Flanagan's client, who did not dare to come forward and substantiate his charges, which were injurious to the plaintiff, even if confined to the Palace Court, but which became more ruinous by their dissemination to the world, through the means of their publication in the public Press. The Jury knew that nothing acted more forcibly upon parents' minds than the idea that children were subject to torture, particularly when they were told it was a 'cruel, brutal, and ignominous torture,' such as described in the libel; and the greater effect must have been produced from the forcible and glowing terms in which the libel was couched. Such an oratorical display might have been justified if confined to a Jury; but the present Jury would judge what foundation there was for those charges when they learned that the Jury in the Palace Court had found an instantaneous verdict for Mr Clements. That Jury which had heard the whole circumstances, had, by their verdict, pronounced the charges to be groundless. The charges were, however, repeated; and again did Mr Clements come before a Jury, and challenged his accusers. That defiance had not been accepted, and he sought of the Jury such a verdict as would be a certificate to the public of the humanity of his conduct; and nothing but damages commensurate with the injustice which he had experienced, could repel the aspersions which had been cast upon his character; and the peculiar force with which they had been cast upon him the more imperatively required the sanction of their verdict with adequate damages. There was an aggravating circumstance connected with the publication of the libel:—it was the writing of a most offensive letter to the defendant's attorney, who applied to Mr Flanagan to acknowledge the incorrectness of the report, or name his attorney. To this letter from the attorney, Mr Flanagan replied, saying that he thought, when Mr Clements' fit of insanity had subsided, he would rest satisfied with what had occurred without obliging him again to bring forward the same charges. Whether this course was wise or not, he, Mr F., left to the consideration of the 'lying ruffian' whom the attorney was obliged to represent. This letter, he (Mr B.) thought an evidence of an ill-humor towards his client, which was uncalled-for and unjustifiable, and formed an important ingredient in the case, and one which the Jury were to take into consideration in estimating the damages.

Mr Wm. Harrison was then called by Mr Brougham—He holds a situation in the Times' office. He called in January last upon Mr Flanagan, with the manuscript from which the report was printed. Mr F. acknowledged it to be his. The report appeared on the 2d of November, and was a faithful print of the manuscript.

Mr Denman, on the part of the defendant, required no further proof of the publication.

The libel was then read, and is entirely too long for publication.

Mr Denman, for the defendant, said he was sure it was not necessary for him to bespeak the careful attention of the Jury to a subject of such importance, and which required to be sifted and weighed well. His Learned Friend had, in the exercise of a good discretion, addressed them in a tone of moderation, leaving the statements which he had made to work for themselves, and to operate favorably to his case on the minds of the Jury. It had been stated, and stated truly, that Mr Flanagan had shown a want of temperament, which it was desirable that lawyers, as well as others, should lay aside, for, though his warmth of temper might be of benefit to his clients, it might operate very injuriously to Mr Flanagan's own interest. This action, it appeared, was not brought so much to repair character, as to obtain a certificate from the Jury that the plaintiff was a man of great humanity; and in order to do this, the defendant was to be mulcted in heavy damages. In this case his client had great difficulties to contend with. In order to establish a justification, if he had entered such a plea, it would be necessary for him not merely to prove the accuracy of the report, but also the truth of the statements which it contained. It was not necessary for him to dwell upon the importance and necessity in the best interests of the community that the proceedings of Courts of Justice should be open to publication; but the decision of the Courts showed what responsibility attached to such Publications; but he would take the liberty of saying that such proceedings should be published, provided they did not offend public decency. There was no analogy between the present case and that of Lord Abingdon. That Noble Lord had abused his privilege as a Peer, in attacking the character of an attorney, who had no opportunity of repelling the attack; and, not content with making a speech in the House of Peers, he published an abusive pamphlet against the same individual; and that pamphlet differed materially from the other reports which got abroad. The present was a totally different case. His client had no knowledge of the plaintiff until the month of October last, and could have no animosity towards him. The pamphlet of Lord Abingdon arose out of some dispute which that Peer had with the man whom he abused. The right of giving publicity to the business of public Courts would, he hoped, be carefully guarded by Juries. It was essential to the administration of justice that there should be no restraint on such publication, and that they should come forth without mutilation. The statements, the evidence, and the speeches of Counsel, should all be reported. He wished to impress upon the Jury that his Learned Friend was not right in assuming that the passing judgment by default was an acknowledgment that what the defendant had stated was unfounded. It was no such thing; it was a confession that the defendant could not establish a technically legal defence. His Learned Friend even went the length of saying that he had a right to assume even that no such trial as that referred to had taken place at the Palace Court; but he half retracted, and admitted not only the trial, but the truth of some of the statements; and then he read a letter of the defendant, which was commented upon in aggravation, and which he (Mr D.) did not mean to justify; but that letter, intemperate as it was, could do the plaintiff no injury. It was not given or intended for publication, and might, to that moment, have been confined to the plaintiff's attorney. That letter, however, had been most ingeniously introduced into the declaration; and if the defendant had succeeded in proving the truth of all the statements in the report, still a verdict must pass against him on account of this letter. No explanation was given of the circumstance which gave rise to that letter, or of the excitement under which it was written. Not only was there this difficulty with regard to the letter, but if the defendant failed in proving the truth of every particular mentioned in the report, a verdict must be had against him. It was strange, too, that, at the Palace Court, only one witness had been called; and, if the object of the plaintiff was the vindication of character, he might have called witnesses now to show either that the statements were untrue, or never passed at the former trial.—[Mr Brougham here rose and said his Learned Friend well knew that he was not permitted to call witnesses to disprove the libel, the defendant having pleaded guilty to the whole. Had the defendant adopted a different course the plaintiff would have disproved every part:]—It was not to be wondered at that Mr Flanagan should feel strongly upon hearing it acknowledged that boys of a tender age had been subject to the humiliating and painful punishment of being flogged with a briny birch, and the Jury should keep in recollection that this fact remained undisputed; nay, indeed, acknowledged by the plaintiff's Counsel. This fact was to be kept in view by the Jury when they were giving what the plaintiff asked for, a certificate that they approved of his conduct. He thought this was a dangerous instrument for a schoolmaster to be armed with. No man of discretion should intrust himself with it, subject as he might be in a school to sudden excitement, and to the dangerous application of so formidable an instrument. Whatever might be the opinion of Mr Clements as to the utility of his own mode of discipline, there was something offensive to the eyes of others in his mode of punishment; and the Jury were in fact called upon to sanction such practices, and to declare that such was proper treatment for the backs of English youths. Mr Clements might be in error or not, but he (Mr D.) thought such a mode of punishment was degrading to youth, and left not only a lasting impression upon their minds, but marks upon their backs not unlike those inflicted upon convicts.

Mr Brougham said there was no proof and no foundation for saying that there had been any marks on the backs of the boys: besides, the defendant had pleaded guilty to the charge, and it was not competent for him afterwards to enter upon a justification of his conduct.

Mr Denman denied that his client had pleaded guilty, but he could not legally give the correctness of the report in a justification, and he had a right to comment upon the facts which had been admitted, and put it to the Jury whether they approved of the application to a boy's bare back of a birch steeped in brine; he had a right to ask them whether they thought a schoolmaster ought to be armed with so formidable a weapon, for that was one of the offences which had been committed. He wished again to remind the Jury that his client could have no hostility against Mr Clements, who might as well have desisted from bringing either the first suit or the present. Not content with his first verdict, he again appeared in Court, and asked not only for a certificate of his humanity, but also endeavored to put himself in possession of considerable damages. It would, he thought, have been wiser in the plaintiff to have told the Jury that he had altered his school discipline, than to call upon them to sanction, by a verdict, a mode of punishment which was offensive to every Englishman. The Jury had it in their power to read a useful lesson to the keepers of schools, who would, in future, as well from interested as from humane motives, refrain from all undue severity to children.

The Secondary shortly summed up the case for the Jury, who retired for about 15 minutes, and then returned a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, 50*l.*

RECENT AMERICAN DECISIONS.

ATTACHMENT.

1. An officer went on board a ship with a writ, in order to attach goods as the property of a consignee, and the goods being in the lower hold covered up with other goods, he did not go below or see the goods, but paid the freight to the master, and left a keeper to take charge of the goods as attached, and returned on the writ, that he attached them at the time when he went on board. The keeper continued on board several days and took possession of the goods when they were hoisted from the hold. It seems, that the proceedings of the officer while he was on board, constituted a valid attachment of the goods, which was completed at that time. Naylor vs. Dennie. Pickering, 198.

2. It is a sufficient attachment of hay in a barn, for the officer to go within view of it, declare that he attaches it and post on the barn door a notification of the attachment. Merrill vs. Sawyer. 397

3. Where the person appointed by a sheriff to take custody of personal property attached, abandons it, and it comes into the possession of an adverse claimant, the lien created by the attachment is lost. Carrington vs. Smith. 419

4. A mortgage was made of a factory and certain machinery 'in preparation soon to be placed there,' but no possession of the property was taken at the time, and the mortgager still continued to occupy the factory. The machinery was afterwards attached in the factory, in a suit against the mortgager, and a person at the factory was appointed by the attaching officer to take charge of the machinery attached. This person subsequently absconded, and the mortgagee took possession of the mortgaged property, real and personal, including what had been attached. An execution having issued in the suit in which the attachment was made, the attaching officer took the machinery out of the possession of the mortgagee, and sold it on the execution. Held, that the possession of the machinery taken by the mortgagee perfected his title under the mortgage; that at the time the officer took the machinery on execution, he had lost the lien created by his attachment; and that the mortgagee might maintain trespass against the officer. Ibid.

5. Where a town house was erected on land of the town under a contract with the builder that the town should occupy part of it at a certain rent, and should have the right to purchase the house at an appraised value, it was held that the house was the personal property of the builder, but that an attachment of it in the manner in which real estate is attached, no actual possession being taken by the officer, was valid. Ashmun vs. Williams. 402

6. Where the owner of chattels suffers them to be mixed with those of another person, so that they cannot be distinguished, an officer will not be liable to an action of trespass (nor, it seems, to any action) for attaching them as the property of such other person. Shumway vs. Rutter. 443

7. But if after the attachment, such owner point out his goods to the officer and demands a redelivery of them, and the officer notwithstanding sells them, the sale will be a conversion. Ibid.

8. If such owner exhibit to the officer a bill of sale of articles of the same kind with others attached by him, which they were intermixed so as to be undistinguishable, the officer will be justified if he select and give up the least valuable articles corresponding with the bill of sale. Ibid.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1830.

THOMAS ON UNIVERSAL JURISPRUDENCE.

Concluded from page 95.

It begins with a description of the nature and attributes of the Deity—

'The universe is not God. The object of a will cannot be the will itself. An accomplishment cannot be the power of accomplishing. An act of volition cannot be the seat of volition. The effect cannot be the cause. The thing governed cannot be the governing power.' p. 1.

And then, after assuring us that a great many other things are or are not a great many other things—

'God has been the great original before all things: for all things have had a cause. But being the first cause, he must be uncaused. He is called masculine, by the custom of language; but he is without gender.' p. 2.

With equal eloquence he dilates upon the nature of man—

'The body of man is made up of several organs of life, motion, and enjoyment, which gradually develope themselves until their maturity; after which they decay, and become insufficient to perform the demands made upon them. Death, which puts an end to all suffering, ensues. It occurs but once. We do not perfectly understand it. We ought not to condemn it. It is doubtless a wise appointment.' p. 15.

The next specimen is from the chapter on Personal Defence, and settles a question which medical jurists have not been able to settle; viz., whether a woman can ravish a man. Mr T. assumes the possibility of the offence, and very properly puts it upon the same footing as when the female is the sufferer.

'If a forcible attempt be made by a member of either sex, upon the chastity of one of the other, the same principle before stated, of using all necessary means of resistance, will apply to the case, and the life of the ravisher may be taken away, (a) if, in the judgment of the person attacked, that infliction be necessary for protection's sake. For another has no more right to the disposal or use of a person's body, than he has to maim or kill that body.' p. 101.

(a) See Just. Inst. 4. 3. 2. Civ. L. Digest, 48. 8. 1. 4. Grove's Mor. Phil. ii. p. 358. Paley, ii. c. 1.

To fit the reader for appreciating the above, we ought to state that, in the page before, it is laid down that 'our liberty to use our limbs would be of little service, if we were under an obligation to submit to any injuries attempted to be done to them.'

The passages we have quoted must be taken for the most part on the ipse dixit of the writer. This, however, is not always the case. Whenever he gets on debatable ground, he takes good care to strengthen his position and show a range of reading such as, we believe, no living cotemporary can boast, except perhaps Sir James Mackintosh.

'A man is not at liberty to kill himself, (a) even to avoid the most ignominious suffering. (b)

(a) See Aristot.; Paley, i. b. 1. c. 7.; Grove's Mor. Phil. 2. p. 277.; Blaise; Pascal; Plutarch; Gellius; Civ. L. Digest, 48. 21. 3. 4.; Plat. Phæd.; Cic. Tusc. Quæst. lib. 1.; Andron. Rhod. lib. 3. c. 7.; Collier's Essays, p. 3.; Eurip. Hecub. Chorus; Locke on Gov. b. 2. s. 6.; Godw. Pol. Jus. 1. p. 22.; Spav. Puff. 1. p. 192.; Virg, Æneid, 6. v. 434.; Montaigne Essias, lib. 11.; Martial, lib. 11. ep. 57. 80.; Hor. lib. 3. ode 3.; Lucan, lib. 17. v. 104.. Montesq. Esp. des Lois, liv. 14. c. 12.

(b) See Spav. Puff. 2. p. 302. p. 41.

Having now illustrated all the other peculiar merits of Mr Thomas, we shall give one specimen of his eloquence, by way of a bonne bouche to conclude. It is part of the dedication to the King.

'The age of gold, which early fable sketched, is realized in your majesty's auspicious sway. Science, by rapid strides, is approaching towards perfection, beyond which she is fated not to pass. The splendors of legislation and peace are, in your majesty's magnanimous mind, far more estimable than the achievements even of your victorious forces. Your majesty has raised a splendid pyramid of peaceful glory, in the institution of a royal college of literature; which will transmit, to distant ages, the recollection of your majesty's munificence.*

'The splendor and extent of your majesty's sway is shown in the fact, that the sun is never absent from your majesty's dominions. When it departs from this country and from Gibraltar, SierraLeone, the island of Ascension, and St Helena, which are almost longitudinally parallel with us, it rises upon Newfoundland, continues its course over the northern isles, Labrador, and Canada—passes on, in its path of grandeur, from Lake Superior to the West Indian Isles,—travels to the immense island of New Holland—then sheds its glories upon Ceylon—and proceeds over the extensive empire of Hindûstan.'

We can scarce conceive a finer compliment: taste and loyalty are happily combined; and our admiration is heightened by a circumstance which a lower grade of critics would blame. We mean the admirable paraphrase of the hyperbole, 'The sun never sets upon the Spanish flag;' which is, we take it, the original of Mr T.'s opinion that the sun is never absent from his majesty's dominions. An unimaginative reader might puzzle himself with conjecturing how the sun, supposing him to travel, could get from one of our colonies to another without being absent from the English dominions; but it must be remembered that the sea is an admitted part of them; and we are bound to suppose that, when the great luminary has proceeded over the empire of Hindûstan, he turns up his nose at Tibet and China, and quietly retraces his steps. Then can there be a more magnificent conception? Do even the inspired writings excel it? The sun stood still at the command of Joshua, in order to do honor to Israel: it hops, and skips, and jumps, at the command of Mr Thomas, in order to do honor to England.

We part from our author with unfeigned regret, and hope he will soon publish again. 'Oh! that mine adversary had written a book,' exclaimed Job. We say the same of our friends.

*And of which the author of Universal Jurisprudence is, as may be seen by his title page, 'Fellow.' Mr T. has a section—'Of Literary Dignities,'—in which he briefly sets forth the duties of those enjoying them; to wit, 'professors and fellows of colleges, or royal societies.' These duties are 'to make no by-laws contrary to the supreme ones; to promote those purposes for which their establishments are incorporated, &c; and to teach nothing which is hurtful to the state which incorporates them, or sanctions their dignities;* or inconsistent with reason. This is required by the honorable distinctions with which they are invested.' p. 274. If this be all, they have certainly no reason to complain of having too much exacted from them.

* See Laws of Roy. Soc, of Lit.—[Mr T. 's note.]

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

Petersdorff's Abridgment of the Law Reports. Fourteenth Volume.

A Practical Treatise on the Law of Slander and Libel, and incidentally of Malicious Prosecutions. With a Preliminary Discourse, and Appendix of Precedents of Forms of Declaration, Justification, Indictments, &c. Second edition with very considerable additions. By Thomas Starkie, Esq. of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister at Law.

Additional Cases; being a Continuation of Cases at Nisi Prius, before Lord Kenyon and other eminent Judges, taken at different times between the years 1795 and 1812. By Thomas Peake, Esq., Sergeant at Law. With Notes by Thomas Peake, Jun., Esq., of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister at Law.

GRAY AND BOWEN, No. 141, Washington Street, Boston, have recently published the following valuable works.

I. A DESCRIPTION OF TREMONT HOUSE; WITH ARCHITECTURAL ILLUSTRATIONS.—4to.

'Jam scires ab introitu primo—herculentum et amvenum videre et diversonium.' APULEIUS, M. A V.

This work is embellished with a copper-plate engraving, representing the front of the house, and thirty lithographic prints, exhibiting the details of the structure. Its object will be understood by the following extract from the preface.

'The present publication is intended to satisfy a curiosity, which frequent inquiries for a description of Tremont House were supposed to indicate.

'Its original plan was to furnish such particulars relative to this establishment as strangers might wish to possess, but it has been extended so as to comprehend many architectural details, which will probably be interesting to mechanics; as much of the ornamental work of Tremont House was copied or adopted from books, not commonly in their hands, and has not before been executed in this country.

II. AN EPITOME OF UNIVERSAL GEOGRAPHY; or, a Description of the various Countries of the Globe; with a view of their Political Condition at the present time. With sixty Maps. By NATHAN HALE.

III. A DICTIONARY OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE; or, an Explanation of Words and Things connected with all the Arts and Sciences. Illustrated with numerous Wood Cuts. By GEORGE CRABB, A. M., Author of 'English Synonymes,' 'Technological Dictionary,' and 'Historical Dictionary.'

IV. THE VESTAL—A TALE OF POMPEII. 1 Vol. 12mo.

'Oh Time, thou beautifier of the dead,
Adorner of the ruin.' CHILDE HAROLD.

V. AUTHORSHIP. A Tale. By a New Englander over Sea. 1 Vol. 12mo.

VI. AN ORATION; Delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, Cambridge, Mass. August 26th, 1830. By the Rev. ORVILLE DEWEY.

VII. THE DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Published under the Direction of the President of the United States, from the Original Manuscripts in the Department of State, conformably to a resolution of Congress, of March 27, 1818. Edited by JARED SPARKS.

This important Correspondence, now for the first time published, will form eleven volumes. Eight are already published and the remainder will appear very shortly.

VIII. JEFFERSON'S WORKS, In four Volumes. Accompanied with a Portrait on steel, and a fac-simile of the original draft of the Declaration of Independence. Second Edition.

IX. THE NEW TESTAMENT, conformed to Griesbach's Text. 1 Vol. 12mo.

THE TOKEN, a Christmas and New Year's Present, for 1831. Edited by S. G. Goodrich.

'Then take my flower, and let its leaves
Beside thy heart be cherished near,
While that confiding heart receives
The thought it whispers to thine ear.'

The engravings for the Token of this year are executed by Cheney, Ellis, Gallaudet, and others; among the contributors are Dewey, Greenwood, Miss Sedgwick, Mrs Sigourney, Hall, Peabody, Wetmore, author of a Year in Spain, author of Tales of the Northwest, Neal, Thatcher, Mrs Hale, and others of the first reputation.

The work is larger than heretofore, and is done up in splendid embossed morocco. The literary department is considered decidedly superior to the former years, and in all respects it has received the greatest care and attention. Oct 23.

---

BIGELOW'S SUPPLEMENT. HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. have just published A Digest of Pickering's Reports, Volumes 2—7, being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports.—By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law. Oct. 23.

---

PICKERING'S REPORTS, Vol. 8th. This day published and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. Oct. 23.

---

This day received by GRAY & BOWEN, 141 Washington Street.

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW, No XXV. for July 1830.

Contents: 1, The Ballot: 2, Carwell: 3, Government of Lower Canada: 4, Wilson's life of Daniel de Foe: 5, Greek Lexicons: 6, Physiology and Cultivation of Trees: 7, Game of Life: 8, Dobell's Siberia: 9, Bishop of London and Sabbath Breaking: 10, Three Courses and a Dessert: 11, Clarendon: 12, Moorsom's Nova Scotia: 13, Religious Disabilities: 14, Stamp Act and Synod of Somerset House: 15, Patronage of Art, and the President of the Royal Academy: 16, Distress of the Country: 17, Egyptian Notation: 18, Great Britain and France: Postscript to the Article on the Ballot.

The Westminster Review has existed long enough, to see the cause in which its efforts were begun, make a notable advance in the opinions of mankind. Its proposed object was to prove, that the interests which were supposed confined to the wretched and weak, are in reality those of all ranks and orders in the state; and if the course has been successfully shaped, it is unnecessary to discuss what portion of the progress has been consequent on the efforts of the rowers, and what on the general tide which carried them upon their way. The term which was once employed as a name of low reproach, has found its way into high places, and is gone forth as the title of a class, who glory in their designation, and are not afraid to speak with their enemies in the gate. Like the early Christians, they may say to their opponents—Hesterni sumus, et vestra omnia implevimus, urbes, insulas, castella, municipa, concilabula, castra ipsa, tribus, decurias, palatium, senatum, forum.—They cannot even add the Sola vobis; relinquimus templa. What has been gained by reason, will never be wittingly abused; and it will be fame enough for common men, if what they have hitherto defended they hereafter can assist. Oct. 23.

---

DANE'S ABRIDGMENT OF AMERICAN LAW, in 9 vols. with an appendix. A few complete sets for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. H., G. & Co. will also supply the ninth vol. and the appendix to those who are owners of the eight volumes, and the appendix separate to those who have the ninth. Oct. 23.

---

ENGLISH LAW BOOKS. This day received and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & Co.

Browne's Chancery Practice, under the New Orders with the Sanction of the Court, in 2 vols. 8 vo.

Willoch on the Laws of the Medical Profession, 1 vol. 8 vo.

Finelly's Law aud Practice of Elections, 1 vol. 12 mo.

Crabbe's History of the English Law, 1 vol. 8 vo.

Oct. 23.

---

PRINTING. The Printing House of I. R. BUTTS, corner of Washington and School Streets, is supplied with materials suitable for Book, Job, and every other description of Printing. Oct. 23.

---

DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS, TO WIT: District Clerk's Office.

BE it remembered, that on the seventeenth day of August, A. D. 1830, in the fiftyfifth year of the Independence of the United States of America, Lewis Bigelow of the said district, has deposited in this office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as author in the words following, to wit:

'A Digest of Pickering's Reports, volumes II.—VII., being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law.'

In conformity to the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned;' and also to an act entitled, 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled, 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned,' and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints.'

JNO. W. DAVIS, { Clerk of the District of Massachusetts.

---

GRAY & BOWEN, have in preparation, and will very shortly put to press,

A NEW DICTIONARY OF MEDICAL SCIENCE AND LITERATURE; which will contain a concise account of the various subjects in Anatomy, Physiology, Pathology, Therapeutics, Materia Medica, Surgery, Obstetrics, and Pharmacy, with the Etymology and Orthoepy of the terms of their Greek, Latin, French, and German synonymes;—a copious Bibliography appended to the different articles, and Biographical Notices of the most eminent Authors in the different departments of Medical Science, with a Catalogue of their principal works mentioned and an Epitome of the existing state of Medical Science and Literature. By Robley Dunglison, M. D. Professor of Medicine in the University of Virginia &c, &c.

While many of the nations of Continental Europe possess Dictionaries, which have kept pace with the advancing condition of Medical Science, Great Britain and America possess it may be said, but one of a concise character,—that of Hooper,—which independently of its want of accuracy on many points, is incontestibly far behind the present state of Medical Science and Literature, and unfit for the purposes of the Medical Student. In proof of this, it will be sufficient to remark, that the New Dictionary will contain at least five thousand words more than are to be found in that publication,—while the circumstance of the Dictionary of Hooper being stereotyped in this country, renders it impracticable to make the necessary additions to it, were the ground work such as to render such a course advisable.

The work will not be a mere Dictionary of terms; it will comprise concise histories of diseases: a description and doses of various kinds of medicine, with formula for the different Pharmacentrical preparations, &c, &c.

The important publications daily appearing in France and Germany, have induced the author to add the French and German synonymes to the various terms; so that the work will really contain the substance of an English, French and German Dictionary, at a comparatively trifling expense.—The French Index will be found to include every word in the 'Dictionaire des Science Medicales,' which consists of sixty volumes, as well as in the smaller Dictionaries more recently published.

Great attention has been, moreover, paid to the Greek and Latin synonymes, so that the Dictionary will, it is trusted, form a safe and convenient guide to the study of ancient and modern authors on Medicine.

It will be comprised in one large volume, 8vo. Oct. 23.

---

HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. No 134 Washington Street, Boston, have in press a Trearise on Corporations, with an appendix of the Corporation acts of each state, by Joseph K. Angell, author of a Treatise on Water Courses, Tide Water, Limitations, &c. Oct. 23.

---

LAW BOOKS.—HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. 134 Washington Street, have on hand a large Stock of American and English Law Books, comprising a complete assortment of the best editions of all works in general use. They also purchase and sell second hand Law Books—terms liberal.

H., G. & Co. supply any volumes that may be wanted of Massachusetts or Pickering's Reports.

---

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of administering and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire: and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Price $1,25.

---

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. This day published by HILLIARD, GRAY, & Co. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law: being a continuation of the Digest of Massachusetts Reports; and also a continuation of Metcalf's Digest of the same work. Neatly bound in Sheep,3,50.—Calf, $4,00

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1830. NO. XIV.

MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE.

INSANITY.

The subject of insanity presents a difficulty different both in nature and degree from those we have hitherto encountered in treating of medical jurisprudence. In our former articles, we attempted to point out the nature of the evidence to be required in cases of violent death by an unknown cause or agent, and while we admitted that very intricate questions must now and then arise, we proved by numerous examples how very seldom a court of justice could fail of ariving at the truth, when duly availing itself of the science of the physician and the acuteness of the lawyer in conjunction. It was there our comparatively easy task to enumerate the means of deducing a correct conclusion from certain established premises, but in the present instance we are stopped at once by the absolute want of all data, perplexed at the outset by this simple, but, we fear, unanswerable query, What is insanity? Locke long ago informed the world, that it was 'that state of mind which is not reason,' and other writers have described it by negations; but, as far as our researches have extended, no one has yet been found to declare what it is, correctly, or even intelligibly; and of all the accounts given of it, no two at all resemble one another. Judges and M. D.s alike have failed and differed; but the former, as the more confident, have been the surpassing in absurdity: with specimens of their lucubrations we will not now fatigue the reader, but in the progress of this article we may have occasion to quote some few of their dicta delivered on cases of importance.

It would appear the excess of presumption to aim at deciding in a matter where all doctors disagree, and which has baffled the subtlety of jurists successful otherwise in defining and explaining every title of that involved and heterogeneous mass 'the law of England.' Let us then take a hint from the prudent Dr Burrows, who some time ago discovered that endeavors to expound the nature of insanity to courts of justice served only to expose himself and his brethren to ridicule and contempt, and were often employed for the purpose of invalidating their testimony by the wily advocate. 'Having observed,' says he, 'many successful attempts of this kind, I long since determined to resist being inveigled into any definition of insanity, whether acquired incidentally by the court, or purposely by counsel. Accordingly, when giving evidence on a recent commission, and I was asked to define unsoundness of mind, I respectfully, but decidedly, declined it, on the avowed ground that, 'I had heard the question frequently put to medical men of the greatest eminence, and never heard any one of them, by his explanation, make it at all clearer.' And I advise medical men to follow this example when called as witnesses, if they wish that their testimony should be respected.'* On the classification of the various species of insanity by medical scholars, under names perhaps more learned than appropriate, we shall here make no remark, as being unconnected with our object, and indeed quite useless to the legal student, who will find his practical inquiries limited to ascertaining the degree, and not the kind of madness.

The investigator of those cases, where real or supposed insanity has been made the subject of legal proceedings, must immediately remark the very different amount and quality of evidence required, accordingly as the question may be of a criminal or of a civil nature. A commission of lunacy is found every year against some luckless individual, upon such proof of mental unsoundness as certainly would not save him from being hanged, as doli copax for any capital felony, by any court in Christendom. This fact, among others, has given rise to much malicious sneering at the paternal care displayed towards the wealthy, under our just and free institutions, when the rich man is condemned to the moral death of guardianship and confinement for such previous exhibitions of madness, as could not possibly preserve the poor from the natural death of the gallows and the gibbet. Yet is the principle correct; firstly, because it cannot be denied that a man, incapable of managing his own affairs, may yet possess sufficient reason to restrain him from the commission of enormous crime; and secondly, because the safety of society demands that nothing short of positive demonstration of an insanity cotemporaneous with the criminal act, should exempt the agent from the consequences of guilt. Our learned judges have hitherto in vain essayed to fix the precise degree or standard of insanity at which moral responsibility may be supposed to cease; but they have mostly leaned to the severer side. Lord Erskine has laid down the proposition, that 'in cases of atrocity, the relation between the disease and the act should be apparent;' and again, 'I think, as a doctrine of law, the delusion and the act should be connected;' and Lord Eldon, on two or three occasions, used nearly the same words. Were these principles enforced to their full extent, small, indeed, would be the number of madmen escaping the penalties of the law. An individual, who should take another's life, under the delusion that such a sacrifice was necessary to procure the salvation of mankind, might, indeed, escape being hanged; but the poor wretch, who constantly and sincerely imagines himself the Almighty, or the Emperor of China, and knocks his neighbor on the head for failing in due respect to his dignity, could scarcely hope to find favor with their lordships, since there appears no necessary connection or relation between the idea of imperial power, or even of Deity itself, and that of homicide. Hale, C. J. is somewhat more mild in his opinions. 'There is,' says he, 'First, a partial insanity; and secondly, a total insanity. First, partial insanity is either in respect of things, when they, who are competent as to some, are not so as to others, or else it is partial in respect to the degree. This is the condition of many, especially of melancholy persons. As to such, a partial insanity will not excuse them; for that persons who are felons of themselves, and other felons, are under a degree of it when they offend.' Again, he says, 'Crimes committed by lunatics,* in such their distemper, are under the same judgment as those committed by men partially insane. The person who is absolutely mad for a day, killing a man in that distemper, is equally not guilty as if he were mad without intermission. But such persons as have their lucid intervals, have usually in those intervals at least a competent use of reason, and crimes committed by them are of the same nature, and punishable in the same manner, as if they had not such defect.' After all, this acute lawyer, hopeless of discovering a rule to satisfy himself or others, leaves it to judge and jury to draw the line: 'Lest on one side there be a kind of inhumanity towards the defects of human nature, or on the other side too great an indulgence given to great crimes;' and in this, we think, most reasonable men will agree with him. With the learned judge's general rule, that 'a person, who has ordinarily as great a share of understanding as a child of fourteen years of age, is such a person as may be guilty of treason or felony,' it is rather more difficulty to coincide, as there certainly may be found several clever children, who, at fourteen, possess a greater share of understanding than the majority of mankind attain to throughout life.

The true, but somewhat appalling statement of this question seems to be, that by far the greater number of atrocious felons are partially insane or imbecile, inasmuch as they perpetrate their crime under the influence of motives insufficient to actuate what society agrees to call a reasonable man. In many murderers, for example, there is found an abasement and hebetude of intellect scarcely consistent with moral responsibility; in others, a miscalculation of the chances of impunity hardly explicable in a creature capable of reflection; with others, the motive is so trifling and inadequate, that few persons under its influence would be at the pains to cross the street; with others, absolutely no motive whatever. All these persons, though in various degrees, must be accounted partially insane, and yet every one of them would be executed, unless proof could be produced of glaringly irrational conduct previous to the commission of the murder; and such proof there is no reason to expect. To take the strongest case of the total absence of all motives,—we remember that a woman at Paris, never before suspected of insanity, on being requested by a neighbor, with whom she lived on the most friendly terms, to take charge of her infant for a few moments, was seized with such an irresistible propensity to destroy it, that she cut off the child's head, and tossed it from the window into a carriage passing by. Lacretelle relates, in his History of France, that the Count of Charalois, in Louis XVth's time, committed several murders, without interest, anger, or vengeance; but his motive was, perhaps, partly the exhibition of skill, as it appears that he particularly delighted in shooting tilers, for the pleasure of seeing them fall from the tops of houses. But history abounds in examples of individuals loving

*Commentaries on Insanity, by George Man Burrows, M. D. Lord. 1828.

*Lunatics, so called because their paroxysms were supposed to come on at the time of full moon, an opinion some time exploded; but the term is now correctly applied to those maniacs who have lucid intervals.

murder for its own sake, who yet betray no other symptom of insanity. Similarly of crimes less atrocious; an irresistible inclination for theft, unattended by any design of using the stolen article, is to be found even among the highest classes. Now these persons are indisputably unsound of mind, although upon one point only; yet what judge or jury would be justified in abstaining to visit upon them the severest penalties of the law? It seems to us, indeed, so impossible to establish a sure boundary between the ever varying confine, of reason and madness; so many crimes are committed by persons habitually insane, at a moment when they are under rational impulses, if we may so speak; and so many, on the other hand, are the acts of men overcome by imbecility, temporary delirium, or unrestrainable monomania, that the idea of doing strict justice to the culprit in all cases must be abandoned in despair, and the security and well-being of society made the only end in criminal judgments. But this end, it may be urged, would be attained as well by substituting imprisonment for death, in all cases of a dubious nature; and to this we have nothing to reply, observing only, that it adds one to the long list of arguments which may be urged against all capital punishments whatever.

In this discussion we have wandered a little from the direct course of our subject; but shall now proceed to point out what seem to be the best means of ascertaining the existence and extent of the accused person's insanity, and also what has been and still is the usual practice of our criminal courts in such a case. To do so the more effectually, recourse must be had to Dr Haslam's brief, but excellent work, on the Medical Jurisprudence of Insanity; and we may quote his Advice to the Medical Practitioner, as a guide for the examining counsel. 'It has been stated,' he observes, 'in a former part of this work, that the medical evidence, in order to impress and satisfy the tribunal before which his testimony is given, should not merely pronounce the party to be insane, but ought to adduce sufficient reasons for the foundation of his opinion. For this purpose it behoves him to have investigated accurately the collateral circumstances. It should be inquired if he had experienced an attack at any former period of his life; if insanity had prevailed in his family; if any of those circumstances, which are generally acknowledged to be the causes of this disease, had occurred; as, injuries of the head; mercurial preparations, largely or injudiciously administered; attacks of paralysis; suppression of customary evacuations, &c. It should likewise be ascertained if previous depression of mind had prevailed, resulting from grief, anxiety, or disappointment; and it should not be neglected to collect any written document; as insane persons will very often commit to writing their feelings and opinions, although they may suppress them in discourse.'

Dr Haslam objects warmly, as being unfair and useless, to the custom of counsel in criminal cases inquiring of the medical witness, if he knows whether the supposed madman can distinguish evil from good and right from wrong, for as he urges, 'when a medical person is employed concerning any one to whom insanity is imputed, his principal inquiry is concerning insanity; it is not his object to ascertain how much reason he possesses, but how far and on what topics he is insane. And having guaged his insanity he has performed his duty.' Substitute only the words, in his power, for 'his object,' and we believe this observation will be found incontrovertibly correct. The great source of criminal conduct among madmen, is some erroneous conviction regarding the propriety of certain actions, or the dispositions of certain individuals. Dr H. goes so far as to say, that false belief is the essence of insanity. On this ground he censures so much the custom of inquiring into the maniac's notions of wrong or right; for however correct these may be on general subjects, yet on all those connected with this disease, he has entirely a right and wrong of his own, and 'his belief in the truth of his principle, his faith in the right of his actions, are superior to argument.' 'Sane and insane,' he continues, 'hold false beliefs, but a sane person can be reasoned out of them, an insane never.' How far this dangerous distinction might attach the imputation of insanity to certain noble lords, country gentlemen, learned conveyancers, and others, we shall not here venture to inquire, but proceed to give a short abstract of the trial of Earl Ferrars, one of the most important that can be considered as bearing on this subject, and highly illustrative of the difficulties attending the proof of insanity in all cases.

The Earl Ferrars was tried before the House of Lords, in the year 1760, for the murder of one John Johnson, then resident on his estates, and whom he had once employed as his receiver. His animosity had been excited against the unhappy victim, by a suspicion that the latter had been instrumental in procuring a bill of separation between the earl and his lady, passed two years before, and that he had also conspired to disappoint him in a contract regarding certain coal mines. It did not appear upon the trial, that these suspicions were at all founded on fact. Highly indignant at these fancied injuries, the earl endeavored to eject Johnson from a farm he had formerly promised him, and which, indeed, he held possession of at that time. Failing in this attempt through the interposition of trustees, his lordship appears to have resolved on a more terrible revenge. For this purpose, he again assumed, and maintained for months, a friendly air towards Johnson, and at length, one Sunday morning, made an appointment for an interview on the ensuing Friday. His mind being now resolved on murder, he deliberately prepared for the deed, by sending out of the way before the hour of meeting, his men servants, his children, and a Mrs Clifford, who took care of them. There remained in the house only three female servants. Johnson came and was at first civilly received. The parties went into a private room together, and the door was locked. One of the women listening outside, heard shortly after some high words, and then the report of a pistol. The earl came out and called to them, saying, he had shot Mr Johnson, had him conveyed to a bed, and shortly after sent for his daughter and a surgeon. The wounded man remained in his murderer's house through great part of the night, and was then removed to his own, where he expired the next morning. In the course of the day a posse of the neighbors collected, and the earl was seized in a garret without any violent resistance, although he had barricadoed his doors and windows, and was armed with a great number of weapons. But few other important facts were stated by the evidence for the prosecution.

Anne Johnson, the daughter of the deceased, deposed, that when sent for to her father, the earl met her at the door, and informed her with great coolness, that he had shot him; that, afterwards he said, he thought he had not shot him; then going into the room where the wounded man lay, he turned the clothes down, and said he saw he had shot him, but afterwards observed, that he did not know what he had done, he had shot him and that was what he designed.

Mr Kirkland, the surgeon employed, stated, that the earl told him, he had shot Johnson on his refusing to sign a paper confessing his villany; that he expressed great satisfaction at the deed, and a perfect conviction of its propriety; but seemed in great fear of the consequences, often asking if the man would die. That he, Kirkland, to humor him, said Johnson would recover, and that he would be a witness in his favor. That the earl kept himself intoxicated by constant drinking from the time of his arrival until retiring to bed, which he did about twelve. That on one occasion he became very violent, threatening to kill Johnson, and going into his room endeavored to tear the clothes off, but was easily prevented, and for the most part seemed only anxious to ascertain that his victim would recover, which when satisfied of, he retired to rest.

The defence set up was insanity.

Nearly all the witnesses deposed, that they had long considered the earl mad, and that they had often without apparent cause seen him raving, swearing, stamping, talking to himself, and spitting at himself in the glass. His brothers proved, that his father and two female relatives had been insane, and that it had been more than once proposed to take out a commission of lunacy against the earl himself, expense and the fear of his violence if not found of unsound mind alone deterring them. His attorney, or agent, gave in evidence, that he considered him occasionally mad, and that he had some time before declined to continue doing business for him, on account of his extreme violence on one occasion.

A curious specimen of confusion of ideas was given on this occasion by the Solicitor General in cross-examining a witness, who deposed to some irrational proceedings of the earl, as persevering in endeavors to set aside the settlement of an estate, when all the first lawyers had advised him that he could not by any possibility succeed. 'Now my Lords,' says the advocate, 'I should be glad to ask this witness whether he conceives such an action proceeded from tenaciousness of opinion or insanity of mind?' A strange distinction, when Dr Haslam and other eminent writers have observed that this same tenaciousness of opinion, which is impervious to reason, is among the strongest evidences of insanity.

The Earl put several able questions to the witnesses in the course of the trial, and concluded with a defence highly acute, perspicuous, and affecting. He was condemned and executed. The circumstances as we may conjecture, that weighed most against him with his judges were, the deliberation with which the murder was plotted, the evident knowledge of the distinctions between right and wrong possessed by the criminal, and the great ability and reasonableness of his defence. Yet subsequent experience has shewn, that all these are compatible with derangement of the understanding, and that maniacs often entertain the most correct moral views on all but one subject, and appear in discussions of all kinds pre-eminently rational and acute. Perhaps the strongest proof of criminality made out was, Lord Ferrars' manifest fear of the consequences of his dreadful act, so that however his conscience might be satisfied of its propriety in the eyes of his divine Judge, the violation of human law and its results were constantly and fearfully present to him; and it can hardly be denied that the infringement of the laws of society knowingly by any member of it, makes him, setting all higher considerations aside, a fit object for punishment. Lord Erskine has some remarks on this case, which we shall presently refer to.

[To be continued.]

JUDGE WASHINGTON.

Among the judicial virtues, impartiality stands foremost. No learning however profound, no intelligence however cultivated, no patience however unwearied, no deportment however dignified, if this be wanting, can make a judge truly respectable. It is in their union that judicial excellence can alone be found. The late Judge Washington was a true exemplification of their blended influence. He always distributed justice with an equal hand. The most eminent and influential counsel with a bad cause and a fallacious argument, could never exercise an undue control over his mind, while the youngest, and the feeblest, were sure, that its full weight would be given to everything they might urge. Regardless of persons, he looked only to the just administration of the Law. While on the bench, partial favor was shown by him to none, constant courtesy and a patient ear were yielded to all. No man ever more truly appreciated or admired legal excellence and private worth. Such was the respect felt for his character and conduct, that the good uniformly treated him with respect and deference, because they revered him, and the turbulent were in his presence awed into decorum. Here, where his judicial character was best known, his memory will be a cherished recollection. We take great pleasure in publishing the following interesting communication, for which we are indebted to the kindness of an intelligent friend to whom we would express our thanks.

LAST ILLNESS OF JUDGE WASHINGTON.

Hearing of the severe indisposition of judge Washington, and feeling the most lively interest in him from long personal acquaintance, and also a family connexion, I called to make inquiries of his health on the 20th of November (six days before he died.) I was asked into his chamber, and found him much emaciated, and jaundiced deeply, but without pain. Though stretched on the bed of sickness, he manifested his usual cheerfulness, and in a short time our conversation was directed to a variety of subjects, then the topics of the day, as the Virginia Convention, the Virginia University, the general political condition of our country, the origin, policy and powers of the court of which he was a member. He asked several questions about the Convention, stating that it was only within a few days that his mind had recovered sufficient tone for him to read the papers on the subject.

In the course of this interview I expressed a regret at the unsettled state of the internal politics of our country, its frequent changes, and the disposition to introduce a proscriptive system against the exercise of a constitutional right of suffrage. In these he acquiesced without saying much. I went on further to express an opinion that the noble tribunal of which he was a member seemed to be the only feature of our republican system having permanence, and upon which could rest the hopes of those desiring a settled condition of things, and an unvarying interpretation of our constitutional privileges. That owing to the dignified and cautious course which this court had adopted, a decision of it had a more satisfactory influence upon public opinion, than an act of congress; that it was to be hoped, that its independence would never be taken from it, that it would never be converted into an executive tool, or become the instrument of an ephemeral predominance of party, and that it might always remain as a corrective to the incompetent knowledge of legislative bodies. I also added that I considered it a dispensation of providence for our good, that there had been so few changes in the constituents of his court since its organization; that this circumstance alone must have given rise to many decisions which would determine with precision the theory of our government.

These observations evidently put the judge in a train of thought which animated him and gave him pleasure to pursue. He admitted unhesitatingly the correctness of these views, observing that though all the decisions required had not been made, yet there were enough to establish principles, and to define the boundaries of state rights, and those of the general government. He said that to avoid giving offence to states, it had always been a maxim in the court, to presume that their legislatures meant well, that therefore on indifferent points their pretensions were admitted; but when their pretensions were such that the operations of the general government could be cramped by them they were quashed. He then quoted several instances of decisions against the acts of state legislatures, some of which had given much offence at first, but were finally acquiesced in. For example, the claims of states to tax a stock emanating under the authority of the general government, were invalidated by the decisions of his court, because the smallest concession of such a right might ultimately produce an undefined extension of it, to the effect of cramping or defeating completely the objects of the general government in the establishment of stock. Again any pretensions of a state to tax the salaries of United States officers were inadmissible because competent salaries were the guaranty for obtaining competent men, but if a state by taxing it could reduce such salary, it thereby obtained the power of fixing the description of individuals who occupied the offices of the general government. The judge in proceeding, mentioned that on a decision of his court annulling a law of Pennsylvania, the late judge Brackenridge of this state meeting him the day after at breakfast, said to him in his jocose way, 'so I find you have upset our law on such a subject. —'Yes,' was the reply, 'it could not be helped;' 'Well' says B. 'you have done exactly right, it was an abominable law, but it was more than our bench dare do, to pronounce it unconstitutional, though such a decision was much demanded.'

After these general topics, judge Washington talked on private matters, and seemed ripe for conversation, some of which was of a playful kind, and directed at his lady, who sat, at his side, for her apprehension of steam boats, in consequence of which they had to make a wearisome journey from Mount Vernon to Philadelphia and back again so frequently. She had never been in one. This interview lasted for an hour, and was truly delightful to me. The judge seemed so animated, that I took it for granted he would recover —he was seized, however, in a few days afterwards with a swelling of the glands in his neck, which made swallowing so difficult, that Dr Physick had to pass a catheter though his nostrils into the throat, to introduce nourishment. His mind was most fully prepared for death, both by the tranquillity with which he viewed the event, and the perfect arrangement of his temporal affairs. A few days before death he had drawn up by a confidential friend, instructions to his near relatives on the disposition of his body on demise. These go to show how closely he had applied the circumstances of death to himself, and how much opposed he was to an ostentatious funeral. He directed that no change should be made in his clothes or person,—and that the sheet on which he died should be wrapped around him, and used as a winding sheet—the coffin was to have a flat top and be covered with plain black cloth. There were some other instructions which it may be unnecessary to specify.

On the 26th of November, 1829, he died and his body was removed the next day to Mount Vernon. His wife, to whom he was tenderly attached, and whose destitution at his loss, formed perhaps the only subject of anxiety to his death bed, by a decree of providence, died suddenly on the road near Philadelphia, while following his remains to their home.—Journal of Law.

ENGLISH CASES.

POLICE—MANSION HOUSE.

Antoni Antonio, the Italian Doctor of civil and Ecclesiastical Law, who was a few days ago brought before the Lord Mayor, charged with having armed himself with a brace of pistols, with which he contemplated mischief to somebody, was confronted with his wife before his Lordship, and an account was given by the lady, which excited universal astonishment. The following is a brief statement of the case:

Mrs Antonio said, that she was a Limerick woman, and had her Irish husband, who was a waiter at the great Inn there, and with whom she lived very happily. The doctor one day walked into the Inn, and calling her Irish husband aside, told him that he [the doctor] had just arrived from London, and that he happened to be out of cash, but expected a remittance every moment of money due to him in England. This story was believed, and the waiter became responsible to a certain extent for the doctor's diet and lodging, but finding that his customer's friends in England were not very punctual, he took him home, where he might live more frugally. As the doctor was a good scholar, tuitions were at once provided for him, but still no money arrived, and he was very fond of good living, so that the family began to feel the incumbrance to be serious.—The doctor at last induced them to take a house, upon his assurance that he would pay the rent. The first quarter approached with great rapidity, but no money appeared, and then the doctor said that he would go off to London, to his friend Prince Esterhazy, to whom he had lent the cash.—(Laughter

The Lord Mayor—And did you believe all this? —Mrs Antonio, (with the greatest simplicity)—God knows best, your Lordship, we believed every word of it. But money was wanting. Well, we were afraid to let the doctor go by himself, and my husband was not able to leave his business, so my mother and I thought it would be best for us to go, and off we set for Dublin along with him. The doctor said, that he was much in want of a wife, (a laugh,) so we gave a little party in Dublin, and asked some ladies to tea, to give him his choice, but he was very desirous to make us drink, and he prevailed upon my mother to take some mixture, which soon put her to sleep, but I would not take any. Well, off he ran to a ship that was going to Scotland, and off I ran after him.

The Lord Mayor—What! and left your mother asleep? Mrs Antonio—Fast asleep. So the ship sailed, and didn't stop till we came to Scotland. —(Loud laughter.) Well, I was afraid to leave him, because I knew that if Prince Esterhazy paid him, he wouldn't pay us, except I was along with him; but he suddenly took it into his head to marry me.

The Lord Mayor—To marry you! and you having a husband living in Limerick? Mrs Antonio—Yes; he told me that if I refused he would expose me to my husband, so I agreed to be his wife, and the ceremony was performed by a Scotch clergyman.

The Lord Mayor—Come, come, you ran away from your Irish husband with him, and now you are tired of him? Mrs Antonio—I'll take my oath, your Lordship, that I never ran away from my Irish husband; I have written to him, and expect him every day.

The Lord Mayor—Did not you sleep along with this Ecclesiastical Doctor before you married him! Mrs Antonio (with great vehemence)—Never! I'd lose my life first. What! sleep with a man without marrying him? The Lord knows I wouldn't do any such wicked thing—(Laughter.)

The Lord Mayor—Well, how did he treat you? Mrs Antonio—Oh, then, God knows, I wish I never saw his face: he's a shocking man.

The Lord Mayor—Has he beaten you? Mrs Antonio—No, he never struck me, but I am sure he will destroy me. He is in possession, he says, of an imperceptible poison, and he has threatened to use it upon me, if I leave him; but I will leave him, for I find it's all a lie about the money, and there is not the least use in marrying him.—(Loud laughter.)

The Lord Mayor—How did he get those pistols? Mrs Antonio—I gave him the last sovereign I had in the world, and he went and purchased them with it.

The Lord Mayor—And who paid the passage money, and all the incidental expenses? Mrs Antonio—Why, my Lord, you see my Irish husband was a little too liberal with his money when he carried it about with him, so he used to give it to me; and we had put by 40 sovereigns of his savings. Well, I took the sovereigns.

The Lord Mayor—What all? Mrs Antonio—Every one, your Lordship, because you see we wanted to get the money from Prince Esterhazy, to pay the rent which was fast coming round. So I paid all the expenses.

Mr Hobler—And who discharged the matrimonial expenses. Mrs Antonio—I did. I paid the Scotch Minister, but I found the Doctor did not want a wife at all, at all.—(Loud laughter.)

Dr Antonio—I paid for the marriage. I did pay a great deal of money; I did spend my money in Limerick, along with my wife's other husband; but she sha'nt be his wife no more—never no more —— me—(Laughter.)

Mrs Antonio—I won't have anything to do with you, I tell you.

The Lord Mayor—Upon my word, Doctor, you have acted very unlike a professional gentleman. Not content with running in the poor man's debt, you ran away with his wife and seduced her.

Mrs Antonio would not allow that she had been seduced; she could, she declared with an appealing look to the whole room, produce the certificates of both her marriages. [Loud laughter.]

The Lord Mayor believed the woman's statement, and believed that she considered in marrying the Doctor, she had committed no offence. His Lordship declared that in the course of his life he had never heard of so singular a proof of credulity and simplicity.

During the whole of this conversation this female spoke without the slightest hesitation, and with an air of sincerity which it was impossible to question.

The Lord Mayor thought that the case was one in which government ought to interfere, by sending the Doctor, by virtue of the Alien Bill, to practice at home.

Mr Hobler observed, that government would not, in all probability, act upon the Alien Bill, except in cases of political offence.

The Doctor was then sent to the officers of Whitechapel parish, with directions that a very sharp eye should be kept on so dangerous a person; and Mrs Antonio, who seemed shocked upon hearing that she had done wrong, was discharged.

---

ROLLS COURT.—MAY.

Hunloke vs. Gell.

This case came on for decision, on the question whether a power of appointment under a marriage settlement should be cousidered to be executed by a will, which, without allusion to the property over which it had extended. By the decision of this proposition the property of the late Sir Thomas Hunloke would be extensively affected. By his marriage settlement the late Sir Thomas Hunloke had a power of appointment given to him over a considerable property, in reference not only to the interests of his future heir, but to provisions for younger children. He died at a very early age, leaving a son and two daughters. At that time he possessed other estates besides those subject to the marriage settlement, all of which were included in the words of his will, without reference to the power of appointment. In case the will should be adjudged a sufficient appointment the chief portion of the settled estates would accrue to the heir, together with the accumulations of a very long minority. In the event of a contrary decision, the major part of the accumulations would fall to the two daughters of Sir Thomas Hunloke, one of whom is Lady Albemarle, to the amount of nearly 26,000*l.* each.

Mr Pemberton supported the proposition of the validity of a will, as an execution of a power of appointment, where, from its provisions, such appeared to have been the intention of the testator, although not directly expressed. This view of the point he rested chiefly on the case of Lownds v. Lownds, 1 Young & Jervis, 445, which was lately decided in the Exchequer, before the present Chief Baron.

Mr Tinney and Mr Munro supported the same view of the question.

Mr Bickersteth appeared for the daughters of Sir T. Hunloke, and contended against the intention of executing the power of appointment being manifest on the face of the will.

His Honor decided that the disposition of property permitted by the power of appointment to Sir T. Hunloke, had been made by him inclusively in the general provisions of his will. He was of opinion that the will which he would read thus—after the words 'all my real and personal estates,' he would add, 'including my settled and unsettled estates,' was a full and valid execution of the power of appointment. The results of this decision would be most consistent with Sir T. Hunloke's power and the interests of the family. It would have been monstrous that these young ladies should receive 26,000*l.* each out of the family property, and leave the heir inadequately supplied with the means of supporting his title and station.

His honor then directed some minor details in the arrangement of this property, respecting the fortunes of the ladies, and certain annuities and other charges.

---

Gale vs. Pitt.

Mr Lovatt for the plaintiff. This bill was filed against the trustees to a marriage settlement for breach of trust. In 1802, the plaintiffs were married. Defendants became trustees to a sum of 1000*l.* settled on the husband and wife for life, remainder to their children. This sum was at that time invested in mortgage, and the interest was well paid till 1816, when, with the consent of the plaintiffs, the mortgage was assigned, and defendants received the 1000*l.* which they held in their hands uninvested to the present day, paying the interest, however, regularly. By the words of the settlement they had been directed to invest this sum in Government security. Since the year 1816, the public stocks had risen considerably, and the plaintiffs now prayed that defendants should make good the loss which had been incurred, by not having made an investment in 1816.

Mr Bickersteth, for the defendants, represented that the second trustee had never acted, and should not be considered liable to this suit, as the other trustee and defendant had always proceeded with the concurrence of the plaintiffs.

His Honor said that the second defendant should not certainly be rendered answerable for the proceedings of his co-trustee. With respect to the latter, it was evident he had acted with the consent of the plaintiffs. They were, therefore, not entitled to relief against him. But as they had, on the contrary, acquiesced in what was certainly a breach of trust, he should direct the money to be now invested for the benefit of the children, and leave each of the parties to pay their own costs.

---

RECENT ENGLISH DECISIONS.

BILL OF EXCHANGE.

Held, on special demurrer, to be not necessary to aver an acceptance to be in writing, though the statute 1 & 2 Geo. 4. requires acceptances to be so.—Chalié vs. Belshaw, 6 Bing. 529.

A bill, purporting to be accepted by S. and C., who banked with the plaintiffs, was presented the day it became due, and paid by the plaintiffs in the belief that the acceptance was genuine. On the following day it was discovered that the acceptance was a forgery, and the plaintiffs on that day gave notice to the defendants: Held, that the holder of a bill is entitled to know on the day when it becomes due, whether it is an honored or a dishonored bill; and that if he receive the money and is suffered to retain it during the whole of the day, the parties who paid it cannot recover it back. Bayley J., who delivered judgment, observed, 'In this case we give no opinion upon the point, whether the plaintiffs would have been entitled to recover if notice of the forgery had been given on the very day on which the bill was paid.—Cocks vs. Masterman, 9 B. & C. 902.

Action by indorsee against acceptor of a foreign bill, drawn in a set. The first part, accepted by the defendant, was produced. The second part had arrived in England before the other part was accepted by the defendant, and immediately indorsed by him to his father, redeemable on the substitution of other securities. It was so redeemed when due. The defence attempted was, that the property in the subsequently accepted part (the first,) passed to the father, and that, therefore, nobody but he had a right to sue upon any part of the bill. Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover,—by three Judges, on the ground that the transfer to the father was conditional; by Parke J., on the ground that the acceptor was estopped, by the act of acceptance, from taking the above line of defence.—Holdsworth vs. Hunter, 1 L. & W. 163.

[On this case the reporters remark, in a note: 'The reasons which led the court to a unanimous resolution are so various, that it is not easy to state any principle determined by it. The preponderance of opinion, however, seems to be, that the acceptor cannot, when sued himself, set up his own act as invalidating the bill, although he cannot, on the other hand, by any act, vary the rights and liabilities of the other parties to the instrument.']

A. accepts a bill for the accomodation of B., who has drawn it in a fictitious name, and afterwards indorses it (for value) in the same name; A. being sued by the indorsee, cannot dispute the indorsement.—Cooper vs. Meyer, 1 L. & W. 172.

The indorsee cannot recover against the acceptor of a bill of exchange, where the acceptance is not in his own handwriting, without proving either a general authority from the defendant to the party who wrote it to accept bills for him, unrevoked at the period of the acceptance in question, or a particular authority to accept the particular bill; unless, indeed, the indorsee have taken the bill on the faith of on authority in that party to accept bills in the defendant's name.—Cash vs. Taylor, 1 L. & W. 178.

Where a bill of exchange is given for the price of goods, which, it was stipulated, should be of good merchantable quality, it is no defence to an action on the bill, that the goods have proved to be of inferior quality.—Obbard vs. Betham, 1 L. & W. 180.

---

FORGERY.

On an indictment for forging a note of the Royal Bank of Scotland, it is not necessary to show by the charter of the bank, that it has power to draw or issue notes; such power is sufficiently recognised by the 48 G. 3. c. 149. s. 16., and the 55 G. 3. c. 184. s. 23. (Stamp Acts.)—Rex vs. M'Keay, 1. Ry. & M. 130.

Where, in an indictment for forging or uttering a receipt at the foot of an account, merely the initials of the name of the person purporting to give the receipt were used, the indictment was held bad, as it did not shew what the initials meant.—Rex vs. Barton, 1 Ry. & M. 141.

It must appear on the indictment, that the person, whose name is forged, had authority to receive the money.—Id. ibid.

On an indictment for forging an order, it is necessary that the order should import, that the person, in whose name it is made, has a disposing power over the subject of the order; or it should be proved, that the person, in whose name it is made, had such power.—Rex vs. Baker, 1 Ry. & M. 231.

Where the prisoner, at the time of uttering a note, represented that the maker lived at a particular place, and in a particular line of business; it was held, that proof of this representation, in addition to proof that the note was not made by the person so described, is sufficient to prove it a forgery. And though it appears in evidence that there is another person of the same name, but in a different line of business, in will not be requisite for the prosecutor to prove that the note was not made by that person.—Rex vs. Hampton, 1 Ry. & M. 255.

---

FORMER RECOVERY.

Plaintiff sued the defendant for negligence, alleging special damage. The matter was, by an order of Nisi Prius, afterwards made a rule of by Court, referred to an arbitrator, who directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The order of reference precluded the plaintiff from bringing any new action. The plaintiff having commenced a fresh action against the defendant, the declaration in which was the same as in the first, with the addition that the plaintiff alleged himseif to have paid certain sums for which he before merely alleged himself to be liable, and named other additional persons who had ceased to employ him in consequence of the defendant's negligence; the Court refused to stay the proceedings; although they said that, looking at the plaintiff's declaration, it would be mercy to him to do so; and Gaselee J. added, that he was of opinion that the first action might be pleaded in bar to the last.—Dicas vs. Jay, 6 Bing. 519.

---

HOUSEBREAKING.

If a person raise the sash of a window, which was before partly open, so as to admit himself into a house, this is not a breaking of the hoase.—Rex vs. Smith, 1 Ry. & M. 178.

---

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

If, on a joint charge against husband and wife for receiving stolen goods, the husband is committed, the wife cannot be committed also.—Rex vs. Archer, 1 Ry. & M. 143.

---

INTERESTED WITNESS.

The broker who effected the policy being produced as a witness, refused to part with it, until assured by the Judge that if the plaintiff recovered the Court would prevent the money from being paid over till the witness's lien upon it for premiums was discharged. Held, that he was nevertheless a competent witness for the assured.

In answer to a question from the defendant's counsel, he stated that the plaintiffs had become bankrupts, and that he expected a dividend. Held, that this also did not render him incompetent.—Hunter vs. Leathley, 1 L. & W. 125.

---

INSURANCE.

A person insuring is bound to communicate every intelligence he has that may affect the mind of the underwriter either as to the point whether he will insure at all, or as to the point at what premium he will insure.—Rickards vs. Murdock, 1 L. & W. 132.

The question being whether the loss was total or partial, it ought to be left to the jury to say whether the particular injuries could not have been repaired so as to render the ship seaworthy for the voyage, and not whether she was generally not worth repairing thoroughly.—Thompson vs. Colvin, 1. L & W. 140.

A commercial treaty between Great Britian and Portugal, gave a full reciprocal liberty of commerce and navigation as to all goods, except articles the property of enemies of either power, or contraband of war. Another clause specified certain articles which were to be considered as contraband or prohibited: Held, that the exception applied only to importations in time of war.

Goods consisting principally of arms and ammunition were shipped for Madeira, and declared in the manifest. They were insured for the voyage, and specified in the policy. The consignor's agent at Madeira, acting under an impression that the importation of such goods was prohibited, and that he was doing the best for all parties, gave information of the shipment to the authorities; the goods, before they were landed, were seized by the government, and never restored: Held, that the underwriters were liable.—Willbraham vs. Wartnaby, 1 L. & W. 144.

---

LARCENY.

On an indictment for larceny, it appeared that the prisoner having goods in pawn at a pawnbrokers, took other goods of greater value than those pawned, for the purpose of redeeming those already pawned and borrowing further sums; instead of giving the goods which he had shewn to the pawn-broker's servant, he substituted other goods of less value, sealed up in a parcel similar to that in which the goods before shewn, were contained, and received the things first pawned in exchange. Held, that the receipt of the latter pledged by the pawner is not larceny.—Rex vs. Jackson, 1 Ry. & M. 119.

Obtaining a parcel from a carrier's servant, by falsely pretending to be the person to whom it is directed, if taken animo furandi, is a larceny.—Rex vs. Longstreeth, 1 Ry. & M. 137.

If a postman deliver a letter to the wrong person, who receives it supposing it to belong to himself, and on finding that it does not, appropriates money contained in the letter to himself, this does not amount to larceny, there being no animus furandi, when the letter was first received.—Rex vs. Mucklow, 1 Ry. & M. 160.

Where a prisoner had prevailed on a tradesman to bring goods, which he proposed to buy, to a given place, and promised that they should then be paid for: and further prevailed on the tradesman to leave the goods with a third person, and afterwards obtained them from that third person, without paying the price: this was held to be a felonious taking, if ab initio the prisoner's intention was to get the goods into his possession, and not to pay for them.—Rex vs. Campbell, 1 Ry. & M. 179, and Rex vs. Pratt, Id. 250.

If a person take goods which he has agreed to buy, and which he did not intend at the time to pay for, but meant to get them into his possession, and dispose of them for his own benefit without paying for them; the taking will be deemed felonious.—Rex vs. Gilbert, 1 Ry. & M. 185.

If a man take away goods, jointly with the owner's wife, it may be a larceny in the man, notwithstanding the consent and assistance of the wife.—Rex vs. Tolfree, 1 Ry. & M. 243.

RECENT AMERICAN DECISIONS.

BILL OF EXCHANGE AND PROMISSORY NOTE.

1. Where I, an endorser of a protested bill, after having had sufficient opportunity to ascertain the circumstances of the presentment, protest, and notice, promised M, a subsequent indorser who had taken up the bill, to repay him, and afterwards received the bill from M, proved it in his own name against the estate of the drawees who had failed, and received a dividend upon it, and retained the bill; it was held, that I was liable on this promise to repay M, unless he could prove that his promise was made under a mistake of the facts. Martin vs. Ingersoll. 8 Pick, 1

2. During the Christmas holidays vessels are not allowed to clear out at the Havana; it seems therefore, that during the continuance of the holidays, it is not necessary to write a notice of the dishonor of a bill, to be sent to a foreign port. Ibid.

3. The maker of a note, who has been committed to jail on execution on a judgment in favor of the holder, but has not paid the note, is still liable to be sued by an endorser who pays the amount of the note to the holder; and the suit of the endorser may be brought while the maker is still in jail in the prior suit. Cole vs. Cushing. 48

4. An action for money had and received may be maintained by the endorsee of a note against the maker, although the note was signed by the maker merely for the accommodation of the payee, and the maker never received either money or any other consideration for signing it. Ibid.

5. Where the holder of a note with several endorsers in blank, sues the maker and writes over the name of the first endorser an order to pay it to himself, the holder, but without striking out the names of the subsequent endorsers, he does not thereby discharge them; and therefore one of them who pays the amount of the note to the holder, may sue any of the prior parties. Ibid.

6. A bill of exchange, which was endorsed by C of New Orleans, and was payable in Boston, was owned by T of New York. The bill was dishonored by non-acceptance August 11, and H, who was T's agent at Boston, wrote to T by mail the same day, informing him of the dishonor of the bill. T, by an answer dated August 13, requested H to give the notices. H accordingly had the notice to C put into the mail at Boston, August 19. Held, that the notice was not seasonable, even if T was justifiable in sending to H, instead of sending notice himself directly from New York to New Orleans. Talbot vs. Clark. 51

7. It seems, that T was bound to send notice direct from New York to New Orleans. Ibid.

8. In an action by the holder of a bill of exchange against an endorser, a subsequent endorser, is not a competent witness to charge the defendant, without a release from the plaintiff. Ibid.

9. The defendant, a merchant in the country, directs the plaintiff, his correspondent in England, to purchase goods and to draw for the price on a banker in London; who also authorizes the plaintiff to draw. The plaintiff, having similar orders from other persons, purchases goods in his own name for them and for the defendant indiscriminately. On the 30th of July he draws a bill in his own name at three months' payable on account of the defendant. The bill is drawn on account generally, in payment for several parcels of goods, and not in payment for goods purchased for the defendant; the defendant however being indebted to the plaintiff to the amount of the bill for goods already sent to him. The banker accepts the bill, having then in his hands only a small balance due to the defendant, but in September he receives funds beyond the amount of the bill. A few days before the 2d of November, when the bill falls due, the accepter becomes a bankrupt. On the 26th of November a stranger, through mistake, pays the bill for the honor of a person not a party, claiming however to hold the plaintiff and all the other parties, but no notice of the dishonor is given to the plaintiff. Afterwards the person who paid the bill recovers judgment against the plaintiff upon a default by consent. In an action by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover the price of the goods, it was held, that the plaintiff, having had reason to expect that the bill would be paid by the drawee, was entitled to notice of its dishonor; that he could not waive notice to the prejudice of the defendant; and that the action could not be maintained. Grosvener vs. Stone. 79

10. A judgment in an action against the endorser of a note in his favor, on a verdict which was rendered on the ground that the action had been brought before notice was given to him, is no bar to another action commenced after notice was given; and consequently such judgment is no bar to a suit in equity brought against the endorser and his assignees in order to enable the plaintiff to obtain the benefit of the assignment. New England Bank vs. Lewis. 113

11. Where a note is made by A payable to B and endorsed by C at the time it is made, C becomes a promiser on the note, and may be declared against as such. Baker vs. Briggs. 122

12. It seems, that from the form of the note, without any other evidence, C will be regarded as surety to A. Ibid.

13. In an action by B against C as a promiser of such a note, the declarations and admissions of A are not admissible against C, for A is himself a competent witness. Ibid.

14. A bill of exchange was drawn in Boston, by J. R. B. on H. & Co. of Richmond, who accepted it for the accommodation of the drawer, and on his engagement to place funds in New York, where the bill was payable, to meet it at its maturity. The bill was endorsed by the plaintiff, also for the accommodation of the drawer, with a knowledge of all the circumstances, and he advised the drawer to adopt this mode of raising money. The drawer having failed and assigned his property for the benefit of his creditors, before the bill became payable, it was dishonored and returned to Boston, where it had been discounted for the drawer, and where the plaintiff took it up as endorser. The assignment provided for indemnifying the plaintiff against all endorsements made by him on account of the drawer, and there were funds in the hands of the assignees to which he could resort for the payment of the bill. Held, that the acceptors were exonerated, and that the holders must resort to the funds in the hands of the assignees, for payment of the bill. Bradford vs. Hubbard. 155

15. Held, also that the recovery by the acceptors, in a process of foreign attachment commenced for their indemnity of a sum of money due to the drawer, but which was subject in their hands to the control of a court of equity in Virginia, did not affect the case. Ibid.

16. A covenant by the payee of a promissory note not to sue the maker within a limited time, cannot be pleaded in bar to an action brought within the time by a person to whom the note was endorsed after it became due. Perkins vs. Gilman 229

18. Two notes dated in October and falling due in January and February following, were endorsed by the defendant, who was an Englishman, a master mariner and an unmarried man, having no home in this country, and, when in England, residing in Liverpool. On the 12th of December he wrote from Boston to the holder at Providence, that he should leave Boston in a day or two for Liverpool, but in fact he remained in Boston till the middle of March. The holder did not know of this fact nor of his residing in Liverpool, and sent no notice to him of the dishonor of the bill; neither did it appear that the holder made an inquiries for his residence. Held, that due diligence had not been used to give notice to the endorser. Hodges vs. Galt. 251

18. A promissory note given to a creditor, is not payment of the previous debt, where it is not intended as such by the parties. Watkins vs. Hill. 522

CONTRACT.

1. An indenture whereby a party agrees to furnish money for the purpose of 'carrying on the general business of brokerage, embracing, as time and opportunity shall give, the vending of lottery tickets,' is illegal on the face of it. Williams vs. Woodman. 8 Pick. 78

2. Assumpsit on the following memorandum, viz. 'It is agreed that B is to have the refusal of a certain farm situated &c, which was bought by me for the sum of 1940 dollars upon his complying with certain conditions from the first day of April next, which conditions the aforesaid B has complied with.' Held, that this was a valid contract, and that it expressed the price for which the land was to be conveyed. Bird vs. Richardson. 252

3. Where an agreement, signed by three persons, was afterwards altered by the consent of two of them, by adding seals to the names of the signers, and interlining the words 'jointly and severally,' and was afterwards delivered by those two, it was held, that the alteration did not vitiate the instrument with regard to those two, but they were bound by the instrument in its altered form. Warring vs. Williams. 322

4. A and B having been partners, A gave an obligation to B to indemnify B against a note on which C was promiser, C having become so merely as surety for A and B; C afterwards advanced money to B, with which B paid the note. Held, that A was liable to B on the obligation, for the amount of the note paid by B. Ibid.

5. If A sign his name on a paper in blank, and by parol authorize B to write an agreement of a certain description over his name, he will be bound by such agreement when written over his name by B. But if B add a seal to the name of A, and deliver the instrument as A's deed, A will not be bound. Warring vs. Williams. 326

6. Where a promissory note payable in machine cards at cash price, was made to a person who was afterwards put under guardianship, and the guardian assigned to the plaintiff 'the balance which may be due on the note after deducting what may be due to one H. not exceeding 500 dollars,' the note being then in the hands of one F. pledged for the payment of H's debt, and the guardian guarantied to the plaintiff 'the payment of the note according to its tenor, after deducting the claim of H, which shall not exceed 500 dollars,' it was held, in an action upon the guarantee, that if H. had lost his lien, still the plaintiff's claim under the guarantee was not thereby augmented, for only the balance after the amount due to H, was assigned and guarantied to the plaintiff. Carew vs. Denny. 363.

7. Held, also, that the assignment and guarantee did not include a sum which had been previously paid and endorsed upon the note, there having been no fraudulent concealment on the part of the guardian, of such endorsement. Ibid.

8. Held, also, that H's demand, not exceeding 500 dollars, was to be paid in money, so that although cards of more than 500 dollars' worth at the appraised cash price were sold to produce that sum, only the balance of cards remaining due on the note was assigned and guarantied. Ibid.

9. Such balance having been accepted by the plaintiff, of the maker of the note, it was held, that if there was any fraud as to the quality, the guardian was not responsible for it, it being the duty of the plaintiff to examine the cards. Ibid.

10. Where the plaintiffs agreed to perform work for the defendant upon a canal, and the defendant agreed to make payments 'from time to time by certificates from the engineer as the work advances,' it was held, that the plaintiffs might bring an action without having given notice to the defendant of a certificate previously made, each party being bound to take notice. Pinderson vs. Shepherd. 379.

11. The defendant gives the plaintiffs a written contract, by which, after reciting that he places his son with the plaintiffs to learn the art of printing, 'to stay till he is twentyone years of age,' the defendant agrees, 'in consideration of the son's being so old' (he was then eighteen), to pay the plaintiff a stipulated amount if the son does not continue in the plaintiffs' employment six months after he is twentyone. The son enters into the plaintiffs' employment in pursuance of the agreement, and is instructed by the plaintiffs in the art of printing, for some months, when he leaves the plaintiffs without cause. Held, that there was a sufficient consideration for the defendant's contract and that he was liable on it to the plaintiffs. Phelps vs. Townsend. 392.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1830.

CRABBE'S HISTORY OF ENGLISH LAW.

A great many of the topics of inquiry usually embraced in Histories of English Law, as they have been and are, for aught that appears, likely to continue to be written, have become matters of patient antiquarian research rather than profitable investigation to the Student at Law.

The field is wide and fruitful in material to those who feel inclined to enter it either for the gratification of the curious, or for the purpose of preserving, in the recollections of the judicial scholars of the present age, the specimens of skilful and refined logic, of subtle and abstruse disquisitions which pervade the early cases in law and equity—or with the hope of raising a monument to departed and obsolete Law. But one would suppose it had been so often gleaned that the harvest which the most industrious could gather and beat out would hardly pay the labor. It has never yielded a fruitage of very grateful or nutritious character—or been like a 'vintage of showering grapes.'

To every body but Lawyers the subject has always been repulsive and uninviting. And their attention, especially on this side of the Atlantic, has been drawn to it more from the necessity imposed on them of comprehending, in some degree, the spirit and reason of some portions of this early system of Jurisprudence, than from the attractiveness or interest of the study.

The very annunciation with which all the writers on this subject set out, from Fortescue down, and the object which they avow, as their purpose to accomplish, viz.—to shew that the English 'Laws are not only all good, but the very best,' strikes the reader with such a conviction of hopelessness in the task, as to lead him to forego the labor of accompanying them through the attempt. They seem to think it necessary to begin their commentary or history by assuming or asserting that their Law is the richer for its mixed and dissimilar character; wiser for its continual additions, accretions and mutations from Saxon, Dane and Norman Codes; freer and more liberal from the introduction and incorporation of the arbitrary principles of the civil law—the Bulls of the Holy See, and the decrees and opinions of ancient, but not always wise Ecclesiastics; in short as the perfection of reason two hundred years ago and improving ever since. These persevering attempts to find a sound reason for everything in the English code, to shew that wisdom is at the bottom of the well, and to try to draw it up—are no less absurd than hopeless. If we are never to know their law till we know the reason thereof, we may as well give up the pursuit now as ever. The universal sentiment of men has passed its disapproving sentence upon many of its doctrines, and will upon more, and justly. It is not altogether that the times or the Law have changed. New directions have been given to the pursuits of men, and, of course, new applications of the principles of the ancient law have been made; but those principles remain. It is the false covering which has been cast off—the perverse construction which has been abandoned, the abuses which have been corrected.

We believe a much more useful service would be performed by those who attempt historically to illustrate the Law, if, instead of carrying their readers, step by step, through all the changes, revolutions and diversities thereof, from the Confessor down to the last of the Tudors, they would be at the pains of embodying the principles of Jurisprudence now operative and in force, in some tangible form and within moderate dimensions.

If they find no better era, let them start with Sir Edward Coke as the connecting link between the ancient and modern Law. Let them gather up and assort the wise maxims, the learned decisions and the sound doctrines of the old jurists; and running down in 'the clear and bright paths' of modern Law, which have been illuminated by the full illustrations and profound discussions of later, and more liberal and cultivated minds—give us a digested summary of the innovations, modifications and changes which have been introduced.

In a volume of nearly 600 pages which Mr Crabbe has published under the title of a History of the English Law, six pages only are allotted to the Reigns of the four last Kings. We believe we may safely assert that a greater advance in Jurisprudence by legislative and judicial labors has taken place during the short reign of Geo. IV. then was made under the auspices of all their Majesties from Alfred to the Edwards. Mr Crabbe might safely enough have left the three or four first lines of Kings to Mr Justice Blackstone, Sir Mathew Hale and Mr Reeves. Who cares to read a Chapter of 40 pages octavo upon the Saxon Laws, and the various learned disputes, therewith connected, about feudal tenures, hundreds, tithings and wapentakes?

As little instructive and useful is a great portion of the historical materials, between the earliest dates and the time of the falsely styled English Justinian. The march of the Science of Law like that of Civil Liberty was slow. The fault lay as much with the people as the Sovereign. Kings have generally been willing to give as a boon what they could no longer withhold as a right. The English people in the earliest times, we are inclined to think, made as great advance toward the confirmation of their liberties as they could bear, and enjoyed as much freedom as they knew how to use wisely.

It would seem to be going back far enough for illustration or useful research, if the legal historian, who writes for the present age, would begin where we fix the boundaries of human memory—or at the time, whereof, in the language of the Law, the memory of man runneth not to the contrary.

That would be giving up, at once, a little short of 1000 years of unsubstantial and shadowy lucubrations; and we should hardly then have approached the point of breaking day.

We do not believe the public would have been the loser if Mr Crabbe had jumped this period altogether. Not much, we think, is gained by way of confirmation of modern law, or on the score of legal learning, by going very far behind Sir Edward's text and commentary. What that great man neglected to collect or thought unworthy of a place in his immense repository of legal learning may as well be omitted by us. It would be some satisfaction to know where we started, if we may not where we are to end our career. The eye is dazzled by the indistinct and general glimmer. We would gladly fix on some visible point of concentration. We would bring the lights now scattered and drawn out in such a lengthened and interminable line, within the eye's range; and turn their combined illumination upon some reasonably limited period of time.

We should be rejoiced to feel assured that, in our own time, while we are walking in the ancient and settled ways of the Law, we are also yielding ourselves to the guidance of the 'gladsome light' of modern, and more liberal Jurisprudence.

ERROR. On page 108 of this day's paper, in case of Hunloke vs. Gell, in the 4th line, after 'to the' should be added 'power, disposed of the.'

RECENT ENGLISH PUBLICATIONS.

Principles of Conveyancing, designed for the use of Students. With an Introduction on the Study of that Branch of Law. By Charles Watkins, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister at Law. The seventh edition, with the Author's last Corrections, and with very considerable Additions, and a copious Index. By Richard Preston, Esq., Barrister at Law.

GRAY AND BOWEN, No. 141, Washington Street, Boston, have recently published the following valuable works.

I. A DESCRIPTION OF TREMONT HOUSE; WITH ARCHITECTURAL ILLUSTRATIONS.—4to.

'Jam scires ab introitu primo—herculentum et amvenum videre et diversonium.' APULEIUS, M. A V.

This work is embellished with a copper-plate engraving, representing the front of the house, and thirty lithographic prints, exhibiting the details of the structure. Its object will be understood by the following extract from the preface.

'The present publication is intended to satisfy a curiosity, which frequent inquiries for a description of Tremont House were supposed to indicate.

'Its original plan was to furnish such particulars relative to this establishment as strangers might wish to possess, but it has been extended so as to comprehend many architectural details, which will probably be interesting to mechanics; as much of the ornamental work of Tremont House was copied or adopted from books, not commonly in their hands, and has not before been executed in this country.

II. AN EPITOME OF UNIVERSAL GEOGRAPHY; or, a Description of the various Countries of the Globe; with a view of their Political Condition at the present time. With sixty Maps. By NATHAN HALE.

III. A DICTIONARY OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE; or, an Explanation of Words and Things connected with all the Arts and Sciences. Illustrated with numerous Wood Cuts. By GEORGE CRABB, A. M., Author of 'English Synonymes,' 'Technological Dictionary,' and 'Historical Dictionary.'

IV. THE VESTAL—A TALE OF POMPEII. 1 Vol. 12mo.

'Oh Time, thou beautifier of the dead,
Adorner of the ruin.' CHILDE HAROLD.

V. AUTHORSHIP. A Tale. By a New Englander over Sea. 1 Vol. 12mo.

VI. AN ORATION; Delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, Cambridge, Mass. August 26th, 1830. By the Rev. ORVILLE DEWEY.

VII. THE DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Published under the Direction of the President of the United States, from the Original Manuscripts in the Department of State, conformably to a resolution of Congress, of March 27, 1818. Edited by JARED SPARKS.

This important Correspondence, now for the first time published, will form eleven volumes. Eight are already published and the remainder will appear very shortly.

VIII. JEFFERSON'S WORKS, In four Volumes. Accompanied with a Portrait on steel, and a fac-simile of the original draft of the Declaration of Independence. Second Edition.

IX. THE NEW TESTAMENT, conformed to Griesbach's Text. 1 Vol. 12mo.

THE TOKEN, a Christmas and New Year's Present, for 1831. Edited by S. G. Goodrich.

'Then take my flower, and let its leaves
Beside thy heart be cherished near,
While that confiding heart receives
The thought it whispers to thine ear.'

The engravings for the Token of this year are executed by Cheney, Ellis, Gallaudet, and others; among the contributors are Dewey, Greenwood, Miss Sedgwick, Mrs Sigourney, Hall, Peabody, Wetmore, author of a Year in Spain, author of Tales of the Northwest, Neal, Thatcher, Mrs Hale, and others of the first reputation.

The work is larger than heretofore, and is done up in splendid embossed morocco. The literary department is considered decidedly superior to the former years, and in all respects it has received the greatest care and attention. Oct 23.

---

BIGELOW'S SUPPLEMENT. HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. have just published A Digest of Pickering's Reports, Volumes 2—7, being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports.—By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law. Oct. 23.

---

PICKERING'S REPORTS, Vol. 8th. This day published and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. Oct. 23.

---

This day received by GRAY & BOWEN, 141 Washington Street.

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW, No XXV. for July 1830.

Contents: 1, The Ballot: 2, Carwell: 3, Government of Lower Canada: 4, Wilson's life of Daniel de Foe: 5, Greek Lexicons: 6, Physiology and Cultivation of Trees: 7, Game of Life: 8, Dobell's Siberia: 9, Bishop of London and Sabbath Breaking: 10, Three Courses and a Dessert: 11, Clarendon: 12, Moorsom's Nova Scotia: 13, Religious Disabilities: 14, Stamp Act and Synod of Somerset House: 15, Patronage of Art, and the President of the Royal Academy: 16, Distress of the Country: 17, Egyptian Notation: 18, Great Britain and France: Postscript to the Article on the Ballot.

The Westminster Review has existed long enough, to see the cause in which its efforts were begun, make a notable advance in the opinions of mankind. Its proposed object was to prove, that the interests which were supposed confined to the wretched and weak, are in reality those of all ranks and orders in the state; and if the course has been successfully shaped, it is unnecessary to discuss what portion of the progress has been consequent on the efforts of the rowers, and what on the general tide which carried them upon their way. The term which was once employed as a name of low reproach, has found its way into high places, and is gone forth as the title of a class, who glory in their designation, and are not afraid to speak with their enemies in the gate. Like the early Christians, they may say to their opponents—Hesterni sumus, et vestra omnia implevimus, urbes, insulas, castella, municipa, concilabula, castra ipsa, tribus, decurias, palatium, senatum, forum.—They cannot even add the Sola vobis, relinquimus templa. What has been gained by reason, will never be wittingly abused; and it will be fame enough for common men, if what they have hitherto defended they hereafter can assist. Oct. 23.

---

DANE'S ABRIDGMENT OF AMERICAN LAW, in 9 vols. with an appendix. A few complete sets for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. H., G. & Co. will also supply the ninth vol. and the appendix to those who are owners of the eight volumes, and the appendix separate to those who have the ninth. Oct. 23.

---

ENGLISH LAW BOOKS. This day received and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & Co.

Browne's Chancery Practice, under the New Orders with the Sanction of the Court, in 2 vols. 8 vo.

Willoch on the Laws of the Medical Profession, 1 vol. 8 vo.

Finelly's Law aud Practice of Elections, 1 vol. 12 mo.

Crabbe's History of the English Law, 1 vol. 8 vo.

Oct. 23.

---

PRINTING. The Printing House of I. R. BUTTS, corner of Washington and School Streets, is supplied with materials suitable for Book, Job, and every other description of Printing. Oct. 23.

---

DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS, TO WIT: District Clerk's Office.

BE it remembered, that on the seventeenth day of August, A. D. 1830, in the fiftyfifth year of the Independence of the United States of America, Lewis Bigelow of the said district, has deposited in this office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as author in the words following, to wit:

'A Digest of Pickering's Reports, volumes II.—VII., being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law.'

In conformity to the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned;' and also to an act entitled, 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled, 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned,' and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints.'

JNO. W. DAVIS, Clerk of the District of Massachusetts.

---

GRAY & BOWEN, have in preparation, and will very shortly put to press,

A NEW DICTIONARY OF MEDICAL SCIENCE AND LITERATURE; which will contain a concise account of the various subjects in Anatomy, Physiology, Pathology, Therapeutics, Materia Medica, Surgery, Obstetrics, and Pharmacy, with the Etymology and Orthoepy of the terms of their Greek, Latin, French, and German synonymes;—a copious Bibliography appended to the different articles, and Biographical Notices of the most eminent Authors in the different departments of Medical Science, with a Catalogue of their principal works mentioned and an Epitome of the existing state of Medical Science and Literature. By Robley Dunglison, M. D. Professor of Medicine in the University of Virginia &c, &c.

While many of the nations of Continental Europe possess Dictionaries, which have kept pace with the advancing condition of Medical Science, Great Britain and America possess it may be said, but one of a concise character,—that of Hooper,—which independently of its want of accuracy on many points, is incontestibly far behind the present state of Medical Science and Literature, and unfit for the purposes of the Medical Student. In proof of this, it will be sufficient to remark, that the New Dictionary will contain at least five thousand words more than are to be found in that publication,—while the circumstance of the Dictionary of Hooper being stereotyped in this country, renders it impracticable to make the necessary additions to it, were the ground work such as to render such a course advisable.

The work will not be a mere Dictionary of terms; it will comprise concise histories of diseases: a description and doses of various kinds of medicine, with formula for the different Pharmacentrical preparations, &c, &c.

The important publications daily appearing in France and Germany, have induced the author to add the French and German synonymes to the various terms; so that the work will really contain the substance of an English, French and German Dictionary, at a comparatively trifling expense.—The French Index will be found to include every word in the 'Dictionaire des Science Medicales,' which consists of sixty volumes, as well as in the smaller Dictionaries more recently published.

Great attention has been, moreover, paid to the Greek and Latin synonymes, so that the Dictionary will, it is trusted, form a safe and convenient guide to the study of ancient and modern authors on Medicine.

It will be comprised in one large volume, 8vo. Oct. 23.

---

HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. No 134 Washington Street, Boston, have in press a Trearise on Corporations, with an appendix of the Corporation acts of each state, by Joseph K. Angell, author of a Treatise on Water Courses, Tide Water, Limitations, &c. Oct. 23.

---

LAW BOOKS.—HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. 134 Washington Street, have on hand a large Stock of American and English Law Books, comprising a complete assortment of the best editions of all works in general use. They also purchase and sell second hand Law Books—terms liberal.

H., G. & Co. supply any volumes that may be wanted of Massachusetts or Pickering's Reports.

---

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of administering and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire: and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Price $1,25.

---

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. This day published by HILLIARD, GRAY, & Co. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law: being a continuation of the Digest of Massachusetts Reports; and also a continuation of Metcalf's Digest of the same work. Neatly bound in Sheep,3,50.—Calf, $4,00

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1830. NO. XV.

MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE.

INSANITY.

Continued.

James Hatfield was indicted and tried in Westminster Hall, in the year 1800, before a special commission, for having on the 15th of May then last 'maliciously and traitorously encompassed, imagined, and intended to put the king to death, by buying and procuring a certain quantity of gunpowder and leaden bullets, with which he loaded a pistol; and having so armed himself, repaired to Drury Lane Theatre, and there discharged the same at the person of the king.'

These facts were fully proved. But it appeared that he had some years before received several almost deadly wounds on the head in the field of battle; that since that time he had been liable to violent accesses of delirium, sometimes fancying himself God or Jesus Christ, and at others venting the most horrible blasphemies against the divine persons. That he had long entertained the opinion that the public and solemn sacrifice of his own life was necessary for the salvation of mankind, and occasionally imagined himself called upon to destroy others, even his own child, by divine injunctions.

Mr Erskine, who conducted the defence with more than his usual ability, endeavored to show that there was no intention on the prisoner's part of taking the King's life, but only of appearing to attempt it to insure his own condemnation. In this the learned advocate was, perhaps, not entirely successful; but he principally insisted that it must be considered an insane action at all events, as produced by an imaginary belief of a commission from God. It was, he contended, the unreal nature of the causes leading to the act, that so advantageously distinguished this case from those of Earl Ferrars, Arnold, the assassin of Lord Onslow, and others who, when they committed their several crimes, were actuated thereto by circumstances really existing, and could not therefore be esteemed the victims of any mental delusion. This was certainly an over-statement, at least as far as Earl Ferrars was concerned. For it does not at all appear, from the evidence given on his trial, that Johnson had really injured him, but only that having failed, in punishment for some supposed injuries, to expel the man from his farm, he then resolved on a more barbarous revenge. Nor is it quite evident that Hatfield, because he conceived his own public execution necessary for the preservation of the human race, must therefore justify to himself the murder of the King, as the proper means of insuring that event. But we must do the orator the justice of exhibiting his subtle distinction, as illustrated by himself. After alluding to the cases above mentioned, he continues:—'There was another instance of this description in the case of a most unhappy woman, who was tried in Essex for the murder of Mr Errington, who had seduced and abandoned her and the children she had borne him. It must be a consolation to those who prosecuted her that she was acquitted, as she is at this time in a most undoubted and deplorable state of insanity; but I confess, if I had been on the jury who tried her, I should have entertained great doubts and difficulties: for although the unhappy woman had before exhibited strong marks of insanity, arising from grief and disappointment, yet she acted upon facts and circumstances which had an existence, and which were calculated, upon the ordinary principles of human action to produce the most violent resentment. Mr Errington having cast her off and married another woman, or taken her under his protection, her jealousy was excited to such a pitch as occasionally to disorder her understanding; but when she went to Mr Errington's house where she shot, she went with the express purpose of shooting him. That fact was unquestionable; she went with resentment long rankling in her bosom, bottomed on an existing foundation; she did not act under a delusion that he had deserted her, when he had not, but took revenge upon him for an actual desertion.'*

We have heretofore stated our conviction that cases of dubious insanity must oftentimes occur, where no judge or jury can be certain of deciding rightly. In this opinion we are borne out by Beck, Male, Foderè, and many other distinguished names; and we may here add the authority of Erskine. Enumerating the various species of madness, he observes:—'Another class, branching out into almost infinite subdivisions, is where the delusions are not of frightful character, but infinitely various, and often extremely circumscribed; yet, where imagination (within the bounds of the malady) still holds the most uncontrollable dominion over reality and fact; and these are the cases which frequently mock the wisdom of the wisest in judicial trials, because such persons often reason with a subtlety which puts in the shade the ordinary conceptions of mankind, their conclusions are just and frequently profound, but the premises from which they reason, when within the range of the malady, are uniformly false—not false from any defect of knowledge or judgment, but because a delusive image, the inseparable companion of real insanity, is thrust upon the subjugated understanding, incapable of resistance, because unconscious of attack.'

The trial of Bellingham for the murder of Mr Perceval,—Sir Vicary Gibbs, Attorney General, and Mr Garrow, being counsel for the crown, does not seem to have exhibited that indulgence towards the prisoner, which usually characterises the administration of our criminal law. Mr Alley, on the prisoner's behalf, contended for a postponement of the trial, to allow for procuring evidence of his insanity. He supported the claim by the affidavits of two persons, both declaring the assassin to be unsound of mind, and to have been so since his return from Russia, some two years before. One of these, on hearing of the deed, had hastened to London to give her testimony, influenced as it would seem by nothing else than her entire persuasion of Bellingham's infirmity. But neither had seen him within the last four months. It was therefore objected on the other side, that were he really insane, persons would have been found to come forward and aver it, who had seen and known him during his recent residence in London, and on this ground further delay was refused, and the prisoner, of course, executed. Now granting, as his advocates maintained, that Bellingham was insane only on one topic, namely his imprisonment in Russia, it does not appear at all necessary, that he should have betrayed his weakness to indifferent persons, who never perhaps happened to approach his weak point in conversation, during the four months that he had led a solitary life in London. Nor does it seem quite clear to us what terrible evil could have resulted from a trifling delay, sufficient for collecting witnesses from remote parts of England, although the Attorney General was pleased to remark, that it was 'clearly a contrivance to delay the administration of justice, and that these witnesses were purposely selected, to impose upon the Court a false belief; so that neither the justice of the present case, nor the general purposes of justice, could be answered; upon the contrary, they would be grossly violated, if their Lordships consented to the procrastination proposed.'*

It now becomes our task to consider those cases where mental infirmity has been made the subject of commissions of lunacy. Various, indeed, are the forms of distraction which the mind puts on, often quite harmless in their nature, and provoking in the looker-on a melancholy mirth, yet all liable to elicit strange accesses of violence, if the sufferer be crossed or contradicted in his peculiar fancy. There is no source of insanity more prolific, than an overweening self-esteem. Indeed, egotism enters largely into nearly every case of a mild description. Instances must be present to the mind of every reader, of individuals suffered to go at large in the world, whose excessive admiration of themselves stops little short of madness, and is at least a most complete and unconquerable delusion. Under the influence of this feeling maniacs frequently imagine that their corporeal as well as mental proportions are vastly dilated, that they cannot pass through doors, or be contained in rooms of moderate size. Zimmerman does, however, mention one solitary instance of a lunatic so overwhelmed by his ideal littleness, that he believed himself a barley-corn, and dreaded going out of doors, lest he should be picked up by a sparrow.† But superhuman power and grandeur make up the ordinary pageant of a madman's dream; he holds colloquies with kings and gods alone, and is a king or god himself. Yet on all subjects, not involving his personal importance, he is often thoroughly rational and composed. Lord Erskine, in his defence of Hatfield, gave a curious example of this fact. In the former part of that speech, he says, 'I examined for the greater part of a day, in this very place, (the King's Bench) an unfortunate gentleman who had indicted a most affectionate brother, together with the keeper of a madhouse at Hoxton, for having imprisoned him as a lunatic; while, according to his own evidence, he was in his perfect senses. I was unfortunately, not instructed in what his lunacy consisted, although my instructions left me no doubt of the fact; but not having the clue, he completely foiled me in every attempt to expose his infirmity. You may believe, that I left no means unemployed which long experience dictated, but without the smallest effect. The day was wasted, and the prosecutor, by the most affecting history of unmerited suffering, appeared to the judge and jury, and to a humane English audience, as the victim of the most wanton oppression; at last Dr Sims came into court, who had been prevented by business from an earlier attendance. From him I soon learned that the very man, whom I had been above an hour examining, and with every possible effort which counsel were so much in the habit of exerting, believed himself to be the Lord and Saviour of mankind, not merely at the time of his confinement, which was alone necessary for my defence, but during the whole time he had been triumphing over every attempt to surprise him in the concealment of his disease. I then affected to lament the indecency of my ignorant examination, when he expressed his forgiveness, and said, with the utmost gravity and emphasis, in the face of the whole court, "I am the Christ!" and so the cause ended.'

* Erskine's Miscellaneous Speeches. See a different account of this case in Collinson on Lunacy, vol. i. p. 493.

* Collinson on Lunacy, vol. i. Addendum.

† Reid's Essay on Insanity.

The subtlety of lunatics, in avoiding the exposure of their weakness, is further illustrated in the same speech, as follows. It is told by Erskine, in Lord Mansfield's own words:—'A man of the name of Wood had indicted Dr Monro for keeping him as a prisoner when he was sane. He underwent the most severe examination by the defendant's counsel, without exposing his complaint; but Dr Baillie having come upon the bench by me (Lord Mansfield,) and having desired me to ask him what was become of the Princess, with whom he had corresponded in cherry-juice, he showed in a moment what he was. He answered, that there was nothing at all in that, because having been (as everybody knew) imprisoned in a high tower, and being debarred the use of ink, he had no other means of correspondence, but by writing his letters in cherry-juice, and throwing them into the river which surrounded the tower, where the Princess received them in a boat. There existed, of course, no tower, no imprisonment, no writing in cherry-juice, no river, no boat, but the whole was the inveterate fancy of a morbid imagination. I immediately,' continued Lord Mansfield, 'directed Dr Monro to be acquitted; but this man, Wood, being a merchant in Philpot-lane, and having been carried through the city on his way to the madhouse, indicted Dr Munro over again for the trespass and imprisonment in London, knowing that he had lost his cause by speaking of the Princess at Westminster; and such,' said Lord Mansfield, 'is the extraordinary subtlety and cunning of madmen, that when he was cross-examined on the trial in London, as he had successfully been before, in order to expose his madness, all the ingenuity of the bar, and all the authority of the court, failed to draw from him a single syllable upon that topic, which had put an end to the indictment before, although he had still the same indelible impression upon his mind, as he had signified to those who were near him; but conscious that the delusion had occasioned his defeat at Westminster, he obstinately persisted in holding it back.'

The main difficulty of inquiries in the nature of a commission of lunacy, is not so much to ascertain whether the party be of unsound mind, but whether the unsoundness be of such a nature as to render him incapable of managing his own affairs.—Without the jury find this, as Lord Eldon has very correctly laid down, they do not find enough to justify the lunatic's confinement. We have an evidence of the importance of this doctrine in some recent cases which have attracted the attention of the public. A dispassionate jury has just decided that Mr Davies was capable of administering his own concerns, although the witnesses brought forward upon the inquiry doubtless went far to shew that his general conduct was such as to warrant a suspicion of some occasional mental derangement. It was, however, proved at the same time, that he was not merely competent, but skilful in the conduct of his peculiar business; and on this ground, the jury, aided by the masterly argument of Mr Brougham, and the self-possession of the party himself, when subjected to a severe cross-examination, returned that verdict which declared him equal to the administration of his extensive business. On the other hand, a late example will occur to the recollection of our readers, where all attempts to demonstrate the general incapacity of an individual proved entirely unavailing, although it appeared that he was addicted to acts of extravagance, more especially in the purchase of worthless pictures, quite inconsistent with our conceptions of a rational mind. In the former case the inquisition failed, because no evidence was given of incapability for transacting the ordinary affairs of life; in the latter, because the proof of extravagance was rightly deemed insufficient to justify consigning the unhappy subject to the care of a keeper, and the miseries of a lunatic asylum.

[To be continued.]

---

For the Jurisprudent.

Mr Editor—The opprobrium with which the practice of the Law has in all ages been viewed, has in every period of legal history been found not altogether unfounded. It has arisen in part from the inadequacy of the common law to meet the just administration of justice; from defective codes of written laws; from that fallacy of human reason which is a quality of Jurisprudence in general, which presupposes the fitness of general rules to apply to every supposable case; and partly to the improper and nefarious practice of its professors. No profession is indeed exempt from unworthy members; and when in a venal age corruption and self-interest taint the character of those, to whom are confided the sacred trusts of administering law and equity to a large community; when the instruments by which the rights and liberties of the citizen are promoted or abused, from their elevated situation possess an influence, beyond the control of the legislature, it becomes a reflecting people to resort to such methods of relief as may be suggested by the experience of other countries equally enlightened, who have availed themselves of the wisdom and experience of their statesmen and civilians. It has become almost a proverb, that the law in its practice is as much an art as a science, and the noviciate in its mysteries in the present age, when he views the loaded shelves of the tutor, may reasonably shudder at the sight of what he will have to encounter, if he does not despond—and should he lament the choice of a profession, of the least of the labors and hardships of which (the mastery and acquisition of a complete library) he could have had a superficial acquaintance, would not be censured. When, before a very learned Judge of the last century, in the hearing of a cause, the first volume of a work was cited, of which we have now the 'thirtieth,' such was his surprise at the publication of a new work of reports, that with amazement he exclaimed, 'What, another new Book! What shall we do by and by!' Can we imagine what would have been his apprehensions had he lived to view the libraries of lawyers of the present day?

It is pleasing to discern through the mist of that love of the English Jurisprudence, which modern critics have with aptness termed the relics of the barbarous ages, a translucent gleam, which promises much relief, not to the community at large only, but to the professors of the science. The late reports of the Commissioners upon the subject of Law Reform have exhibited how susceptible the present practice is of improvement; and with what an unsparing hand the intricate mazes of special pleading may be abolished, without prejudice to the rights of the government and the individual. Perhaps in no prior age could this improvement have been introduced with such effect and safety. It seems to be with peculiar fitness that the period has been chosen—like that of Lord Bacon when he refuted the metaphysics of the schools—when the development of great minds shall have discovered in what chaotic darkness we have been groping, and how easily the mist may be dissipated. As a discipline of the mind, next to the mathematics, the system of special pleading may be ranked and be admired from the depth of reasoning which its structure discovers. But, in sober earnest, we would inquire whether, by the rigid adherence to technical rules which it enforces, much injustice and injury has not been done, and whether its utility is not in a measure counterpoised by the abuse to which it is continually exposed: whether many suitors, who have lost their causes and their fortunes, upon a demurrer or special plea, can understand the reason of their loss, or feel any alleviation to their misfortune by being apprised that the merits of their case have been entirely out of the question?

The rules of evidence, in the present contemplated reform, will remain substantially unchanged, and we know not how they can be amended. But we cannot but greet the suggestions made by the English Commissioners as a singularly fortunate omen of a better, more simple and intelligible practice, and earnestly hope the introduction of the measures recommended in their report, will be protracted to no distant day. In those parts which from their local situation and the necessities of the case, the practice of Federal and State Courts have varied from the common law of England, we have anticipated them, and led the way; and it may be deemed no vanity to presume a hint has been taken from the success and convenience with which our deviations from their path have been attended. But as it regards this country, whose rulers are always willing to profit by the errors and mistakes of other nations, we do hope a similar undertaking will be commenced; and as soon as the experiment has been fairly made in Great Britain, some provision of a similar nature may be adopted. We have many men of eminence and skill, competent to the task, to whose wisdom and prudence the work, however responsible, may be confided, and when we perceive what advantages will result to the poor by the abridgment of unnecessary prolixity, and equally useless expense, the disputes between litigants may be conducted upon more equal justice, the utility and good effect which will attend innovation from old and established errors, will be acknowledged with candor.

Quereus.

SKETCH OF THE PRESENT CHANCELLOR OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Who could have imagined, twenty years ago, that the son of a citizen of Boston, would fill the high and important office of Chancellor of England; or that one in whose veins was a thorough infusion of American and Colonial blood, should take precedence of all the Lords temporal and spiritual, with the exception of his Grace of Canterbury, and be in right of his office, keeper of the King's conscience—visiter of all the hospitals and colleges of the King's foundation—patron of all his Majesty's livings—guardian of all lunatics, infants and idiots, and Speaker of the House of Lords? Yes, so it is.

> 'There is a tide in the affairs of men,
> Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune,—
> A destiny that shapes our ways,
> Rough hew them as we will.'

Of the truth of these two remarks of our great poet, the history of the present chancellor affords pregnant illustration.

John Singleton Copley (Baron Lyndhurst) was born at Boston in America, in 1772. He was the son of John Copley, a painter, of that city; who was esteemed for his virtues, and distinguished by his talents in his profession. Mr Copley, the father of Lord Lyndhurst, married early in life. His lady was a Miss Clark, whose father was a principal merchant at Boston, and agent to the English East India Company for the sale of their teas. Mr Clark acted in this capacity at a time when circumstances rendered it an office critical and hazardous in the extreme. It is needless to advert to the causes of that war, which ended in the complete severment of the United States from the mother country. Suffice it, however, to say, that the exaction of the duties on tea was one of the principal causes of that event; and that the populace of the city of Boston were the first to show the example of seizing the chests arrived in English ships, and throwing them overboard, in order to avoid the payment of duty.

On this occasion the office held by the maternal grandfather of Lord Lyndhurst necessarily exposed him to much odium; and accordingly he with his son-in-law, Mr Copley, determined on quitting the United States, and coming to settle in England as an American Loyalist. Soon after the father of the present Chancellor settled in London, he became a Member of the Academy of Painters, and attracted considerable notice by several works of superior merit, and among others, the Death of Lord Chatham, and the Defence of Gibraltar. Mr Copley, however, soon discovered that portrait-painting, which recommends itself to the personal vanity and the household affections of all mankind, was likely to be a more lucrative avocation than the severer style of historical painting; and to the former he successfully dedicated himself, and gradually rose to fortune and reputation.

At the period of his father's settlement in England, young Copley had arrived at a sufficient age to be already initiated into the elemental branches of education. In the metropolis, however, he was sent to a classical school, at which he remained about seven years; whence, in the year 1793 or 1794, he was sent to Cambridge, and entered of Trinity College, the learned mother of Barrow, Newton, Bentley, and other eminent names. Mr Copley had two distinguished contemporaries at this period, at Trinity,—the one, the celebrated Porson—the other, Mr Farish, afterwards Professor of Chemistry at the University.

In his academical career he greatly distinguished himself, having been one of Smith's mathematical prize-men; and he obtained in the examination for the first degree, the high station of Senior Wrangler, the first having been assigned to Doctor Butler, the present very learned Master of Harrow. Mr Copley took the degree of A. B. in the year 1794. He was then in his 22d year. Having remained some further time at the University, and a vacancy having occurred, the high character of Mr Copley secured to him his election as a Fellow of Trinity, worth about £120 for the first year: the emoluments of Fellows gradually increase till the place is worth £500 or £600 annually. Declining, however, to comply with one of the conditions of his fellowship, namely, that he should take orders, Mr Copley surrendered the honor within the stated time, and, returning to London, entered himself on the books of the Temple, as a student at law. The writer of this sketch has the good fortune to be acquainted with two of Mr Copley's contemporaries at this period. One, Mr Wagget, a gentleman of great professional attainment, and Recorder of Cork; the other, Mr Richard Farrell, assistant barrister for the county of Clare. Both these gentlemen concur in stating, that, at this period, the present Chancellor was ultra liberal in his political opinions, but that he also applied himself to the study of his profession with a vigor and assiduity worthy all commendation.

In 1800, Mr Copley was called to the Bar, and adopted the Common Law branch of the profession. All his contemporaries agree in stating, that, in the early part of his professional life, he was a very industrious and diligent student. He commenced his labors, unostentatiously, in indifferent chambers in Brick Court, and obtained his first brief from Messrs Willet & Co. Mr Copley was afterwards befriended by Mr Murray, an eminent solicitor, and it must be recorded, to his credit, that the first act of his Chancellorship was to appoint Mr Murray's son his principal Secretary. The subject of this sketch never obtained much character as a special pleader; but he has always been allowed to be a man of varied and comprehensive knowledge in his profession, combined with general scholarship and good taste. Mr Copley chose the midland circuit; and on it, as well as at the Sessions, distanced most of his competitors, among the most formidable of whom was the present Mr Leigh Rough.

Thus having obtained a good share of business, without any, aid, save the exercise of his own talents—having no government connexions—and, at this period, being without the expectation of any such patronage, Mr Copley resolved on assuming the coif; and, in Trinity Term, 1813, he was called to the degree of Sergeant at Law. The motto on his rings was appropriate and significant,—Studiis vigilare severis.

Hitherto, (though in good reputation with the public and the solicitors, to the latter of whom, be it remarked, he rendered himself agreeable by his frank and cordial manners) Mr Copley remained unnoticed by his Majesty's Ministers: no great public occasion having presented itself, in which his talents were called into action. The opportunity, however, was not long wanting to bring the Chancellor under the notice of the Ministers; and, like several of his brethren, (among others, Lord Erskine, Sir Vicary Gibbs, and Mr Justice Best) Mr Copley was first known to the Government by his effort in favor of the highest order of criminals—those charged with high treason. Little, however, did the radicals of those days think that the very Wetherell and Copley, whose healths they were toasting at the period of the trial of Watson, Preston, and Co. would so soon after become, the one High-Chancellor, and the other Attorney-General. But as Ophelia says, 'we know what we are, though we know not what we may come to.' Be this as it may, Mr Copley, on the trial of Watson, performed his duty with so much dexterity and tact, though engaged for the prisoner, that Lord Liverpool expressed his satisfaction, and henceforward the Sergeant was marked as one to be promoted. The public and the profession, too, were not less visibly satisfied; and he, who, but a few weeks before the trial of Watson, received a fee of a guinea with thanks, was now sought for by all parties, and briefs began to pour in with a rapidity truly astonishing. Good fortune, like bad, always comes in a lump. At this period, the increasing deafness of Sir S. Shepherd rendered him quite incompetent to discharge the duties of Attorney-General. He was removed to the Scottish Bench, and Gifford, the Solicitor-General promoted in his room. Sergeant Copley was the new Solicitor-General,—a nomination which gave great pleasure to the Bar, but which, six months before, was wholly unexpected, as well by the public as by the gentleman who had the good fortune to obtain the appointment. Mr Copley now thought of changing his condition in life, and he married the niece of the late Attorney-General, Sir Samuel Shepherd. This lady's maiden name was Burnsford; she was the daughter of a factor of that name in Basinghall Street, and in March, 1814, had been united to Colonel Thomas. In the month of June, in the same year, however, Colonal Thomas was forced to join his regiment, and he was killed at the battle of Waterloo.

Sir John Copley was now (1819) introduced to Parliament for Ashburton, under the auspices of the Government, which soon had urgent occasion for his services in the affair of the late Queen. As counsel for the prosecution, Sir John evinced more talent and knowledge than the Attorney-General Gifford, whose speech was a complete failure: while he escaped the obloquy to which both Gifford and Sir John Leach had been exposed. The Government were so well pleased with his services, that they determined to make him Attorney-General,—an opportunity for which offered on Gifford's being made Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.

Mr Copley having obtained the office of Attorney-General, soon after offered himself for Cambridge, and, after an arduous struggle, he was returned, with Lord Palmerston, for that University. Gifford, who had been promoted to the Rolls, now suddenly died at Dover, and Sir John Copley succeeded him, with the prospect of the Seals full in view before him. Hitherto it had been imagined, that Sir John looked up to Mr Canning as his load-star, and that he was willing to stand or fall with that Minister. The event proved the reverse; while Master of the Rolls, he deemed it necessary to purge himself of all taint of Popery. The deed stung Mr Canning to the quick, but it secured to the aspirant the seals at which he had been grasping. Events known to our readers followed in rapid succession. Lord Eldon resigned, and Sir John Copley assumed the seals by the style and title of Baron Lyndhurst.

It remains but to give a general estimate of his Lordship's professional, senatorial, and judicial qualities. As an advocate, Mr Copley was distinguished by coolness, subtlety, and clear and lucid expositions; nor was he deficient in nervousness and strength; though he oftener prevailed by the more insidious arts which an experienced practitioner generally has recourse to. His legal knowledge was sound and accurate; and he is, perhaps, best described by stating that when at the bar, he was a mean between Scarlett and Brougham—not reaching the forensic accomplishments of the one, and falling far short of the eloquence and general knowledge of the other. As a senator, Sir John Copley was infinitely superior either to Wetherell or Gifford; though he never made a speech in Parliament which will be remembered or spoken of beyond the occasion. All his efforts at the Bar or in Parliament were distinguished by clearness, but there was always a lack of feeling, without which it is impossible to be a great orator. As a Judge, it were, perhaps, unfair thus early to pronounce an opinion on Lord Lyndhurst's labors; but it may be observed, that he gives some tokens of promise in struggling to avoid those deep-rooted errors of his predecessor, by which John, Earl of Eldon so encircled himself, to the 'cureless ruin' of hundreds sent to a premature grave, and thousands yet unborn to the miserable wreck which Chancery has left them.

ENGLISH CASES.

WESTERN CIRCUIT.

Before Mr Baron Bolland and a Special Jury.

Tucker vs. Tucker.

This cause excited a great deal of local interest, and the Court was crowded to excess by persons anxious to witness the proceedings.

Mr Sergeant Wilde, Mr Gurney, and Mr Moody conducted the plaintiff's case.

The Attorney-General had a special retainer on the part of the defendant, and has, it is understood, already received no less a sum than 640 guineas for his professional services. The Learned Gentleman was assisted by Mr C. F. Williams, Mr Pollett, and Mr Crowder.

The object of this action was to try the validity of a deed of conveyance executed by a gentleman named Tucker, who died in the month of January last, having by such deed made over the whole of his property to his wife, the present defendant. The plaintiff was the relation and heir-at-law of the deceased, and the ground of action was, that the party, not being of sound mind at the period in question, was not competent to execute a legal instrument.

From the opening statement of the plaintiff's Counsel, supported by the evidence of nearly 20 witnesses, many of whom had lived as servants with the deceased, the following facts were elicited:—The deceased had practised as an attorney for a number of years, at a place called Copington, in this county, and some time before he retired from business he went to reside at Bridgewater. In the month of September, 1825, he experienced a shock of paralysis, which deprived him of the use of his left side, and affected his mind to such a degree, that he fell into a state of total imbecility. He had previously been a man of very acute intellect, and was remarkable for correctness of conduct, and great regularity in all his transactions. The effects of his illness was shown in various ways, all tending to show that his mind was diseased. He had no recollection whatever of several persons whom he had well known before. On getting into bed for the night, he would suddenly start up and say that it was time for him to go out and take a ride. He lost all control over his habits, and his person in consequence became quite offensive. Sometimes he would begin to say his prayers, and then burst forth into loud curses, in the very midst of them. Before the shock he had invariably shown the kindest affection for his wife, but from the time it occurred his manner towards her became entirely changed, being extremely irritable, and very often violent. So highly excited was his nervous system, that his wife, fearing that he might commit self-destruction, gave orders that all knives, scissors, forks, &c, should be carefully removed from his reach, and that he should never be left without some person to watch him. He was fed with a spoon, and treated exactly like a child. He was never allowed any money, except a few halfpence, and all his pecuniary affairs were managed by his wife's nephew, Mr Perceval Boyce, a young gentleman, who had since died. In proof of the fact that Mrs Tucker had considered him insane from the commencement of the attack, it was alleged that she had purposely engaged for his nurse a woman who had been in the habit of attending lunatic patients, and it appeared that that person had care of him for some time. Among the numberless extravagances imputed to him, and sworn to in evidence, it was stated by his barber that shortly after the deceased sat down to be shaved, he would jump up in a fit of violent irritation, and drag himself out of the house with the operation performed only on one side of his face, the lather still frothing on the other. It was lastly alleged that while in this state, in the month of May, 1828, he was made to subscribe the deed which was the subject of the present action, and which involved property to the amount of about 20,000*l.*

Two medical gentlemen, Dr M'Mullen and Dr Woodford, described the effects usually produced by paralysis, the latter stating that they were precisely similar to those adduced in evidence on the present occasion.

This summary contains all the principal facts of the plaintiff's case, which, from the great number of witnesses brought forward, and the length of the direct and cross-examinations, did not close till past six o'clock in the evening. It was then agreed by the Counsel on both sides, that the case for the defendant should be deferred till the following morning.

Saturday, Aug. 21.

At nine o'clock this morning the proceedings in the above cause were resumed, when

The Attorney-General proceeded to address the Jury at considerable length. After commenting on the evidence of the several witnesses who had appeared for the plaintiff, he contended that the deceased had at all times evinced his determination to leave his property to his wife. In 1823, when in perfect health, and in the full vigor of his faculties, he made a will in her favor, altering and revoking several previous wills to the same effect. The Learned Gentleman next went on to argue that bodily infirmity, however great, did not necessarily imply the absence of mind, and he should be enabled to satisfy the Jury that Mr Tucker, at the time this transaction took place, was possessed of mind and manners fully sufficient to render any act of his valid in law.

Mr Boyce, the brother-in-law of the deceased, proved to having, by his express desire, instructed Mr Philpotts (the Member for Gloucester) to draw up the deed in question. He was quite convinced that the deceased was of sound mind at the time he signed the deed.

This witness underwent a very long and severe cross-examination, but in the course of it there was nothing whatever disclosed which could impeach his direct testimonies.

Mr Toogood, a surgeon, who had attended Mr Tucker since his illness, stated that he was one of the two attesting witnesses to the deed, and that the deceased was perfectly cognisant of its import at the time he put his name to it. If he (witness) had not thought him so, he himself would never have attested the instrument. At a subsequent period, in 1829, when he had reason to believe that the intellect of the deceased was impaired, he refused to become a witness to another deed, which was brought to him for the purpose, and which the deceased was to execute.

Mr Chubb, the other attesting witness, gave similar testimony, and stated that he had lived for a considerable time in habits of intimacy with the deceased.

John Philpotts, Esq., M. P., deposed to having prepared the deed according to the instructions of Mr Boyce, and he (witness) was the trustee under it. He had repeatedly visited Mr Tucker in 1827 and 1828, and found him perfectly rational on every occasion. He had no more doubt that Mr Tucker was competent to manage his affairs, and dispose of his property at the time he executed this deed, than that he himself was so at the present moment.

Some other witnesses were called who disproved the evidence for the plaintiff.

Mr Sergeant Wilde occupied about three hours in his reply; and after Mr Baron Bolland had gone over a most voluminous mass of evidence, the Jury, at 11 o'clock at night, found a verdict for the defendant.

LANCASTER ASSIZES.—AUGUST.

Before Mr Justice Bayley.

Walmsley vs. Brown and Wife.

This was an action of slander.

Mr Alderson regretted this cause had ever been brought into this Court, as there were other tribunals where justice might have been administered between the parties, but it was the act, not of the plaintiff, but of the defendants, who had forced him to it. His client was a man in very humble circumstances, being a journeyman shoemaker at Preston; the defendants, he understood, were opulent tradespeople in the same place. The injury complained of by this action was likely to carry the most serious consequences to the plaintiff, being nothing less than an imputation made upon his moral character by the defendant's wife, and made in a way the most calculated to give a sting to the infliction. A good name was of value to all men, but doubly so to those who had little else to boast of in the face of the world. It would be shown that upon a late occasion the plaintiff, with some half-dozen others, was standing in the defendant's shop, he and his wife being also present. The defendant's wife, without any provocation, exclaimed, in presence of all these persons, 'Thou'st robbed our Henry of 1*l.* 18*s.* and George Waring will prove it.' Now here was a distinct charge of having committed a felony, accompanied with an offer to prove it judiciously, in order to show that there could be no doubt of it. This pledge of proving a slanderous imputation had been always held as an aggravation of the offence, because it bespoke a seriousness and malignity which might not otherwise be understood by mere words. He hoped the Jury would mark their sense of the injury by the damages which they gave.

Henry Walmsley, the plaintiff's brother, spoke to the slander charged in the declaration. The defendant's wife repeated it in the presence of several persons.

Cross-examined by Mr Pollock—Witness is a journeyman shoemaker, as is his brother. Cannot say that anybody thought the worse of the plaintiff since these words were uttered of him. The defendant is a pawnbroker in Bold-street, Preston. 'Our Henry,' meant the son of the defendant, who, three or four years ago, went to America. He was a sad wild young fellow, and had given his parents a deal of trouble. He had spent a deal of money in public-houses in Preston. Witness was a boon companion of this Henry's, as was his brother, the plaintiff. The expression 'Thou'st robbed our Henry' could not mean that the defendant had made the young man spend 1*l.* 18*s.* in a public-house. Witness was sure of that. Henry was about 26 or 27 years of age. His mother had never before accused the plaintiff of being the cause of her son's leaving the country. George Waring, who was to prove the truth of the accusation against the plaintiff, kept a 'jerry-shop' (gin-shop) at Preston.

Mr Alderson said he was prepared with more witnesses to prove the slander, if his Learned Friend required it.

Mr Pollock had no wish upon the subject.

Mr Alderson called upon the defendants to produce Geo. Waring, to prove the truth of the slander.

Mr Pollock then addressed the Jury for the defendant. He denounced the action as a most trumpery one, to put money in an attorney's pocket, but he hoped the Jury would disappoint these parties. The Jury must think this journeyman shoemaker exceedingly sensitive on the point of honor to take this serious mode of setting his character right. He (Mr P.) would venture to say that nobody who had heard the words could give to them a felonious meaning. He asked, when a young lady complained of her lover robbing her of her peace of mind, whether that could be intended as an imputation of felony?—(a laugh). The truth was, that the defendant's wife, feeling sore that the plaintiff had been, by encouraging her son in his dissipation, the cause of his leaving the country, meant to charge him with that conduct, and nothing more. In whatever way it was looked at, he contended that this was not a case for damages.

Mr Justice Bayley stated to the Jury that in his opinion the expression 'robbing' was too indefinite to be understood in law, as conveying a distinct charge of felony. Had it been 'thief' the case would be different. It would be, however, for the Jury to say whether there was any intention on the part of the defendant's wife to impute a felony to the plaintiff.

The Jury, after a little hesitation, found for the plaintiff—Damages, One Shilling.

---

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS—APRIL.

Sittings at Guildhall, before Term, before the Chief Justice and a Special Jury.

Soames and Another vs. Sugrue.

Mr Sergeant Taddy (with whom were Mr Sergeant Stephen and Mr Alderson) stated the case. This action was brought against the defendant, who was a member of the St Patrick Insurance Company in Dublin, to recover the amount of a policy of insurance effected upon the ship Sir Godfrey Webster, on a voyage from London to Sidney or Van Diemen's Land, and thence to Singapore and Penang, in the East Indies. The plaintiffs, in the present instance, claimed for the total loss of the vessel, it having been absolutely necessary to abandon and sell it at the Mauritius, at which place it was obliged to put in, through distress, on the voyage homewards from Penang, in July, 1826. She was there surveyed by several persons, and it was found that the damage she had sustained was so extensive, that it would at least require 16,000 dollars (about 4,000*l.*) to be laid out for repairs; and the mate, who, in consequence of the death of the Captain, had become master of the vessel, wished to have an undertaking that the repairs should not exceed 16,000 dollars; but the persons to whom he applied declined doing so, upon the ground that, upon making a further examination of the vessel, more repairs might be requisite. The mate called in another surveyor, who, upon having the cargo taken out of the vessel, was of opinion that it would take nearly 10,000*l.* much more than the vessel was worth, and advised him to sell her. In consequence of this information, and knowing the difficulty of raising money on bottomry, and the enormous interest (25 per cent,) required at the Mauritius for money borrowed in that way, he deemed it prudent, and for the benefit of all parties, to sell the vessel. Under these circumstances the plaintiffs now claimed as for the total loss; and he (the Learned Sergeant) should prove these facts by several witnesses; and he had no doubt the Jury would find a verdict for his clients.

Several witnesses were then examined, who substantiated the above statement. It, however, appeared, from the cross-examination, that the three persons who examined the vessel in the first instance at the Mauritius, were of opinion that it might have been repaired for about 16,000 or 20,000 dollars, and that such repairs would have been sufficient to enable it to proceed with safety on the voyage back to London. It was also proved that, upon breaking up the vessel, the principal timbers in the bottom and other parts were found sound.—The mate admitted that he had made several interpolations in the log-book.

Mr Sergeant Wilde (with whom was Mr Turner) addressed the Jury for the defendant, and contended that there was no pretence for bringing this action. To maintain a claim like the present it must be satisfactorily proved that there was an extreme necessity for abandoning and selling the vessel;—mere expediency would not be enough. The very evidence for the plaintiffs showed that the vessel could have been repaired for about 4,000*l.*: it was insured on this policy for 3,000*l.*, and in another office for a similar sum. The freight was insured upon a valued policy for 5,000*l.*, making 11,000*l.* in the whole, and, as a considerable portion of the ship would have been renewed if repaired at the Mauritius, the owners would have to pay one-third of the expense. Instead of directing the necessary repairs to be done, the mate thought fit to abandon the vessel without any extreme necessity, and throw a total loss upon the underwriter. He should show, beyond a doubt, that the vessel could have been repaired for 4,000*l.* or 5,000*l.* and, having made out that fact, the Jury were bound to find in favor of the defendant.

The examinations of Alfred Ambrose and others, taken upon interrogatories in the Mauritius, were put in and read; and they fully bore out the statement of the Learned Sergeant, as to the possibility of the vessel being repaired at the Mauritius for about 4,000*l.* so as to render her fit for proceeding to London with the cargo.

Mr Sergeant Taddy having replied,

The Chief Justice summed up, and the Jury, after half an hour's consultation, found for the defendant.

---

RECENT ENGLISH DECISIONS.

POLICY OF INSURANCE.

A policy of insurance stipulated that there should be a proportional return of premium 'for every uncommenced month if the ship should be sold or laid up:' Held, this meant a permanent laying up so as to put an end to the voyage.—Hunter vs. Wright, 1 Lloyd & Welsby, 138.

PERJURY.

On an indictment for perjury, committed on the trial of a cause, the witness, to prove the perjury, stated from his recollection what the prisoner had sworn on the former trial; he had taken no note of the evidence given by the prisoner, and could not say with certainty that it was all the evidence the prisoner had given on the trial; but swore that it was all given on that point, and that the prisoner had said nothing to qualify it: Held, that this was sufficient evidence to go to the jury.—Rex vs. Rowley, 1 Ry. & M. C. C. 111.

INDICTMENT.

An indictment may charge a prisoner in one court as principal in stealing, and in another, as receiver.—Rex vs. Galloway, 1 Ry. & M. 234.

An indictment under a statute should follow the words of the statute; thus if a statute make it criminal to do an act unlawfully and maliciously, it is not sufficient to state that it was done feloniously, voluntarily, and maliciously.—Rex vs. Turner, 1 Ry. & M. 239.

PROMISSORY NOTE.

Parol evidence is not admissible to shew that a promissory note, purporting to be payable on demand, was, in fact, by agreement between the parties when it was made, not to be paid until a certain act was done by the payees.—Mosley vs. Hanford, 1 Lloyd & Welsby, 176.

If notes, in the hands of the maker, and which may be re-issued, cannot properly be decribed as valuable securities, they may be called goods and chattels.—Rex vs. Vyse, 1 Ryan & Moody, 218.

RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS.

On a joint charge against two for receiving stolen goods, a joint act of receiving must be proved: it will not be sufficient to prove that one received in the other's absence, and afterwards delivered the goods to the latter.—Rex vs. Messingham, 1 Ryan & Moody, 257.

SHEEP STEALING.

An indictment for stealing sheep is not supported by proof that lambs were stolen.—Rex vs. Loom, 1 Ryan & Moody, 160.

An indictment under the 7 & 8 G. 4. c. 29. s. 25. for stealing a sheep, is not supported by proof that a ewe was stolen by the prisoner, as the statute specifies both ewe and sheep.—Rex vs. Puddifoot, 1 Ryan & Moody, 247.

VARIANCE.

Declaration stated that defendant had told P. & Co. that the plaintiff had injured the sale of oranges sold by them, by circulating a report in the sale room, that he (the plaintiff) then had three or four vessels laden with oranges between Gravesend and London, by reason of which, P. and Co. has ceased to deal with the plaintiff. The language of the defendant was proved to have been —'The prices would not have been so unsatisfactory if the plaintiff had not before the sale, propagated a report that there were three or four cargoes coming up from Gravesend: Held, a fatal variance.—Wood vs. Adam, 6 Bing. 481.

WILL.

The testator devised to trustees and the survivor, or the executors or administrators of such, all his freehold messuages, stock or shares in the funds, money in hand, or debts due, and all shares or property whereof he was possessed or entitled to, in trust for his wife and children; to be divided on their attaining the age of twentyone. By a codicil, added afterwards, he directed his copyhold estate to be transferred to his wife, until the expiration of the leases, and after that time, or as soon as convenient, or within one year, to be sold for the benefit of his children as directed in the will: Held, that the copyholds did not pass to the trustees; and that the wife's interest determined with the leases.—Chapman vs. Prickett, 6. Bing. 602.

EQUITY.

[Including 3 Russ. Part 3; 4 Russ. Part 1.; and 2 Bligh. Part 4.]

APPOINTMENT.

Devise (so far as was material to the question) of 'all the manors, messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, whereof she (testatrix) had power to dispose.' The question was, whether this devise operated as an appointment of the moneys to arise from the sale of previously settled estates. Held, that it was merely a question of intention, and that the Court could not infer that by a disposition of all lands of which she had power to dispose, she meant to execute a power of appointment, not as to lands, but as to moneys to arise from the sale of lands. The Court said, the question would have been very different if she had devised the settled lands by name. It might then have been argued, that by the devise of the land she meant to describe her interest in the land.—Adams vs. Austen, 3 Russell, 461.

A lady had power to appoint by will a certain leasehold estate, and certain sums of three per cent stock, which were standing in the name of the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery. She was entitled to both for her life, and the stock had been transferred to the Accountant General. After bequeathing certain legacies, she 'gave all the residue of her stock to A. B., and all other property she possessed at the time of her decease, except 50*l.* of her bank stock, which she gave thereout to her executors.' It was proved, that she had no bank stock, nor any other, except the stock in Court, over which she had a power of appointment. Held, that the will was a good execution of the testatrix's power as to the three per cent stock in Court; that her pecuniary legacies were payable out of it, and that the will was also a good execution of her power as to the leasehold estate.—Walker vs. Mackie, 4 Russell, 76.

[The reporter, in his marginal note, lays it down, that 'a will is deemed a good execution of a power, if it dispose of the subject of the power, although it does not refer to the power.' We submit, however, that this proposition is much too general, and broader than is waranted, either by the circumstances of the case, by the language of the Court, or by former authorities. The case of Farmer v. Bradford, 3 Russell, 354. and 3 Law Magazine, 550., which, if the principle be understood, will be seen not to conflict with the present case, suffices to upset it.]

ATTESTATION.

The question in the cause was, whether the will was attested according to the statute of frauds, and that question depended on this, whether the subscribing witnesses signed their names in the presence of the testator. The peculiar circumstances which the reporter has left to be gathered from the several judgments of the Court, it would be useless to state: the following general propositions, contained in the judgment, are alone of any value. Per Curiam, 'Generally speaking, where a will is attested in an adjoining room, if there be a particular part of the room, in which the testator might have seen the attestation, and if there be an absence of all evidence, or if there be doubtful evidence, as to the particular part of the room in which the attestation actually took place, it would be reasonable to presume that it did take place where it ought to have taken place; because it would be reasonable to presume that the professional person present knew the law as to the attestation of wills, and would take care to observe the proper forms. In the absence of all direct evidence, the presumption would be that the witness, ignorant that the part of the room was material, would write upon the writing table where it must be inferred that the writing materials were to be found; and where, it is probable, the candles would be placed.—Winchelsea vs. Wauchope, 3 Russell, 441.

RECENT AMERICAN DECISIONS.

CONTRACT.

12. The want of a counterpart to such a contract does not render it invalid. Phelps vs. Townsend. 8 Pick. 392.

13. A covenant by an heir expectant, that he will convey the estate which shall come to him by descent or otherwise, is valid, if made with the consent of the ancestor, and for a sufficient consideration, and without advantage being taken of the covenanter. Fitch vs. Fitch. 480.

14. A owing B a note, gave several new notes to B altogether being of smaller amount than the old note, and payable at future days. At the same time they entered into a written agreement, that if the new notes were paid 'when due,' the old note should be given up to A to be cancelled, but if any of the new notes were not paid, the old note should be in force; and B in such case agreed, that if he should see fit to enforce the old note, he would enter upon it such sums as A should have paid on the new note, and return the other new notes to A. A paid the first of the new notes, but the second not being paid on the day when it became due, B. had a writ made out on the old note against A and afterward endorsed on the old note the amount which A had paid, and then delivered the writ to the officer, who served it:—

Held, first, That payment of the new notes, on the days when they became due, was necessary to entitle A to the benefit of the agreement:

Secondly, That A having failed to preform this part of the agreement, B had a right to sue on the old note:

Thirdly, That the endorsing of the first payment on the old note, and the returning of the new notes, was not a condition precedent, in order to entitle B to sue on the old note:

But, fourthly, it seems, that if the performance of these acts had constituted a condition precedent, they were done seasonably. Tufts vs. Kidder. 537.

CHANCERY.

1. A and B were partners. A died. B, who settled the affairs of the partnership, took a part of the stock to himself, and gave notes to the executors of the other partners, and made several payments to them, and paid all the notes but one, on which the surviving executor brought a suit against B. B then brought a bill in equity against the executor, praying for an account of the partnership business, stating various particulars in the accounts with A, by which, he B, was injured, and that if the accounts were fairly settled, nothing would be due to the executor on the note, but a balance would be due to B from the executor, and praying an injunction against the suit at law. The defendant demurred to so much of the bill as did not relate to the partnership dealings and the defendant's capacity as executor, and as to the residue of the bill, pleaded the statute of limitation of four years. The Court sustained the demurrer, and held that the payments to the executors did not show any ground for equitable interference unconnected with the partnership transactions, and that the suit in equity as to them was barred by the statute. Burdilt vs. Grew. 108.

CONVEYANCE.

1. A grantee, not having been in actual possession of the granted premises otherwise than by leasing them to his grantor and receiving rent from him, executed to a purchaser for a valuable consideration, a deed of conveyance, by 'quitclaim and release' in the form in common use in Massachusetts, which was duly recorded in the registry of deeds. Held, that this was a sufficient conveyance to pass the estate, though the release had not a previous interest in or possession of the estate. Russell vs. Coffin. 143.

2. Where a grant was made of a right to erect and maintain a dam from the grantee's land on one side of a stream, to the grantor's land on the other, at about the distance of sixty rods below certain mills of the grantor, and a dam was built more than sixty rods below, and afterwards, without any objection on the part of the grantor, was removed twenty rods higher up the stream, but was still below the sixty rods, such removal was presumed to be within the intent of the parties to the conveyance. Boynton vs. Rees. 329.

3. Held, also, that the grant was not invalid because no consideration was mentioned in the deed; and that to avoid it as a voluntary conveyance fraudulent as against subsequent purchasers, the party objecting to it must prove that no consideration was given. Ibid.

4. The erection of the dam and the occupation of it six months in the year by the grantee, it being occupied the other six by a third person, were held not to be conclusive evidence of notice of the grant, as against a subsequent purchaser of the grantor's land. Ibid.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1830.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

MARCH TERM—1830.

John Dodge Ex'r. vs. Thomas H. Perkins.

We have examined a Pamphlet lately issued from the press in this City, and very freely and industriously circulated, containing various matters of fact, law, inference and argument relating to the above named action. The report of the case as published, appears in the name of the Plaintiff.

Most parties are satisfied to get out of the law when they get through with their cases; and are quite willing to leave the business of reporting them to those who are appointed for that purpose. But it is otherwise in this case. The Plaintiff seems quite dissatisfied that the defendant should get off by merely paying what the Court thought, under the particular circumstances of the case, he should pay. Having made a successful thrust at his purse, he thinks it his duty to make another at his reputation.

It is a little remarkable that while he was willing to take the opinion of the Court upon the former, he should choose another forum for judgment upon the latter. It is much the easiest way, oftentimes to argue a case where there is nobody to meet the argument. It is not difficult to give facts, where there are no means of contradiction. It is very easy to flourish the sword when the enemy has retired from the field, and the smoke has cleared away so as to give assurance that there is no adversary within gun-shot.

We know but little of the merits of the controversy in the above case. We have not examined it for the purpose of making up an opinion in reference to that matter. The case was very well argued, and we think ably decided. We would avail ourselves of the law which the case contains, and leave the Plaintiff to 'give facts not arguments, truth not eloquence.' We like the opinion in this case. Indeed we always feel a pleasure in the perusal of the opinions given by Judge Putnam. They are generally highly elaborate and expressed in pertinent legal language. He is peculiarly fortunate in his illustrations and appropriate phraseology. The Court, in the opinion expressed by Judge Putnam, in terms, negatived all charges of fraud or 'intentional misappropriation' of the funds in question, and we can but remark that the Plaintiff would have acted much more wisely to have rested satisfied with the persuasion 'that neither wealth or influence can stay the march of justice in our free land'—and left the defendant to 'his conscience,' and the 'American and European markets; to a correct value of his goods and mercantile faith. We do not believe that the Plaintiff in his double or single capacity can affect the quality or touch the value of either. It is beyond his caliber to crack the glass of such a man's honor or faith.

Either the Plaintiff felt less inclined to press the matter of fraud when it could have been met, or his Counsel betrayed their trust; for in the outset they disclaim all such pretence, and so argue the case. The reason for such a disclaimer must have been the want of proof, the danger of that allegation to the issue. Being abandoned by Counsel and Court or never suggested, with what fairness can the plaintiff, who it seems goes for 'conscience and duty' altogether, now come before the public with a Pamphlet of some 100 pages to prove dishonesty, and attempt to affect the defendant's reputation? A charge which the Plaintiff could not sustain, and which his respectable counsel would not make, cannot take a feather's weight from the well established reputation of one of our first merchants and most valuable and honorable citizens.

We proceed, however, to give an extract from the opinion of the Court.

---

Judge Putnam delivered the opinion of the Court. The questions arising in this case, are, first, whether the defendant is liable to pay interest from the time when he received the money, to the time when the plaintiff, as executor of Unite Dodge, deceased, demanded payment. And if so, then, secondly, upon what amount the interest shall be calculated.

The action is upon an implied assumpsit, and the judgment sounds wholly in damages for the non-performance of the contract or undertaking. If the interest is not included, in the contract, it cannot be given. If it is included, then it should make up a part of the judgment.

This rule applies as well to implied as to express contracts, and to verbal as well as to written promises. Where there is an express promise in writing to pay interest, the amount of the damages becomes a mere matter of calculation. But whether there has been an implied promise to pay interest often depends upon the usages of trade and dealings between the parties, and other circumstances which explain the duty undertaken to be performed. And if upon the whole matter the defendant has not performed it, interest is to be assessed as damages for the breach. If it were not so, the remedy would be incomplete. Those usages of trade and other facts and circumstances, and the dealings between the parties, are proper subjects for the consideration of the jury. But when they are agreed by the parties or found by the jury, the law arising from them is to be declared by the court.

If, for example, one should promise in writing to pay money to another on a certain day, and fail to do so, interest would be added to the amount of damages, notwithstanding the writing did not express it. It would be added as a compensation for the non-performance of the contract. If there were a verbal contract to the same effect, the same rule of damages should be followed. The case of Robinson v. Bland, 2 Burr. 1086, is a leading one upon this point. It was before the revolutionary war, and was determined by Lord Mansfield and his able associates, upon sound principles. It was for money lent in France, for the security of which, a bill of exchange was drawn payable at a short sight in England. The bill of exchange however was avoided, because it was given for money lent at the time and place of play. The contract, raised by law, to pay for the money lent, was held to be good, although the security was void. Upon the facts found, the court were to determine whether interest should be payable; and they held that it was to be inferred from the facts proved, that the money was to be paid in England at a certain time, and that interest should be added as part of the damages, up to the time of the judgment.

There the borrower, Sir John Bland, died, and there was no express promise concerning interest. The money was not paid. Lord Mansfield said, 'although this be nominally an action for damages, and damages be nominally recovered on it, yet it is really and effectually brought for a specific performance of the contract. For where money is made payable by an agreement between parties, and a time given for the payment of it, this is a contract to pay the money at the given time, and to pay interest for it from the given day, in case of failure of payment at that day.' Judge Wilmot in a very able opinion, said, (p. 1083,) the damage was the whole interest due upon the money lent, from the time of its being payable, up to the time of signing the judgment. Interest was added to the principal sum accordingly, and the judgment was for the aggregate sum, as damages for the breach of the contract.

If the money is not paid at the stipulated day, the debtor is in fault. He detains the money of his creditor. So if the money is payable upon demand, interest is allowable after a demand, by writ or otherwise. The law supposes the party to be in fault, if he does not pay upon demand.

The great inquiry is, whether the party has done all that the law required of him in the particular case; whether acting on his own account, or as agent, executor, administrator, guardian, or trustee for others. If he has, he is not accountable for interest; if he has not, he is accountable for it, as a compensation for the non-performance of his contract.

There are cases where the law requires the party to pay over the money which he has acquired, immediately, without waiting for any demand or request of payment; as where he has obtained it by fraud. The promise which the law implies, extends as well to the interest as to the principal sum so wrongfully acquired and detained. In Wood v. Robbins, 11 Mass. R. 506, the party was originally and continually in fault.

The same rule applies where the party received the money lawfully for a particular purpose, and misapplied it; as in Fowler v. Shearer, 7 Mass. R. 14, where the defendant, (who was an attorney,) should have endorsed it on a note which he held for collection, but did not, and in consequence of his neglect, the promiser was obliged to pay the whole of the note. It was held, that the attorney was accountable for interest as well as principal, and Chief Justice Parsons thought that the interest should commence from the time of payment. That was an action for money had and received.

The same rule is recognized in 1 Sch. and Lefr. 134, where the vendee retained part of the purchase money to pay off incumbrances, but did not. It was determined that it should carry interest, because there was a misappropriation.

The same rule should apply where a party has acted as agent to render a reasonable account, but has omitted to do so for an unreasonable time. Interest should be calculated from the time of the breach of his undertaking. Crawford v. Willing, 1 Dallas, 349, note.

If the party were a stakeholder, without fault, he would not be chargeable, notwithstanding the money were in his hands several years. Lee v. Munn, 8 Taunt. 45. S. P. in Williams v. Storrs, 6 Johns. Ch. R. 353. 'But if (said the Chancellor, the agent had received the money, and neglected for a long time to inform his principal of the fact and wilfully suffered him to remain in ignorance, that his debtor had paid to the agent, there would be equity in requiring the agent to pay interest for here would be a default and breach of duty.'

[To be concluded next week.]

GRAY AND BOWEN, No. 141, Washington Street, Boston, have recently published the following valuable works.

I. A DESCRIPTION OF TREMONT HOUSE; WITH ARCHITECTURAL ILLUSTRATIONS.—4to.

'Jam scires ab introitu primo—herculentum et amvenum videre et diversonium.' APULEIUS, M. A V.

This work is embellished with a copper-plate engraving, representing the front of the house, and thirty lithographic prints, exhibiting the details of the structure. Its object will be understood by the following extract from the preface.

'The present publication is intended to satisfy a curiosity, which frequent inquiries for a description of Tremont House were supposed to indicate.

'Its original plan was to furnish such particulars relative to this establishment as strangers might wish to possess, but it has been extended so as to comprehend many architectural details, which will probably be interesting to mechanics; as much of the ornamental work of Tremont House was copied or adopted from books, not commonly in their hands, and has not before been executed in this country.

II. AN EPITOME OF UNIVERSAL GEOGRAPHY; or, a Description of the various Countries of the Globe; with a view of their Political Condition at the present time. With sixty Maps. By NATHAN HALE.

III. A DICTIONARY OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE; or, an Explanation of Words and Things connected with all the Arts and Sciences. Illustrated with numerous Wood Cuts. By GEORGE CRABB, A. M., Author of 'English Synonymes,' 'Technological Dictionary,' and 'Historical Dictionary.'

IV. THE VESTAL — A TALE OF POMPEII. 1 Vol. 12mo.

'Oh Time, thou beautifier of the dead,
Adorner of the ruin.' CHILDE HAROLD.

V. AUTHORSHIP. A Tale. By a New Englander over Sea. 1 Vol. 12mo.

VI. AN ORATION; Delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, Cambridge, Mass. August 26th, 1830. By the Rev. ORVILLE DEWEY.

VII. THE DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Published under the Direction of the President of the United States, from the Original Manuscripts in the Department of State, conformably to a resolution of Congress, of March 27, 1818. Edited by JARED SPARKS.

This important Correspondence, now for the first time published, will form eleven volumes. Eight are already published and the remainder will appear very shortly.

VIII. JEFFERSON'S WORKS, In four Volumes. Accompanied with a Portrait on steel, and a fac-simile of the original draft of the Declaration of Independence. Second Edition.

IX. THE NEW TESTAMENT, conformed to Griesbach's Text. 1 Vol. 12mo.

THE TOKEN, a Christmas and New Year's Present, for 1831. Edited by S. G. Goodrich.

'Then take my flower, and let its leaves
Beside thy heart be cherished near,
While that confiding heart receives
The thought it whispers to thine ear.'

The engravings for the Token of this year are executed by Cheney, Ellis, Gallaudet, and others; among the contributors are Dewey, Greenwood, Miss Sedgwick, Mrs Sigourney, Hall, Peabody, Wetmore, author of a Year in Spain, author of Tales of the Northwest, Neal, Thatcher, Mrs Hale, and others of the first reputation.

The work is larger than heretofore, and is done up in splendid embossed morocco. The literary department is considered decidedly superior to the former years, and in all respects it has received the greatest care and attention.

Oct 23.

---

BIGELOW'S SUPPLEMENT. HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. have just published A Digest of Pickering's Reports, Volumes 2—7, being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports.—By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law.

Oct. 23.

---

PICKERING'S REPORTS, Vol. 8th. This day published and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & CO.

Oct. 23.

---

This day received by GRAY & BOWEN, 141 Washington Street.

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW, No XXV. for July 1830.

Contents: 1, The Ballot: 2, Carwell: 3, Government of Lower Canada: 4, Wilson's life of Daniel de Foe: 5, Greek Lexicons: 6, Physiology and Cultivation of Trees: 7, Game of Life: 8, Dobell's Siberia: 9, Bishop of London and Sabbath Breaking: 10, Three Courses and a Dessert: 11, Clarendon: 12, Moorsom's Nova Scotia: 13, Religious Disabilities: 14, Stamp Act and Synod of Somerset House: 15, Patronage of Art, and the President of the Royal Academy: 16, Distress of the Country: 17, Egyptian Notation: 18, Great Britain and France: Postscript to the Article on the Ballot.

The Westminster Review has existed long enough, to see the cause in which its efforts were begun, make a notable advance in the opinions of mankind. Its proposed object was to prove, that the interests which were supposed confined to the wretched and weak, are in reality those of all ranks and orders in the state; and if the course has been successfully shaped, it is unnecessary to discuss what portion of the progress has been consequent on the efforts of the rowers, and what on the general tide which carried them upon their way. The term which was once employed as a name of low reproach, has found its way into high places, and is gone forth as the title of a class, who glory in their designation, and are not afraid to speak with their enemies in the gate. Like the early Christians, they may say to their opponents—Hesterni sumus, et vestra omnia implevimus, urbes, insulas, castella, municipa, concilabula, castra ipsa, tribus, decurias, palatium, senatum, forum.—They cannot even add the Sola vobis, relinquimus templa. What has been gained by reason, will never be wittingly abused; and it will be fame enough for common men, if what they have hitherto defended they hereafter can assist.

Oct. 23.

---

DANE'S ABRIDGMENT OF AMERICAN LAW, in 9 vols. with an appendix. A few complete sets for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. H., G. & Co. will also supply the ninth vol. and the appendix to those who are owners of the eight volumes, and the appendix separate to those who have the ninth.

Oct. 23.

---

ENGLISH LAW BOOKS. This day received and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & Co.

Browne's Chancery Practice, under the New Orders with the Sanction of the Court, in 2 vols. 8 vo.

Willoch on the Laws of the Medical Profession, 1 vol. 8 vo.

Finelly's Law aud Practice of Elections, 1 vol. 12 mo.

Crabbe's History of the English Law, 1 vol. 8 vo.

Oct. 23.

---

PRINTING. The Printing House of I. R. BUTTS, corner of Washington and School Streets, is supplied with materials suitable for Book, Job, and every other description of Printing.

Oct. 23.

---

DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS, TO WIT: District Clerk's Office.

BE it remembered, that on the seventeenth day of August, A. D. 1830, in the fiftyfifth year of the Independence of the United States of America, Lewis Bigelow of the said district, has deposited in this office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as author in the words following, to wit:

'A Digest of Pickering's Reports, volumes II.—VII., being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law.'

In conformity to the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned;' and also to an act entitled, 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled, 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned,' and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints.'

JNO. W. DAVIS, Clerk of the District of Massachusetts.

---

GRAY & BOWEN, have in preparation, and will very shortly put to press,

A NEW DICTIONARY OF MEDICAL SCIENCE AND LITERATURE; which will contain a concise account of the various subjects in Anatomy, Physiology, Pathology, Therapeutics, Materia Medica, Surgery, Obstetrics, and Pharmacy, with the Etymology and Orthoepy of the terms of their Greek, Latin, French, and German synonymes;—a copious Bibliography appended to the different articles, and Biographical Notices of the most eminent Authors in the different departments of Medical Science, with a Catalogue of their principal works mentioned and an Epitome of the existing state of Medical Science and Literature. By Robley Dunglison, M. D. Professor of Medicine in the University of Virginia &c, &c.

While many of the nations of Continental Euro possess Dictionaries, which have kept pace with t advancing condition of Medical Science, Great Britain and America possess it may be said, but one of a concise character,—that of Hooper,—which independently of its want of accuracy on many points, is incontestibly far behind the present state of Medical Science and Literature, and unfit for the purposes of the Medical Student. In proof of this, it will be sufficient to remark, that the New Dictionary will contain at least five thousand words more than are to be found in that publication,—while the circumstance of the Dictionary of Hooper being stereotyped in this country, renders it impracticable to make the necessary additions to it, were the ground work such as to render such a course advisable.

The work will not be a mere Dictionary of terms; it will comprise concise histories of diseases: a description and doses of various kinds of medicine, with formula for the different Pharmacentrical preparations, &c, &c.

The important publications daily appearing in France and Germany, have induced the author to add the French and German synonymes to the various terms; so that the work will really contain the substance of an English, French and German Dictionary, at a comparatively trifling expense.—The French Index will be found to include every word in the 'Dictionaire des Science Medicales,' which consists of sixty volumes, as well as in the smaller Dictionaries more recently published.

Great attention has been, moreover, paid to the Greek and Latin synonymes, so that the Dictionary will, it is trusted, form a safe and convenient guide to the study of ancient and modern authors on Medicine.

It will be comprised in one large volume, 8vo.

Oct. 23.

---

HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. No 134 Washington Street, Boston, have in press a Trearise on Corporations, with an appendix of the Corporation acts of each state, by Joseph K. Angell, author of a Treatise on Water Courses, Tide Water, Limitations, &c.

Oct. 23.

---

LAW BOOKS.—HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. 134 Washington Street, have on hand a large Stock of American and English Law Books, comprising a complete assortment of the best editions of all works in general use. They also purchase and sell second hand Law Books—terms liberal.

H., G. & Co. supply any volumes that may be wanted of Massachusetts or Pickering's Reports.

---

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of administering and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire: and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Price $1.25.

---

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. This day published by HILLIARD, GRAY, & Co. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law: being a continuation of the Digest of Massachusetts Reports; and also a continuation of Metcalf's Digest of the same work. Neatly bound in Sheep,3,50.—Calf, $4,00

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1830. NO. XVI.

MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE.

INSANITY.

Concluded.

Numerous, indeed, are the instances of delusion on one subject, which imply no incompetency for properly discharging the duties of an efficient member of society. We will mention two or three. Haslam, in his able work on madness, records a curious case of a well-educated man of middle age, otherwise sensible and well conducted. 'He always stopped his ears closely with wool, and in addition to a flannel night-cap, usually slept with his head in a tin saucepan. Being asked the reason why he so fortified his head, he replied, 'to prevent the intrusion of the sprites.' He was apprehensive that his head would become the receptacle of these imaginary formations; that they would penetrate into the interior of his brain, become acquainted with his hidden thoughts and intellectual observations, and then depart and communicate to others the ideas they had thus derived. 'In this manner,' said he, 'I have been defrauded of discoveries, that would have entitled me to opulence and distinction, and have lived to see others reap honors and emoluments for speculations which were the offspring of my own brain.'

In a very singular pamphlet, entitled 'The Records of Mœstus,' written by a clergyman of the North of England, we find mention of a young student at College, 'who became so deeply hypochondriac, as to proclaim himself dead, and order the college bells to be tolled on occasion of his death; in this he was indulged, but the man employed to execute the task appeared to the student to perform it so imperfectly, that he arose from the bed in a fury of passion to toll the bell for his own departure. When he had finished he retired to bed in a state of profound perspiration, and is at this moment alive and well.'

More painful, but equally illustrative of the existence of monomania, unattended by impropriety or extravagance of conduct, is the case of a young clergyman, who, two days previously to the appointed period of his marriage, was employed in snipe shooting with a friend. Accidentally he received part of the charge of a gun in his forehead. He instantly fell, and did not recover for some days, so as to be deemed out of danger; but at the end of this period it was perceived that he was deranged. The interesting event that was to have taken place, became the leading object of his thought, and all his ideas seemed to stop at this. 'And his conversation was literally confined to the business of the wedding; out of this circle he never deviated, but dwelt on everything relating to it with minuteness; never retreating nor advancing one step farther for half a century, being ideally still a young, active, expecting and happy bridegroom, chiding the tardiness of time, although it brought him, at the age of eighty, gently to the grave.'*

The fact would seem to be, that the mind like the body, is composed of parts, and, therefore, liable to become impaired as to one portion of its powers, while others continue in full vigor. We do not feel any great alarm in broaching this heterodox and material opinion, although Dr Haslam thus remarks on it in his 'Letter to the Lord Chancellor on Unsoundness of Mind and Imbecility of Intellect.'

'Respecting the human intellect, two very opposite opinions prevail among physiologists and metaphysicians. One party strenuously contending, that the phenomena of mind result from the peculiar organization of the brain, although they confess themselves to be as entirely ignorant how the parts of the brain accomplish these purposes, as how the liver secretes bile, how the muscles contract, or how any other living purpose is effected. The other maintains, that we become intelligent beings through the medium of a purer emanation, which they denominate spirit, diffused over or united with the corporeal structure. The former of these suppositions is held by many grave and pious persons to be incompatible with the doctrines of the Christian religion, and if I am not mistaken, your lordship, on a late occasion, after having perused a work attempting to establish such principles, did incline by rational doubts to suspect, that these opinions were directed against the truth of scripture.' It is rather singular how his lordship, or any other grave and pious person, should fail to perceive, that the one and the other party equally recognise the existence of an informing soul or spirit divine and incorporeal, but that the former suppose this purer emanation to make the brain its instrument or agent, in which they are borne out by a thousand analogies, while the latter recognising no material agency whatever by which their ethereal principle may condescend to act, are involved in the blasphemous necessity of supposing, that in cases of mental derangement the soul itself becomes insane.

This letter of Dr Haslam's by no means satisfies the expectations to be formed from its high-sounding title. It contains little or no information to guide us in our difficulties, but seems, indeed, only as a covert attack on a dictum of Lord Eldon's in the Portsmouth case, in which the learned earl declared, 'that unsoundness of mind was some such state as was to be contradistinguished from idiotcy, and as was to be contradistinguished from lunacy, and yet such as made him a proper object of a commission in the nature of a commission to inquire of idiotcy, or a commission to inquire of lunacy.' Some mistaken persons may be inclined to join the Dr in his sneer at the clearness and philosophy of this laborious definition, which, indeed, makes an effort to distinguish between things now admitted to be absolutely identical. Dr Haslam strives also to be humorous upon his lordship's declaration, that 'to call a man a lunatic is to attribute to him at times an extremely sound mind.' 'How many,' he exclaims, 'would cheerfully consent to become lunatics, if thereby, in lieu of their ordinarily small understandings, they became entitled to intervals of vigorous and powerful intellect.'

Such being the puerile lucubrations of our most learned judges on this subject, it is not surprising, that after the perusal of a great variety of cases, we have been unable to extract one single general rule or principle. Commissions of lunacy are for the most part cruel, but entertaining mockeries. A crowd of doctors are examined to display their learning or their ignorance, and a host of lawyers employed to exhibit their wit, ingenuity, and impertinence. For this display, the unhappy subject has the privilege of paying, and in general it happens, that the inquiry is decided upon facts that might have been got at without the aid of lawyers or physicians. The favorable opportunity of quizzing and brow-beating the medical faculty is seldom neglected by the bar. To what a ridiculous extent this is sometimes carried, Dr Burrows bears the following testimony.

'Under an order of Lord Chancellor Eldon, I was employed to examine into the state of mind of Thomas Hibbert, Esq. As he was represented to possess an income of 25,000*l.* per annum, I thought it right to ascertain his knowledge of arithmetic, judging that he could not be competent to manage his own affairs, if ignorant of its first elements. Accordingly, I gave him several simple sums in addition, division, and subtraction, to work. When I was examined in court, I exhibited the paper on which these several sums were set, and Mr Hibbert's manner of executing them. The defendant's counsel, in summing up the evidence which had been given, inquired, at the same time, pointing to me, who sat in a very conspicuous place in court, what credit was due to a witness' testimony who showed so much ignorance, that he could not spell correctly what he had placed before the defendant, whose competency he pretended to examine? He then referred to the paper which I had produced, stating that the word which ought to be written subtraction, was spelt substraction. A violent laugh was raised at my expense.' Dr Burrows also states that this occurrence did him temporarily much professional injury!!

The grounds on which it is permitted to invalidate written instruments, such as wills or bonds, were always greatly circumscribed, and have been gradually narrowed by successive decisions of our courts, ecclesiastical and civil. The case of Cartwright v. Cartwright goes to a great length on this subject. It was decided by Sir William Wynn, in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, Hilary Term, 1793, and is to be found fully reported in the second volume of Phillimore's Ecclesiastical Reports, where the editor remarks, in a note, on its high authority, and the frequent reference made to it in the Court of Probate. It was a dispute on the validity of a will, under the following circumstances. Mrs Cartwright, a maiden lady, being decidedly insane, was placed under the care of a nurse, and attended by Dr Battie. As her delirium was attended by occasional acts of violence, her hands were kept constantly tied. She often demanded her liberty, and called for pen and paper that she might make her will; but her physicians refused, on the ground that she was not in a fit state to execute such an instrument. On one occasion, however, he did untie her hands—whether on account of the symptoms having become more favorable or not, did not appear in evidence—and he allowed materials for writing to be given her. She then desired the nurse and another attendant to leave the room, as she was going to make her will, which they did, watching her, however, from the door. From thence they observed her writing and tearing several papers in a furious manner, and otherwise conducting herself with great violence and distraction of manner. She at length summoned them, and desired a candle to be brought for sealing: this also was allowed her. Her derangement continued from this moment until the time of her death. Sir William Wynn decided that this will was valid, as executed during a lucid interval. His principal reasons were, that it bequeathed her property to her brother's female children, who were exactly those among her nearest relatives for whom she had manifested, when sane, the greatest affection. The will was written without blot or mistake, in a remarkably fair hand. The violent actions and gestures observed by the attendants, he explained by supposing that they arose from unsuccessful efforts to express her intentions in writing to her own satisfaction. He observed, that when she had once completed the instrument correctly, she became composed, and required a candle in order to seal it. In this proper—indeed perfect—expression of her intention with regard to her property, she was quite unaided by any one. 'Unquestionably,' says the learned judge, 'there must be a complete and absolute proof that the party who had so formed it, did it without any assistance. If the fact be so, that she has done as rational an act as can be without the assistance of any other person, what then is more to be proved? I don't know, unless the gentlemen could prove by any authority or law, what the length of the lucid interval is to be, whether an hour, a day, or a month.' The broad principle to be drawn from this decision is, that no written instrument can be nullified by proof of the maker's insanity, which does not bear on the face of it, either some impropriety in the design or some incorrectness in the execution. This doctrine is borne out by the following curious case, which occurred at Nisi Prius in the King's Bench, 1809.

* Beck's Elements of Medical Jurisprudence, p 233.

It was an action on an annuity bond brought by a Miss Faulder against the executors and heir of Thomas Clerk Jervoice: the defence, lunacy of the obligor. The young lady had been the mistress of Mr Jervoice from the age of eighteen, cohabiting with him for twelve years, and conducting herself throughout with singular propriety, and paying every possible attention to his welfare. When he executed the bond in her favor, he did it with peculiar caution, and the preparers of the instruments and the attesting witnesses bore strong testimony to his competency for the act. The bond bore date 1808.

The following facts were adduced in evidence by the defendants. The lunatic, on the death of his grandmother in the year 1802, became possessed of an estate in Hampshire, whither he immediately repaired, and while the corpse was yet unburied, pulled down the chimneys and levelled the walls of the mansion, himself living in a marquee, sleeping in a stable or a summer house, and cooking his victuals with his own hands under a tree in a favorite vessel, which he called his conjuror. The carriage of his grandmother was painted black, by his directions, and exposed for sale under the name of Black Jack. Upon the death of his father, he came into the possession of the family estate and residence, situated at West Bromwich in Staffordshire, whither he repaired, and made a bonfire of all the furniture, himself superintending the conflagration. It was his practice to ride about the country on a jackass, dressed in a white hat, blue trowsers, red morocco slippers, with a flannel shirt next his skin, and over that a white linen shirt, without either coat or waistcoat, wearing sometimes a waggoner's frock. His usual places of residence were tents, stable yards, or coach houses, where he cooked his victuals, and even shaved himself, in his beloved conjuror, occasionally sleeping on the boards of a parlor, or the stones of a hall. Much of his time was spent in travelling, his carriage being always filled with pots, pans, silver plates, old china, a bunch of large keys, picklocks to the number of one hundred and fifty, and his inseparable conjuror. A carriage which he once made use of was unpainted, until a sudden freak induced him to order three female domestics to paint it on a Sunday, and then he rode out in it, the paint being wet. Fisherwomen were frequently called to him as they were passing by, whose fish he purchased, and whom he employed in mending the lining of his carriages with the petticoats of his maid servants. His female domestics, particularly a woman of the name of Elizabeth Savage, whom he picked up at Birmingham, were the companions of his journeys; and he would frequently stop at night on the high roads making tea and cooking his victuals; on one occasion he performed the process of cooking at midnight on Bagshot Heath, with numerous candles burning round him, to the no small surprise and entertainment of travellers. Staircases became the objects of his aversion, for he thought them unsightly things; and caused the staircase of his house at Egham to be taken down, substituting a ladder in its stead: passages were moreover cut through the ceilings, through which his servants were sometimes obliged to raise themselves into their chambers by ropes and pullies; himself occasionally sleeping on the boards of the ground floor. To his own chamber (when he made use of one) he clambered by means of a chest of drawers filled with large nails drawn out progressively like steps, from the top of which he ascended by ropes. In one of his houses a staircase turning on castors was erected, to serve as a crane, for the purpose of raising his carriage into his chamber windows. Windows were frequently converted into doors, and the doors blocked up. At length he conceived an aversion to the presence of servants; and to obviate their attendance caused the door leading to his chamber from below to be cut in two so as to form a bar, over which his domestics were never allowed to pass; but they placed his victuals on a table in the inside, connected by a rope and pulleys with that on which he was sitting, and thus were his victuals conveyed to him.

The Rev. Holwell Car deposed, that he visited Mr Jervoice about the time of his granting the annuity, and thought him at that time incompetent to a legal disposition of his property. He was confined in a madhouse on the 2d of January, 1809, where he continued to the day of his death.

Lord Ellenborough observed to the jury, that although the inquisition which found Mr Jervoice a lunatic during the period when the instruments in question were executed, was evidence of his insanity, yet that such evidence was presumptive only, not conclusive; and if they should be of opinion, that when he granted the annuity, he had such possession of his intellects as rendered him perfectly aware what he was doing, and in making such a disposition of his property, had followed the dictates of his mind, when fully possessed of reason, their verdict should be in favor of the annuity; provided on the contrary they believed him to have been, during the whole period covered by the inquisition, in a state of decided insanity without any lucid interval, the defendants were entitled to a verdict.

A verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiff.

Law Magazine.

---

UNCERTAINTY OF THE LAW.

A man falls into a dispute with his neighbor, touching an account, or any of the other matters of interest or feeling which men from the beginning of the world have been prone to dispute about. The parties discuss the question with each other, and pass through all the gradations of temper—from amiable civility to angry hostility—which are usual in oral polemics. They part in most inflaming wrath, and the claimant, before he has digested the venom of his spleen, runs to his counsel, tells his story in his own way, forgets those facts which are against him,—relates the rest with that sort of exaggeration which is natural to a party,—undertakes to prove the whole case as he has stated it,—and asks for legal redress. After such an examination of the statement (necessarily a most imperfect and inadequate examination,) as the counsel can make on such an occasion, a suit is accordingly instituted,—the trial comes on,—the plaintiff's witnesses are heard; they reduce in a great degree the coloring which the party himself had given; the defendant's witnesses prove many new facts, which totally change the complexion of the case,—it is decided in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff ever after complains of—THE UNCERTAINTY OF THE LAW.

The fault, it is evident, was in himself. If he had told the truth in the first instance, he might have saved his money, time and temper. We recollect to have heard of a juggler who had the faculty of enlarging his chest, so as to make a difference of twelve or fourteen inches in the circumference of the upper part of his body—and who astonished and alarmed an eminent tailor, by being measured for a coat in his contracted form, and expanding himself when it came to be tried on. The party who misleads his advocate, acts like the juggler. The suit which would have exactly answered his purpose, as his case appeared when it was laid before counsel, pinches him most uncomfortably in the region of the pockets, when a posterior mass of facts comes to be added at the trial. The difference is, that the juggler understood his own practical joke, and did not complain of the clumsiness of the tailor, or the uncertainty of his art.

It certainly sometimes happens that a party wilfully misrepresents to his counsel the facts upon which his claim or defence is grounded; but the case more frequently occurs of which we have above sketched an instance, where the misrepretation is not exactly wilful, but such as arises from natural bias and prejudice, when a man forgets the true duties of his legal adviser, considers him rather in the light of a judge, than an advocate—and labors to give him such a statement as will convince him that the client is right, rather than one which may enable him to give correct and judicious advice. The party deceives himself first, and then his lawyer.

From what principles of human nature does this arise? From very obvious ones, which we do not now stop to explain. The phenomenon is not of rare occurrence; it is to be met with in the various scenes of life. How often does it happen that the greatest difficulty which the physician has to encounter, is that of obtaining from the patient a candid statement of his symptoms?

At the present day every man has a fling at the uncertainty of the law. Yet upon investigation it would appear that in at least nine cases out of ten, the uncertainty complained of, is not in the LAW, but in the FACTS to which it is to be applied. The law has sins enough of its own to answer for;—defects sufficiently abundant—contradictions—doubts—even absurdities, which ought to be removed or amended,—but, with all these we repeat that, in proportion to the number of disputes which arise between man and man, there are very few cases, in which, if the facts were clearly ascertained, any respectable member of the profession could not without hesitation say what would be the law.

The event of LITIGATION is indeed almost always uncertain: the LAW rarely so. Nor could any plan be devised for destroying this quality of litigation. If the most minute, distinct, and intelligible rule were laid down for every variety of possible circumstances, (which, by the by, never has been or can be done,) there would remain sources of uncertainty almost as fruitful as those which now exist. For after all, what would be the rule of law proper to be applied in any case, would depend entirely upon the facts, and those facts must be proved by human testimony and to the satisfaction of a human tribunal; the testimony and the tribunal being both human, therefore both fallible;—the former liable to incorrectness or incompleteness occasioned by intentional falsehood, imperceptible bias, or defect of memory—the latter (throwing out of view wilful error as of rare occurrence,) equally liable to misdecision from prejudice, misapprehension or defect of judgment.

These are faults not of this or that particular system, but of human nature. They will be entirely cured, whenever mankind shall be rendered perfect in honesty, memory, apprehension and judgment, but not till then. Meanwhile, can human wisdom afford no alleviation of the evils actually arising from this source? Yes—a great deal, by so shaping the law of evidence, as to facilitate as much as possible, the investigation and discovery of the truth. The law cannot compel a liar to tell the truth, nor a weak man to tell it correctly, but it may provide such a mode of extracting the testimony as shall be best suited for the detection of the first, and the correction of the second, and it may at all events take care that the natural and necessary difficulties of the inquiry, shall not be increased by arbitrary and absurd rules for the exclusion of any light which might have been useful. This is a vast and most interesting subject,—one which we have merely hinted at now, but intend to consider at large hereafter. It is in this branch of the law, if in any, that reform, radical reform, is wanted.

In addition to this, the mode pointed out by law for the selection of those who are to decide upon the evidence when produced, should be such as may afford the greatest attainable security that they shall be men of integrity, competent learning, sagacity, and intellectual vigor.

By regulations of this kind, thus much may be effected, that the injurious consequences of the inherent and incurable vices of all human judicature shall not be unnecessarily aggravated; but when all is done, there will remain quite enough to establish the maxims, that the event of LITIGATION must always be UNCERTAIN, and HUMAN JUSTICE always imperfect.—Journal of Law.

LEGAL EDUCATION.

With the ignorant and the prejudiced, and even with many not included in either of these classes, the profession of the law labors under an odium arising from the supposed fondness of lawyers for disputation, and an excessive habit of talking inherent in their dispositions. We admit the justness of the charge as applicable to some. It cannot be otherwise than that a study, the aim of which is to bring forth the powers of the mind into action, that action consisting for the most part in speaking, should have the effect alluded to, upon the uneducated and the thoughtless—upon those whose taste has not been corrected by a classical education, and whose judgment has not been disciplined by meditation, and habits of close analysis. Advocates of this description must necessarily give vent to their crude ideas in loose and tedious harangues; and when nature has blessed, or, probably, most would say, cursed such with lively imaginations and great volubility of tongue, the effects, under which such numbers have suffered, have entailed a reproach on the whole profession. The reproach is unjust.—There will, necessarily, be like diversities in the characters of lawyers, as of other men; some will he modest, others impudent; some learned, some ignorant; some refined, others again, coarse; some eloquent and interesting, others, dry and tedious. The study and practice of the law, more than of any other science, has the effect of sharpening the intellect from the frequency of nice discrimination—and the mind is more expanded, not only on account of the broad principles of morality, that lie at the bottom of the rules regulating the conduct of man, and upon which the law is based, but also through the necessity of an acquaintance with the circle of arts and sciences, and of the characters of men: a knowledge of all which should combine to constitute the lawyer, in our idea of the term. If then the fondness for disputation and talkativeness, we have seen charged against the profession, mean a habit of close discrimination, nice, but not unmeaning distinctions and precision, to any, even the greatest extent in the use of language, we would very willingly plead guilty to the charge, and offer not one word in our defence.

But still more is charged against us; as if the advocate were raised in some measure above the law—exempt from the perplexities and anxieties so harassing to his clients, and had nothing to do but reap the harvest sown amid the dissensions, the bickerings, the misfortunes, the crimes and the tears of their fellow creatures. 'Wo unto you also, ye lawyers, for ye load men with burthens grievous to be borne, and ye yourselves touch not the burthen witn one of your fingers.' They charge the lawyer with the effects of their own follies—their own mistakes—their own guilt. The truth is, an honest practitioner is a great and positive good. We may appeal for the truth of what we are about to say, to the candor and generosity of numbers. How many heated tempers have been cooled by the calm advice of an advocate? How many, prompted by their passions, to wreak their vengeance upon an enemy, in open defiance of the peace of society, or foolishly to jeopard their little property in suits to gratify their pride or temper, have been induced to smooth the one, and lay aside the other, by the prudent suggestions of their adviser? Without lawyers the strong hand would usurp the place of the cool head; and the bad humors of mankind, which are now dissipated in suits, would exhibit themselves in a more tangible and pernicious shape.

Judge Brackenbridge remarked, that in the nature of things, the profession could not but be respectable; and as a proof of it, added, it was perhaps too much coveted: many embarking therein against their better genius. If they do this from any expectation of sudden or great wealth, disappointment will be the result. We doubt whether the mere thirst for money will ever make a great lawyer—there must exist an innate love of the science, which will alone prompt the student to the toil and patient industry, that will finally bestow on him, together with the honors of his vocation, that extensive and enduring practice, the sure source of riches. The feelings, then, which hurry so many to the legal ranks, must arise from a consciousness of the respectability and the influence which a knowledge of the law gives its professors. It is, however, radically erroneous, to make any young man a lawyer, who has not a previous liberal education. The feeling, nevertheless, is natural and correct, and requires only to be properly regulated. Something analogous to the case of the ignorant man, who seeing the advantages possessed by his educated neighbor, proposed to give his own son a quarter's schooling in Latin.

In our country, a government of laws, that profession which devotes itself to the study of the constitution and laws, must have great weight. Every member of the community feels, that he may be called upon at times to require the assistance of an advocate. Questions arising from the almost infinite variety of engagements between man and man, present themselves in so entangled a shape, that it requires a legal mind to unravel them. This feeling of dependance, if we may so call it, applies with equal force to the sister profession of medicine—and in each, superior information and judgment may be developed, to the great benefit of the applicant. The idea, we may add, of the lawyer and the orator, are in a great degree associated in this country: as was the case with the nations of antiquity. In England it may be different, from obvious reasons; though we doubt in its full extent, the propriety of Burke's remark concerning that respectable body, the lawyers of his own nation; there are too many shining examples to the contrary. Here, however, the image of the great lawyer is associated with that of the eloquent man, and to the honor of the profession, we think, correctly so. It, moreover, opens a road to the highest dignities of the state; to political distinction—to temporal fame and grandeur. All these considerations—the celebrated names that have adorned the science, from those of the great Greek and Roman advocates, down through the long, illustrious catalogue of British jurists, to those who flourish in our own times, and on our own soil, have cast an halo over the name of lawyer, which extends itself to the meanest of the profession. It should be the duty then of all interested in the success of the bar, to see that this lustre be in nowise dimmed, and to inculcate what appears to us the precept properly deducible from what we have said. That every student should bring with him to the active exercise of his professional duties, a mind thoroughly educated in the languages—sciences—and generally, all literature—to these let him add industry and close attention to the reasons and distinctions of the science—integrity of course, he must possess; for that, however, he must look to something else than a mere course of legal studies—then let him not speak until he has thoroughly studied and understood his subject; if he have, he will talk well, which can surely be no reproach to any one, whether he be or be not a lawyer.—Ib.

ENGLISH CASES.

LONDONDERRY ASSIZES—AUG.

The King vs. Bartholomew Kennedy, David Dickson, William Boyd, John M'Neil, Jonathan Mullin, Daniel M'Peake, William Magill, Robert Woods, Alexander M'Naght, James Scott, and William Orr.

This was a case which excited much interest, as the Government had sent the Attorney-General down to attend the prosecution—a circumstance very unusual, and the Court was crowded to excess to witness the proceedings.

About 11 o'clock, Bartholomew Kennedy, Jonathan Mullin, and others, were arraigned for having assembled in arms, with Orange flags and decorations, on the 12th of July, and with having committed sundry aggressions on the houses, property, and persons, of divers Roman Catholics, mentioned in the indictment.

Mr Sheil, as Counsel for the traversers, moved the Court for a postponement of the trial until next Assizes. He commenced his observations by stating that he did not complain, on the part of his clients, of the brevity of the period which had intervened between the date of the alleged offence and the present time. His clients, he said, were perfectly prepared to establish their innocence of the crimes imputed to them, by unimpeachable witnesses. Under other circumstances they would much prefer proceeding at once to trial—indeed it was their interest so to do, for they would thus be saved the serious inconveniences attendant upon a new appearance, to answer the same charge. On these and many similar topics the Learned Counsel dwelt with happy force of illustration. He then remarked that publications of the most inflammatory and unjustifiable nature, affecting the characters of his clients and touching on the transactions for which they were to be tried, had issued from the daily press—publications in which not merely was the guilt of the prisoners at the bar assumed as incontrovertible, but their conduct on the day in question stigmatised with all the virulence of vindictive calumny—themselves pointed out as objects of universal execration, and punishment the most severe called for and anticipated. This violation of every principle of justice (said Mr Sheil) took place when the Judge who was to try the case was in the adjoining county, and the Jury whose province was to decide on it about to be impannelled, under all the impressions such assertions were obviously intended to create. His Lordship would soon have an opportunity of seeing from what quarter these observations emanated, and would, he trusted, agree with him that they constituted sufficient ground for the postponement requested, in which he was happy to say the Attorney-General and the Crown Lawyers, with the love of justice which characterised them, fully concurred. Mr Sheil then handed to the Bench the speech of Mr George Dawson to the constituency of Dublin, assembled at Morrison's to receive his final determination on the invitation they had subscribed to him to offer himself as a Representative for that city.

His Lordship read the document, observing that he entirely coincided in the observations made by Mr Sheil—that publications such as these were calculated not only to poison justice at its very spring, but absolutely to prohibit the possibility of administering it. He knew it was a recognised, and he much wished it had been a better respected, principle, that persons accused of any crime should be tried by a Jury devoid of previous impressions; that printers were culpable in a high degree for giving currency to such expressions as those now complained of; that at the last Assizes at Enniskillen a case of much importance had been postponed on similar grounds, and he made some observations on the imprudence of such expressions being used in any public meetings on charges which were likely to come before Courts of Judicature. His Lordship highly complimented the Attorney-General and Crown Lawyers of the North West Bar, for the good feeling they had manifested; and after a most interesting and instructive series of constitutional observations, concluded by granting the motion, and admitted the prisoners to bail.

---

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT—APRIL.

Wilding vs. Bolding.

His Honor has been occupied for several days in the hearing of this cause, which is one of much importance, and displaying circumstances of a novel description. The principal question is, as to the next of kin of a Mr John Laurence, of Norfolk, in Virginia, merchant, who died in 1814, intestate. A very considerable sum of money (nearly 20,000*l.*) has been obtained out of Court under very 'extraordinary' circumstances, by parties representing themselves as next of kin of the intestate, and the present proceedings originate on a petition, to have the money replaced back into Court, to abide the result of the petitioner's claim, as being the next of kin and only legal heir to the deceased's estate.

Mr Bickersteth, Mr Knight, and Mr Smith have been heard at considerable length on behalf of the petitioner, and numerous affidavits have been read in support of the pedigree.

The Solicitor-General and other Counsel are to be heard on the behalf of the respondents, and the cause is likely to occupy several days yet.

His Honor has intimated his intention of taking no other business until the above cause is disposed of.

---

ROLLS COURT.

Wilson vs. Halliley.

In this case his Honor gave judgment. It was a case of construction of a will. The testator, after having directed the disposition of his personal estate, bequeathed a sum of 5,850*l.* to certain of his relatives, with remainder to their issue; and this sum he ordered to be raised by the sale of the rents and profits of his real estate. The question in the case was, whether the words 'sale of the rents and profits,' &c, were to be construed into an immediate mortgage of the estates in question? or, whether the 5,850*l.* should be raised by the application to that purpose of the annual rents and profits.

His Honor was of opinion that this was a case of intention alone, and to be decided by a careful consideration of the context of the will. Had the doubtful words stood alone, the intention of the testator must have been that the sum bequeathed should be immediately raised, as otherwise his objects might be defeated. But he afterwards directed that, in case any of the legatees should die before the sum should be raised, the bequest should descend to the issue lawfully begotten. Here he manifestly contemplated, not an immediate sale, but the necessity of a certain time elapsing before the legacy could be vested. Again, he authorised the trustees to lease out the estate; also, to defray the expenses of his nephew's education out of the rents and profits. He also left to his nephew the land which the latter held of him, subject to the application of its rents and profits to the purposes aforesaid; a similar bequest he made to another relative, on the same condition. These directions, especially the latter, afforded undoubted evidence that the real intention of the testator was, on the whole, different from what appeared on the simple construction of the bequest of the 5,850*l.* That sum should, therefore, be raised on the annual rents and profits of the estate alluded to.

---

Bradshaw vs. Tasker, &c.

This was a bill filed to obtain the direction of the Court as to the will of Johnson Bradshaw, who died, leaving a very considerable property. There were two difficulties in the case. First, whether a bequest of the testator, for the purpose of educating Roman Catholic children, should be applied according to his direction; or whether, uninfluenced by the late Act of Parliament, it should fall, and go over to the King? The second question was, whether the two of the executors should lend to a third a sum of 5,000*l.* on his bond, and with common interest, according to a power intrusted to them by the testator? On this point they wished to be guided by the opinion of the Court.

The former point was reserved for future discussion, when all the proper parties should be before the Court. On the latter, his Honor was of opinion that it would be advisable to direct an inquiry before the Master, whether the executor in question, Mr Thomas Darwin, was in such circumstances as would render the loan advisable.

---

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Sittings in Banco at Westminster Hall.

Harmer vs. Mitton.

This was an action tried before the Chief Justice at the late Sittings at Guildhall, and was brought to recover the sum of 60*l.* for the keep of a race-horse called Figaro. It was stated at the trial that the horse was bred by the plaintiff, and was kept for some time by him after it was bought by the defendant. In order to prove the purchase of the horse by the defendant, a letter, in his handwriting, was read, in which he acknowledged having bought the horse; and it also appeared that there was an agreement that the plaintiff was to keep it in his possession until paid for.

Mr Sergeant Wilde moved, on behalf of the defendant, for leave to enter a non-suit, on the grounds that there had been no proof upon the trial of any actual contract of sale or purchase between the parties. There had been no parting with the horse, no tender to the defendant; and it was proved that the plaintiff had a lien on the horse, and, consequently, it remained his property until paid for. Besides, the evidence relied on at the trial would not have been sufficient to support a claim for the price of the horse. The Learned Sergeant then cited several cases, which he considered decisive on this subject.

The Court granted a rule to show cause, the Chief Justice observing that it struck him as strange upon the trial that the plaintiff had not proceeded for the price of the horse.

Hickman vs. Wakley.

Mr Sergeant Wilde moved for a rule to show cause why the verdict found for the plaintiff in this case should not be set aside, and a new trial granted, on the grounds that it was given contrary to evidence. The action was brought upon a bill of exchange for 104*l.* accepted by Mr Wakley, the proprietor of the Lancet, in consideration of a quantity of paper to be supplied by the plaintiff for the use of that publication. After the acceptance of the bill in question had been proved, the case, on the part of the defendant, showed that the bill was given in anticipation of paper to be delivered for the use of the Lancet; that only three reams had been received by the defendant, who refused to take any more, finding that the paper was of an inferior quality, and quite unfit for the use of the Lancet, and, if used, would have tended to injure the sale of that work. The plaintiff was made aware of that circumstance, but he insisted on furnishing the rest of the paper of the same quality. The case, on the part of the defendant, was proved by three witnesses. The Jury, however, thought to find for the plaintiff, but he (Mr Sergeant Wilde) had no hesitation in saying that the verdict was contrary to all evidence in the case, and that a new trial ought to be granted; indeed it appeared to him that the Jury did not well understand what they were considering.

The Court granted a rule Nisi.

RECENT ENGLISH DECISIONS.

AWARD.

In a suit, instituted to enforce the payment of legacies against the real and personal estate of the testator, an order was made, referring all matters in difference between the parties to the determination of two arbitrators: the arbitrators afterwards made their award, ordering the executors to pay a certain sum to the complainants, in full satisfaction of all demands against the executors and the testator; but giving liberty to certain of the defendants, who, under the will, took interests in the real estate of the testator, to prosecute their claims, either at law or in equity, in like manner as if the order of reference had never been made. Held, that the intention of the order of reference was, that the rights of all the parties should be adjusted; and, therefore, as the award was not final, it must be set aside.—Turner vs. Turner, 3 Russell, 494.

BARON AND FEME.

Under articles, made previous to marriage, a married woman had a separate property, with a power of appointment over it, by deed or other writing, &c. She joined her husband in a promissory note for 130*l.* advanced by him to the husband. Other sums were subsequently advanced, as to which the wife did not join in any security. Held, that her act was an equitable appointment under the settlement to be satisfied from the rents and profits of that property, and not by sale or mortgage. The Court would not view it as a security.—Field vs. Sowle, 4 Russell, 112.

If a feme covert insist upon the increase of undue influence by the husband she must prove it; it is not for the plaintiff to prove a negative.—S. C.

BOND.

In equity, a creditor, who has been restrained by injunction from proceeding at law while the debt was under the penalty, has a right, if there is no neglect or default on his part, to principal and interest, beyond the penalty of the bond.—Grant vs. Grant, 3 Russell, 607.

CONVERSION.

A testatrix devised her real and personal estate to trustees to sell, and directed that the proceeds of her real estate should be taken as part of her personal estate, and that out of the moneys to arise by such sale, and out of all other her personal estate, several legacies should be paid; and she gave the residue to A for life, with remainder over. Held, that the real estate was absolutely converted into personality; that certain lapsed legacies belonged to the residuary legatee; and that the year's income of the fund, out of which the legacies had been paid, (the payment having been delayed a year after the testator's death,) formed part of the residue.—Amphlett vs. Parke, 4 Russell, 75.

CONSENT OF COUNSEL.

A party is bound by the consent of his counsel given in Court, though they had no instructions to consent; if, at the time, they were in possession of all the facts of the case, the knowledge of which was essential to the proper exercise of their discretion.

Quære, how far a party is bound by the negligence of his solicitor in not immediately objecting to such an order, when neither the party nor his solicitor was present, and no instruction to consent had been given by either?—Furnival vs. Boyle, 4 Russell, 142.

DEVISE.

The interest of the property of a testator, after the death of his wife, was to go to his two daughters, J. and E., and 200*l.* yearly was to come out of the share of E. for his grandson, when he attained 21. As to the principal, his daughters were to have power to dispose of it by will among their children or grand-children, 'except that proportion given to E., from which the interest was to arise to his grandson, viz. 4000*l.*, which sum should be his grandson's property.' Held, that the 4000*l.* vested in the grandson, although it was not payable until his mother's death.—Livesay vs. Livesay, 3 Russell, 542.

[This decision reversed an order of the Master of the Rolls, as to this particular point. See Law Magazine, vol. 3. p. 552. tit. Devise, 14.]

A son died before his father, leaving a widow, to whom he gave all his property. The son's estate being insufficient for the payment of his debts, the father, by a codicil to his will, directed his trustees to pay his son's debts, and named the son of his son his residuary devisee and legatee. Held, that the true construction of the father's codicil was, that he intended only the payment of such portion of the debts of the son, as his son's estate would be insufficient to pay.—Walker vs. Lodge, 3 Russell, 459.

DONATIO MORTIS CAUSA.

Quære, whether a donatio mortis causâ is avoided by the making of a will or codicil subsequently?

Whether it can be coupled with a condition, or made subject to a trust?

Whether, where a donatio mortis causâ of a mortgage debt was alleged by the party claiming it as donee, to have been coupled with a remainder over; a gift of the same remainder over, by a codicil subsequently made, is to be considered as a satisfaction?—Hambrooke vs. Simmons, 4 Russell, 25.

EVIDENCE.

Private entries in the books of a corporation, which are under their own control and to which none but the corporation have access, cannot be made use of to establish rights of the corporation against third parties. Where, therefore, the question was to whom the nomination of a curate belonged—to the vicar, or to the corporation—entries in their books were not received in evidence to establish the right of the corporation as against the vicar.—The Attorney-General vs. The Corporation of Warwick, 4 Russell, 222.

EXECUTOR.

An executor or trustee is not to be allowed, without question, whatever sum he thinks fit to pay his solicitor; and the master, without regularly taxing the bill, will moderate it by a deduction of such charges as upon the face of them are irregular or excessive.—Johnson vs. Telford, 3 Russell, 477.

Where an executor, although acting bonâ fide and under a conviction that there was a sufficiency of assets to pay all the debts, allowed specific legatees to retain the articles bequeathed to them, he was held liable for those articles, should there be a deficiency of assets; and, that being uncertain, an account was directed of the value of the specific legacies, received by the legatees, by consent of the executor, with interest to be computed at four per cent.—Spode vs. Smith, 3 Russell, 511.

Where a testatrix appointed A. B. 'her executor, to see her will put in force;' A. B, was held to be a trustee for the next of kin.—Braddon vs. Farrand, 4 Russell, 87.

An agent, named executor, is not entitled to charge commission, for business done subsequently to the testator's death.—Sheriff vs. Axe, 4 Russell, 33.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE.

Devise of lands to A for life, with a power of limiting them by way of a jointure to his wife. A, previously to and in consideration of his marriage, demises these lands to trustees for a term of ninetynine years, in trust to secure the payment of a yearly sum to his wife, as pin-money, during the coverture; and he limited a jointure to her after his death. The same parties on the same day executed another instrument, by which A covenanted not to sell or encumber the lands comprised in the term; and it was declared, that if he should at any time do so or attempt to do so, the trustees of the term should receive the rents and profits, and apply them as they might think fit, for the maintenance and support of A or his wife, children or issue. Held, that this covenant and proviso were fraudulent and void, as against a subsequent encumbrancer of A's life estate.—Phipps vs. Lord Ennismore, 4 Russell, 131.

INSURANCE.

The agent of the Albion Insurance Company had an office in Glasgow, at which J. P. and others the owners of a steam vessel, effected an insurance, receiving from the company's agent a contract, importing generally that a policy, corresponding with the memorandum, would be prepared at the office in London, and delivered to the assured, or their order, 'on the third Monday in the ensuing month, or on any subsequent day.' The policy that was sent down and which was never shown to or demanded by the assured, contained a clause that it 'should be suspended, and remain out of force, during the time the steam-boat might be at sea.' At the end of the year the policy was renewed through the agent at Glasgow, who delivered to the assured a memorandum, signed by the company's secretary in London, signifying that the above policy had been renewed, but no notice of the exception was ever communicated to the assured. The vessel was shortly afterwards destroyed by fire on her passage from Liverpool to Dublin. Held, that the memorandum was the contract of the parties, which had not been fulfilled by the company, who were therefore liable for damages; that the act 6 G. 1. c. 18, so far as it declares all policies executed by six persons, other than the London Insurance and Royal Exchange Assurances, to be absolutely void, does not extend to Scotland: that a contract so entered into was a Scotch, and not an English contract.—Pattison, appellant; Mills, respondent, 2 Bligh, 519.

RECENT AMERICAN DECISIONS.

CORPORATION.

1. A corporation may be bound by an implied promise. Smith vs. First Congregational Meeting-house in Lowell. 8 Pick. 178

2. An act, incorporating individuals for a particular purpose, does not vest in the corporation, land previously owned by them as tenants in common and previously used for the same purpose. Leffingwell vs. Elliott. 455.

3. Parol evidence is not admissible to show that a deed given by one of such tenants in common, of his share in the stock of the corporation, was intended to pass his share of the land. Ibid.

COSTS.

1. An original writ was endorsed by the plaintiff's attorney thus, 'A. B. by his attorney, C. D.' Held, that C. D. was liable as indorser of the writ, for costs. Chapman vs. Phillips. 25.

2. In order to entitle a trustee, under St. 1794, c. 65, § 4, to costs, it is not necessary that the answer made by him at the first term should be sworn to in court. Ibid.

3. Where a person summoned as trustee is discharged, and recovers judgment for costs against the plaintiff, the endorser of the writ is not liable for such costs, his liability only extending to costs recovered by the defendant. Ibid.

COVENANT.

1. The defendant, in 1799, conveyed to the plaintiff land in New York, with covenants of warranty and freedom from incumbrances. A judgment had been recovered in 1786 against the defendant's grantor, which constituted a lien on the land, and in 1801, upon a scire facias to revive the judgment, an execution was issued, by virtue of which the land was sold by the sheriff and a deed given by him to the purchaser. Held, that as the plaintiff's title was entirely defeated, there was a breach of the covenant against incumbrances, and that the damages were the amount of the consideration and interest. Jenkins vs. Hopkins. 346.

2. The testimony of witnesses, that they were in possession of the land claiming title under a grantee of such purchaser, without proof of a conveyance by deed from such grantee, was held not to be sufficient evidence of an actual eviction under a paramount title, to authorize the plaintiff to recover on the covenant of warranty. Ibid.

3. If a grantee of land with warranty, being evicted by a paramount title, extinguishes such title for a nominal consideration, he can recover upon the warranty the amount of such consideration only, together with a reasonable compensation for any trouble and expenses to which he may have been put in procuring the extinguishment. Leffingwell vs. Elliott. 455.

4. Land granted by A to T with covenants against all incumbrances and of general warranty, was nevertheless subject to a mortgage to C, on which C subsequently recovered the conditional judgment and obtained possession of the land. While the land continued in T's possession, he mortgaged it for a smaller amount than C's mortgage. After C had thus obtained possession, T brought an action against A for a breach of the above covenants, in which it was held:—

1. That the covenant against incumbrances was broken when the deed was executed, but that T could only recover nominal damages, as he had not paid anything to remove the incumbrance:

2. That the covenant of warranty was broken; that T, by his mortgage, had assigned this covenant, to the extent of the sum due on this mortgage, to the mortgagee; that the damages recoverable in this action, were the amount of C's judgment and costs, deducting the amount of the mortgage which T had made himself; and that if before judgment T paid off the mortgage made by himself, he could recover in this action the whole amount due to C. Tufts vs. Adams. 547.

DEBT.

1. Counts on a special contract under seal, and a quantum meruit for labor done and materials found, may be joined in an action of debt. Smith vs. First Congregational Meeting-house in Lowell. 178.

2. An action of debt or assumpsit may be maintained upon an implied promise, for labor done and materials found under a special contract which has not been performed on the part of the plaintiff. Ibid.

EVIDENCE.

1. Where in an action of covenant upon an indenture, whereby the defendant agreed to furnish money for the purpose of carrying on the general business of brokerage, embracing, as time and opportunity shall give, the vending of lottery tickets, the defendant, after oyer, pleaded that the object and intent of the indenture was the buying and selling of lottery tickets, against the form of the statute, and issue was taken thereon, it was held, that evidence to prove that the plaintiff did, subsequently to the contract, buy and sell lottery tickets, was pertinent to the issue and properly admitted. Williams vs. Woodman. 78.

2. Held, that after a verdict for the defendant on such issue, the plaintiff could not object that the plea attempted to put in issue before a jury the construction of a sealed contract, but that such objection should have been taken by demurrer. Ibid.

3. One of two witnesses to a deed deposed that he did not recollect witnessing it, but knew the attestation to be in his hand-writing, and that the other subscribing witness had a short time previously, but long after the commencement of the suit in which the deposition was taken, left the commonwealth, after advertising his intention so to do, and that though the deponent did not recollect having seen him write his name, he had often received letters from him, and thought the signature in question was his hand-writing. Held, that this was sufficient proof of the execution of the deed for the purpose of reading it in evidence. Russell vs. Coffin. 143.

4. Where a witness on the stand, upon cross-examination, contradicted a deposition he had previously given in the same case, the party calling him was not permitted to call other witnesses in support of his general character for truth. Ibid.

5. The general rule, that a party cannot give evidence of his declarations in his own favor, applies to declarations made by the plaintiff in an action which is defended, pursuant to the statute, by creditors of the defendant. Carter vs. Gregory. 165.

6. A note was made by a failing debtor, on which the payee immediately made an attachment of the debtor's property. Part of the alleged consideration of the note was an acceptance made by the payee, of an order drawn on him by the debtor in favor of another creditor. A subsequent attaching creditor being admitted, under the statute, to defend, it was held, that the plaintiff could not introduce evidence of his own declarations made on the day when the note was given, to show that the acceptance was made before the attachment. Ibid.

7. Where in assumpsit on a policy of insurance on a ship, the declaration alleged that the ship, by force and arms, and in a hostile manner, was captured, seized and taken by certain armed soldiers and thereby wholly lost, and the plaintiff proved by witnesses, that she was seen in the possession of armed soldiers in a foreign country, and that she never returned home, it was held, that he had made out, primâ facie, a loss, and that he was not bound to read in evidence the record of a trial and decree of condemnation, which he had in court, and which he offered to the defendant to be used by him if he thought proper. Dorr vs. Pope. 232.

8. In an action by the assignee of a mortgage to recover possession of the mortgaged premises, against a disseisor, the affidavit of his assignor is not admissible in evidence to prove the loss of the mortgage deed, for the assignor might be a witness in the case. Poignard vs. Smith. 272.

9. In such an action, if diligent search and inquiry are made for the mortgage deed, by the demandant, and it cannot be found, he may give a copy from the registry in evidence. Ibid.

10. If the mortgage deed appear from the registry copy to be an indenture interchangeably signed and sealed, and the part belonging to the mortgagee is proved to be lost, in order to make the copy admissible, due diligence must be shown to ascertain whether any counterpart exists, and if it does, to obtain it to be used in the trial. Ibid.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1830.

SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

MARCH TERM—1830.

John Dodge Ex'r. vs. Thomas H. Perkins.

Continued from page 119.

A factor is in duty bound to account to his principal in a reasonable time, without any demand, in cases where a demand would be impracticable or highly inconvenient. He would be held, according to the course of business, to give his principal information of his progress in the transaction, and if he should neglect unreasonably to forward his account to his employer, this negligence would be a breach of his contract, and subject him to an action. Clark v. Moody, 17 Mass. R. 149; Lady Ormond v. Hutchinson, 13 Vesey, 53; Earl Hardwicke v. Vernon, 14 Vesey, 504.

It is the settled law of New York, that interest is to be allowed for money received or advanced for the use of another 'after a default of payment.' Campbell v. Mesier, 6 Johns. Ch. R. 24.

So if the agent had engaged to invest the money, but had omitted to do so, he is to answer for interest from the time he should have invested. Brown v. Southouse, 3 Bro. C. C. 107; The People v. Gasherie, 9 Johns. R. 71.

There are some late English cases, which would seem to be contrary to the rule requiring interest after non-payment at a day certain.

Thus in Gordon v. Swan, 12 East, 419, which was for the price of goods sold and delivered, payable on a certain day. Lord Ellenborough said that 'the giving of interest should be confined to bills of exchange and such like instruments.' No reasons are given, and it is not easy to see why the same rule of damages should not be applied in that case, as in the case of any other contract for money to be paid, at a certain day.

In Higgins v. Sargent, 2 B. & C. 348, the restriction of interest to mercantile securities was recognised, and C. J. Abbot stated the rule to be established, that interest is allowed by law only upon mercantile securities, or in those cases where there has been an express promise to pay interest, or where such promise is to be implied from the usage of trade or other circumstances.

Now I have no objection to this general rule, but I very much doubt the application of it according to the case of Higgins v. Sargent. That was upon a policy upon the life of one Burton, payable in six months after proof of his death.

It is difficult to perceive a good reason why interest should not have been given after the money ought to have been paid according to the promise.

That, we have seen, was the principle adopted by Lord Mansfield and his associates, where the promise was raised by implication of law. A fortiori would it seem to apply to an undertaking in writing. Lord Thurlow in Bedham v. Riley, 1 Bro. C. C. 239, and 2 Bro. C. C. 2, after noticing many cases, comes to the conclusion, that 'undoubtedly all contracts to pay, give a right to interest from the time when the principal ought to be paid.'

We have no statute regulating this subject, and none is necessary. Upon the principles of the common law, we think it clear that interest is to be allowed. Where the law by implication makes it the duty of the party to pay over the money to the owner without any previous demand on his part.

Thus where it was obtained and held by fraud, interest should be calculated from the time when it was received. So where there has been a default of payment according to agreement expressed or implied to pay on a day certain, or after demand, or after a reasonable time.

The nature and extent of the undertaking must depend upon the facts proved in each particular case. But when it is ascertained at what time the money should have been paid, the law raises a promise to pay damages for the detention after the breach of the contract. For it is the essence of every assumpsit or undertaking, that it is to be performed specially, or that damages shall be paid for the non-performance.

—

Mr Gardiner, in favor of setting aside the verdict, contended, upon the grounds set forth in the motion for setting aside the verdict, so far as interest was concerned, that, 1st. No interest could be charged to an agent before a demand was made for payment; more especially here, where there was no motive to transact the business on the part of J. & T. H. Perkins, except the friendly feelings which had existed between Unite Dodge, deceased, and James Perkins, of the house of J. & T. H. Perkins, who also had deceased. James Perkins, as also the house of J. & T. H. Perkins, were merely the friendly agents of Unite Dodge, whose brother John Dodge, now represented him, and acted not as commission merchants, and entirely without the payment of commission, on the part of Unite Dodge. He assumed that in such case, on the very threshhold, no interest could be charged upon money paid into the hands of an agent, unless a legal demand for that money had first been made from that agent. On this head, it was true, that the great mass of European authorities had not been in strict unison, but the difference of opinion on this head, might result from a too casual examination into the principles involved. But he concluded, that the subject of liabilities in this case, might be divided into two great classes, viz:

First—where interest seemed to be incident to the debt; and second, as damages in the nature of a penalty, is the case of non-payment, after a demand had been made. There was no principle in the common law which sanctioned the payment of interest, neither was there in the statute law; but the principle of payment of interest grew out of a contract or contracts in the use of trade, and even there, interest was not recoverable until after demand and refusal to pay. Interest was never implied from a breach of contract to repay. He here cited as authorities, 1 Bosanquet and Puller, 306; 2 Campbell, 406; 15 East, 223. It was otherwise in some cases in this Commonwealth, because of the usage of trade. He here cited, 12 M. R., 21. There interest was allowed after demand, but the principles of interest were not discussed. Also, 1 Peck 121, interest was allowed after request. He cited a case of lawyer and client, where no interest was allowed, and the length of time which the money remained in the lawyer's hands, was of no consequence. Interest could not be recovered until a demand, and a refusal to pay. 8 Taunton, 45; 3 Pickering, 261. An auctioneer had sold an estate and deposited the money; when the title was disputed successfully, he was decreed to refund the money, but without interest. Again, where an administrator had paid the whole of the debt of an intestate, who, afterwards it was found, had died insolvent, and he called upon the creditor to refund the money which he had received above his proportionate share of the estate, he was decreed to refund the principal, but without interest before demand. 1 Campbell, 50; 2 Campbell, 427; 4 Brown's Chancery Reports, 321, &c, wherein the uses of trade as to money, were concerned. 1 Pickering, 314. All this class of cases went upon the ground of contract. There was another class which went on the ground as ex delictu, on the part of him who retained the money. 5 Bosanquet and Puller, 205. (Day's edition.) If the money is demanded, in the form of contract, the interest sounds in the nature of damages, and the court will permit interest, if there is a wrongful detention of money contrary to the contract. 3 Bingham, 353. First, interest is to be paid if the nature of the contract stated it. Second, where it was wrongfully detained after demand. 3 Cowel, 436; 5 Cowel, 387. One of these cases was where there was an agent of a manufacturing company who had mingled the money of the house with his own. In this case, the subject of interest was thoroughly sifted. He cited the opinion of Judge Spencer, also 5 Cowel, 609. If he was a trustee of the company, and had mixed the funds entrusted to him with his own trading capital, so that the one could not be distinguished from the other, so as to lock it up from the use of the company, then he was liable for interest. But if, on the other hand, this capital was not in constant use by the trustee, and he had never taken the key of these funds into his own hands, and subjected them to a profitable or prejudicial gain or loss by trade, or otherwise, he was not liable for interest for money which had been of no use to him. Interest in any case against an agent, was only given as damages. (4 M. R.) In the case 7 M. R., interest was given as damages for malpractise in not endorsing money paid upon an execution—that was an action for moneys had and received. So in 9 Johns. People v. Gasherie, where interest was given on the principal, for fraud on the part of the payer. 11 M. R., 504—also where fraud and imposition was practised upon the Plaintiff, who was non compos—so 13 M. R. 218—17 M. R., 560, (money won at play.) 1 Pickering, 211, (money obtained under color of law.)

RECENT ENGLISH PUBLICATIONS.

The Solicitor's New and Complete Table of Costs, in the Court of Chancery, together with Charges in Conveyancing; also Fines and Recoveries. By J. Wickstead, Gent. 8vo. Price 8s. boards.

Haggard's Ecclesiastical Reports. Vol. II. Part IV. Price 7s. 6d. boards.

Juridical letters; addressed to the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, in reference to the present crisis of Law Reform Letter I. by Eunomus. Price 1s. sewed.

Cresswell's Insolvent Reports. Part III. Price 5s. sewed.

Lloyd and Welsby's Mercantile Reports. Part II. Price 5s. sewed.

Bingham's Reports, C. P. Vol. VI. Part IV. Price 6s. sewed.

Summary of the Law of Bills of Exchange, Cash Bills, and Promissory Notes. By Sir John Bayley, Knt. one of the Justices of his Majesty's Court of King's Bench. The Fifth Edition, with considerable Additions; Edited by Francis Bayley, of Lincoln's Inn, Esq. Barrister at Law. 8vo. Price 16s. boards.

Russell's Reports in Chancery. Vol. III. Part III. Price 9s. 6d. sewed.

GRAY AND BOWEN, No. 141, Washington Street, Boston, have recently published the following valuable works.

I. A DESCRIPTION OF TREMONT HOUSE; WITH ARCHITECTURAL ILLUSTRATIONS.—4to.

'Jam scires ab introitu primo—herculentum et amvenum videre et diversonium.' APULEIUS, M. A V.

This work is embellished with a copper-plate engraving, representing the front of the house, and thirty lithographic prints, exhibiting the details of the structure. Its object will be understood by the following extract from the preface.

'The present publication is intended to satisfy a curiosity, which frequent inquiries for a description of Tremont House were supposed to indicate.

'Its original plan was to furnish such particulars relative to this establishment as strangers might wish to possess, but it has been extended so as to comprehend many architectural details, which will probably be interesting to mechanics; as much of the ornamental work of Tremont House was copied or adopted from books, not commonly in their hands, and has not before been executed in this country.

II. AN EPITOME OF UNIVERSAL GEOGRAPHY; or, a Description of the various Countries of the Globe; with a view of their Political Condition at the present time. With sixty Maps. By NATHAN HALE.

III. A DICTIONARY OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE; or, an Explanation of Words and Things connected with all the Arts and Sciences. Illustrated with numerous Wood Cuts. By GEORGE CRABB, A. M., Author of 'English Synonymes,' 'Technological Dictionary,' and 'Historical Dictionary.'

IV. THE VESTAL — A TALE OF POMPEII. 1 Vol. 12mo.

'Oh Time, thou beautifier of the dead,
Adorner of the ruin.' CHILDE HAROLD.

V. AUTHORSHIP. A Tale. By a New Englander over Sea. 1 Vol. 12mo.

VI. AN ORATION; Delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, Cambridge, Mass. August 26th, 1830. By the Rev. ORVILLE DEWEY.

VII. THE DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Published under the Direction of the President of the United States, from the Original Manuscripts in the Department of State, conformably to a resolution of Congress, of March 27, 1818. Edited by JARED SPARKS.

This important Correspondence, now for the first time published, will form eleven volumes. Eight are already published and the remainder will appear very shortly.

VIII. JEFFERSON'S WORKS, In four Volumes. Accompanied with a Portrait on steel, and a fac-simile of the original draft of the Declaration of Independence. Second Edition.

IX. THE NEW TESTAMENT, conformed to Griesbach's Text. 1 Vol. 12mo.

THE TOKEN, a Christmas and New Year's Present, for 1831. Edited by S. G. Goodrich.

'Then take my flower, and let its leaves
Beside thy heart be cherished near,
While that confiding heart receives
The thought it whispers to thine ear.'

The engravings for the Token of this year are executed by Cheney, Ellis, Gallaudet, and others; among the contributors are Dewey, Greenwood, Miss Sedgwick, Mrs Sigourney, Hall, Peabody, Wetmore, author of a Year in Spain, author of Tales of the Northwest, Neal, Thatcher, Mrs Hale, and others of the first reputation.

The work is larger than heretofore, and is done up in splendid embossed morocco. The literary department is considered decidedly superior to the former years, and in all respects it has received the greatest care and attention. Oct 23.

---

BIGELOW'S SUPPLEMENT. HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. have just published A Digest of Pickering's Reports, Volumes 2—7, being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports.—By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law. Oct. 23.

---

PICKERING'S REPORTS, Vol. 8th. This day published and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. Oct. 23.

---

This day received by GRAY & BOWEN, 141 Washington Street.

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW, No XXV. for July 1830.

Contents: 1, The Ballot: 2, Carwell: 3, Government of Lower Canada: 4, Wilson's life of Daniel de Foe: 5, Greek Lexicons: 6, Physiology and Cultivation of Trees: 7, Game of Life: 8, Dobell's Siberia: 9, Bishop of London and Sabbath Breaking: 10, Three Courses and a Dessert: 11, Clarendon: 12, Moorsom's Nova Scotia: 13, Religious Disabilities: 14, Stamp Act and Synod of Somerset House: 15, Patronage of Art, and the President of the Royal Academy: 16, Distress of the Country: 17, Egyptian Notation: 18, Great Britain and France; Postscript to the Article on the Ballot.

The Westminster Review has existed long enough, to see the cause in which its efforts were begun, make a notable advance in the opinions of mankind. Its proposed object was to prove, that the interests which were supposed confined to the wretched and weak, are in reality those of all ranks and orders in the state; and if the course has been successfully shaped, it is unnecessary to discuss what portion of the progress has been consequent on the efforts of the rowers, and what on the general tide which carried them upon their way. The term which was once employed as a name of low reproach, has found its way into high places, and is gone forth as the title of a class, who glory in their designation, and are not afraid to speak with their enemies in the gate. Like the early Christians, they may say to their opponents—Hesterni sumus, et vestra omnia implevimus, urbes, insulas, castella, municipa, concilabula, castra ipsa, tribus, decurias, palatium, senatum, forum.—They cannot even add the Sola vobis, relinquimus templa. What has been gained by reason, will never be wittingly abused; and it will be fame enough for common men, if what they have hitherto defended they hereafter can assist. Oct. 23.

---

DANE'S ABRIDGMENT OF AMERICAN LAW, in 9 vols. with an appendix. A few complete sets for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. H., G. & Co. will also supply the ninth vol. and the appendix to those who are owners of the eight volumes, and the appendix separate to those who have the ninth. Oct. 23.

---

ENGLISH LAW BOOKS. This day received and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & Co.

Browne's Chancery Practice, under the New Orders with the Sanction of the Court, in 2 vols. 8 vo.

Willoch on the Laws of the Medical Profession, 1 vol. 8 vo.

Finelly's Law and Practice of Elections, 1 vol. 12 mo.

Crabbe's History of the English Law, 1 vol. 8 vo.

Oct. 23.

---

PRINTING. The Printing House of I. R. BUTTS, corner of Washington and School Streets, is supplied with materials suitable for Book, Job, and every other description of Printing. Oct. 23.

---

DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS, TO WIT: District Clerk's Office.

BE it remembered, that on the seventeenth day of August, A. D. 1830, in the fifty-fifth year of the Independence of the United States of America, Lewis Bigelow of the said district, has deposited in this office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as author in the words following, to wit:

'A Digest of Pickering's Reports, volumes II.—VII., being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law.'

In conformity to the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned;' and also to an act entitled, 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled, 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned,' and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints.'

JNO. W. DAVIS, Clerk of the District of Massachusetts.

---

GRAY & BOWEN, have in preparation, and will very shortly put to press,

A NEW DICTIONARY OF MEDICAL SCIENCE AND LITERATURE; which will contain a concise account of the various subjects in Anatomy, Physiology, Pathology, Therapeutics, Materia Medica, Surgery, Obstetrics, and Pharmacy, with the Etymology and Orthoepy of the terms of their Greek, Latin, French, and German synonymes;—a copious Bibliography appended to the different articles, and Biographical Notices of the most eminent Authors in the different departments of Medical Science, with a Catalogue of their principal works mentioned and an Epitome of the existing state of Medical Science and Literature. By Robley Dunglison, M. D. Professor of Medicine in the University of Virginia &c, &c.

While many of the nations of Continental Euro possess Dictionaries, which have kept pace with t advancing condition of Medical Science, Great Britain and America possess it may be said, but one of a concise character,—that of Hooper,—which independently of its want of accuracy on many points, is incontestibly far behind the present state of Medical Science and Literature, and unfit for the purposes of the Medical Student. In proof of this, it will be sufficient to remark, that the New Dictionary will contain at least five thousand words more than are to be found in that publication,—while the circumstance of the Dictionary of Hooper being stereotyped in this country, renders it impracticable to make the necessary additions to it, were the ground work such as to render such a course advisable.

The work will not be a mere Dictionary of terms; it will comprise concise histories of diseases: a description and doses of various kinds of medicine, with formula for the different Pharmacentrical preparations, &c, &c.

The important publications daily appearing in France and Germany, have induced the author to add the French and German synonymes to the various terms; so that the work will really contain the substance of an English, French and German Dictionary, at a comparatively trifling expense.—The French Index will be found to include every word in the 'Dictionaire des Science Medicales,' which consists of sixty volumes, as well as in the smaller Dictionaries more recently published.

Great attention has been, moreover, paid to the Greek and Latin synonymes, so that the Dictionary will, it is trusted, form a safe and convenient guide to the study of ancient and modern authors on Medicine.

It will be comprised in one large volume, 8vo. Oct 23.

---

HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. No 134 Washington Street, Boston, have in press a Treatise on Corporations, with an appendix of the Corporation acts of each state, by Joseph K. Angell, author of a Treatise on Water Courses, Tide Water, Limitations, &c. Oct. 23.

---

LAW BOOKS.—HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. 134 Washington Street, have on hand a large Stock of American and English Law Books, comprising a complete assortment of the best editions of all works in general use. They also purchase and sell second hand Law Books—terms liberal.

H., G. & Co. supply any volumes that may be wanted of Massachusetts or Pickering's Reports.

---

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of administering and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire: and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Price $1,25.

---

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. This day published by HILLIARD, GRAY, & Co. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law: being a continuation of the Digest of Massachusetts Reports; and also a continuation of Metcalf's Digest of the same work. Neatly bound in Sheep,3,50.—Calf, $4,00

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1830. NO. XVII.

MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE

LEGITIMACY.

This article will be devoted to the very important questions arising from disputed legitimacy; and before concluding this series of papers, a brief survey will be taken of some topics which, though not absolutely medico-legal in their nature, may yet more properly be classed under this than any other head. Without professing to make additions to the numerous facts collected by the very learned and laborious writers, from whom our materials have been borrowed, we have sometimes presumed to dispute the inferences they have drawn; and before we have done with the present subject we may be found chargeable with a graver heresy by those who implicitly reverence all the decisions of our highest legal tribunal. Meanwhile, we trust, a short history of the English law of legitimacy will not prove unamusing or uninstructive to the reader.

The nature and number of circumstances, admitted to prove the offspring of a married woman illegitimate, have varied in all ages and countries. In all, however, the demonstration of absolute and incurable impotence has of course been held sufficient to bastardize the children, as it has to nullify the marriage. In most recorded cases on this point, as the complainants were not acknowledged mothers, (for then they would have been self-stigmatized with adultery,) no question of legitimacy was involved. As, however, it is one which has sometimes arisen out of such cases, and may again arise, it becomes necessary to consider what facts have been, or ought to be, recognised as proofs of this corporeal imbecility. The best writers seem to be agreed, that there is no known cause of impotence without remedy, excepting mal-formation or defect in the generative organs. The unpleasant detail of all the forms of this calamity is only necessary in a medical treatise; but it may be mentioned, as worthy of remark that very material deformity may exist without privation of the generative power. We find, in ancient times, that the non-appearence of testes was held a complete evidence of inability, which, upon the principle that two negatives make an affirmative, seems logically as well as physically true. Pope Sextus V. wrote to his nuncio in Spain, in 1587, to forbid the marriage of all who were thus destitute; and Philip II. executed the order, which, Mahon tells us, affected many in that kingdom. The parliament of Paris, a century later, forbade marriage where they were not visibly apparent. Yet experience has shewn that this deficiency may be merely external; and it has been even known to occur with individuals particularly distinguished for libertinism. It should seem, then, that good medical evidence, at least, was indispensable to establish charges of this kind; yet, to the disgrace of France, until the close of the seventeenth century, any profligate woman might there obtain a legal divorce, unless the accused came off triumphant from the ordeal of a public congress. In this country, on the contrary, there appears in earlier times to have been a leaning in favor of the husband's ability. Dr George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury, in a narrative we shall presently consider, relates the case of one Bury, which was tried in 1561. This man was cited by his wife for impotence, before the Ecclesiastical Court. The physicians deposed that he had but one testicle, and that not larger than a bean. The want of access was proved also. On these grounds the Court very reasonably gave sentence of divorce. But Bury, who seems to have been a bold man, married again, and his second wife produced a son. After some years, the question of the offspring's legitimacy was agitated, and the Court decided thereupon, that the second marriage was utterly void, because the judgment was a false one which had declared Bury impotent. We have no record how the Judges were so absolutely satisfied of the second wife's fidelity: but it happens rather curiously, that the luckless son was illegitimate, according to either decision on the husband's powers.

Much attention was attracted to the question of impotence throughout England, in the famous case of the Countess of Essex. She, as our readers will remember, had fixed her affections on Viscount Rochester, afterwards Earl of Somerset, the guilty favorite of James I., and the proceedings were instituted to deliver her from the thraldom of a detested husband. As legal authorities, they are quite valueless; the nature of the commission of inquiry—the admission of the Countess' malicious assertions as evidence—the known fact of her having employed every art to provoke her husband's hatred and disgust—her pretended proof of virginity, when she is suspected in the personal examination to have substituted a young person of her own stature and size—the form of the charge itself, which was not one of general inability but of impotentia versus hanc alone—and the court influence employed to awe and bias the commissioners—all combine to stamp this transaction as equally anomalous and infamous. There is much, however, that is curious and amusing in the account* of the Archbishop before mentioned, who was a chief commissioner in the inquiry. He tells, pretty plainly, what the feeling of his colleagues was in the outset of the matter. 'Sir Thomas Parry, in all his speeches, privately murmured against this nullity, until he came to Windsor; where, the day that the King heard us, the Lord Chamberlain, in my presence, spake privately with him and Sir Julius Cæsar about this matter; and, from that time forward, Mr Chancellor of the Dutchy was altered. My Lord of Ely also, for a great while, was in dislike of the separation (as I have credibly heard he opened himself to Sir Henry Savile,) until such time as the King spake with him, and then his judgment was reformed.' Abbott himself, however, was not quite so tractable; sore were the struggles between his conscience and his interest, and severe the slights and reproofs which he experienced from his gracious sovereign for such unparalleled contumacy. In this strait he sought to steer a middle course, and 'wrote a letter to the King, praying humbly that he might be freed from the trouble of this cause, or, at least, give no sentence in it until he were a married man, and so might better understand the business.' But the poor prelate was not suffered to escape on the ground of celibacy; and James, who was before reported 'to have schooled the Archbishop in two letters, as he was never schooled in all his life,' condescended to argue calmly with him in two or three interviews. One specimen of the sapient monarch's mode of ratiocination is extracted. 'When the King was risen from the chair, he fell to inveighing against these marryings of young couples before they be acquainted with one another. He told us the inconvenience of it; how he knew, in Scotland, a father, who married his only child to a man against her will. That she withstood it, yet her father forced her to marry him. That being gone home with her husband, after a few days she ran away from him. That her father jerked her, and sent her home again. That, not long after, she poisoned her husband, and was burnt for it while the King was in Scotland. After his Majesty's going out I followed, and told him, I evidently perceived that it was in the Earl of Essex, vitium animi, non corporis. His Majesty swore he thought so. There passed some other speech from the King to me, touching his own lying with the Queen the first night he married her.' The result of this trial may be easily inferred from the circumstances. The Archbishop was as litttle disposed to prove a martyr as a traitor to his cause, and the thing was settled quietly, with a silent vote on his part.

The earliest authorities in civil law allowed other matters besides impotence of the husband, as adequate proof of bastardy. The Digest expressly particularizes the circumstance of non-access by the husband. The civilians seem all to have agreed in admitting other facts, besides impotence and non-access, to contradict the presumption of legitimacy, but they agreed no farther. Some argued, that the question should depend upon a balance of probabilities, as whether the wife had more frequent converse with her husband or her paramour; some were for making the avowal of the adulterer an absolute proof, and others deemed the concealment of the child the surest evidence of his base origin. The canon law seems positively inclined to prefer the presumption of bastardy, and to lay the burthen of proof upon the party claiming to be legitimate. The old English law, as laid down by Bracton, and copied from him in Fleta, recognised three valid objections to legitimacy; impotence, non-access, and all conclusive presumptions deduced from physical or moral causes. To show the lengths to which the last were carried, it is only necessary to state, that a refusal by the husband to recognise the child was held sufficient, so that it was in the power of any unnatural father to disinherit his offspring, and avoid the trouble and expense of rearing it. In all Bracton's cases, indeed, this arbitrary recognition appears to have been a sine quâ non, but its contrary is to be distinguished from repudiation, the rejection of a once acknowledged child, which was at no time evidence. These statements are confirmed by Britton. But no sooner had the common law struggled into respectability, and thrown off the bondage of canonists and civilians, than a system entirely different grew up; and from the time of Edward III. until Lord Hale attained the Bench, one simple and inviolable rule prevailed, that every child, born in wedlock, was legitimate, unless the husband was impotent, or beyond the four seas at the epoch of conception.* That great Judge resolved to purify the law from its manifest absurdity, and was the first to admit evidence of the non-access on the part of the husband, without the foolish condition of ultra marine absence. This occurred in the case of Dickens v. Collins, of which, unluckily, no report exists; but it is quoted in that of the parishes of St George and St Margaret, 1 Salk. 123, a decision on the same point a few years later. But this was the whole amount of innovation. Neither Lord Hale or his successors ever thought of admitting evidence that did not demonstrate the absolute impossibility of access, as where the husband was in a different country, or entirely disabled by disease during the period of conception. Thus, in Lomax v. Holmden and Another, 11 Strange, 940, which was a trial in ejectment, where the question was, whether the lessor of the plaintiff was son and heir of Caleb Lomax, deceased, the defendants gave in evidence the inability of the ancestor, from a bad habit of body; but their proofs going only to improbability and not impossibility, there was a verdict against them. The disavowal of the offspring by the husband was of no avail, nor was the wife allowed to prove his non-access, although she might the access of another man. As late as 1807, Lord Ellenborough said: 'If we may resort to all impediments arising from natural causes, we may adopt other causes equally conclusive to shew the absolute physical impossibility of the husband being the father. I will not say the improbability of his being such; for, upon the ground of improbability, however strong, I will not venture to proceed.'

* State Trials, vol. x. Appx. i.

How strictly such a rule was acted upon by one of our most acute judges, the following case, decided by Sir William Wynne, will shew. It was a cause in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, in 1792, for the administration of the effects of John Newport, Esq. The intestate was the only son of Ann, the wife of Ralph Smyth, and was born when his mother had left her husband for some years, to live with Lord Bradford as his mistress. He was educated by that nobleman as his son, inherited from him a splendid fortune, and assumed his family name by act of parliament.

The separation between Mr and Mrs Smyth was of an amicable nature; he appeared rather to promote her intercourse with Lord Bradford, and allowed her a small annuity. For the payment of this they had occasionally brief interviews, but there was no proof of any such having taken place, for some time previous to the birth of her child.

Mr Newport, on his return from abroad, became insane (the disease was hereditary in Lord Bradford's family,) and he was placed under the care of some members of it. Suits in Chancery were instituted respecting his property, and Mr Smyth, as his mother's husband, was made party to them; but although the latter gentleman would have derived great pecuniary advantages from claiming the lunatic as his son, he studiously avoided all declarations to that effect; and both acted himself, and allowed the Court to act, as if no doubt could be entertained of Mr Newport's illegitimacy.

The lunatic survived his mother and her husband, and died possessed of property which had accumulated to an immense amount. It was claimed by the grand-nephew of the deceased Mr Smyth.

Sir William Wynne decided that the legitimacy of Mr Newport was established, and, consequently in favor of the claimant. His reasons were, that the circumstance of the husband and wife both residing in London, for some time previous to the birth of the child, was proved in evidence. It was also proved that they occasionally met, though not the times of meeting; that she visited him at his lodgings in Holborn to receive her annuity, and on those occasions remained alone with him in his room, which was a bed-room, for half an hour at a time. It seemed probable that he occasionally dined with her, at a house of Lord Bradford's at Hammersmith. Thus possibility of access was established. The learned Judge thus delivered his opinion as to legal question:—

'The law of England on this subject, as now settled, I take to be this:—that if such proof can be given, of whatever kind, as shall satisfy legally the mind of the Court that the husband had no access to the wife at the time when the child must have been begotten, the child is a bastard, though born of a married woman in the lifetime of her husband; but if the husband and wife were so circumstanced that access must be presumed between them, as if they lived in the same town or place, and cannot be proved by persons who have watched them never to have come together; if direct evidence can be proved that they had access to each other; in such a case I take it the son is legitimate, notwithstanding any circumstantial evidence that may be given to the contrary.'

It was the pleasure of the House of Lords, in 1813, to disturb, for the first time, this consistent and intelligible rule; and by throwing open the door to circumstantial evidence, to risk, hereafter, as we apprehend, no small confusion and injustice. The Banbury Peerage case, very important in itself, becomes still more so from the novel principle it introduces; and our best thanks are due to Mr Le Marchant for the accurate and complete account he has compiled of it in the appendix to his valuable 'Report of the Proceedings in the House of Lords on the claim to the Barony of Gardner.' To that volume we are indeed previously indebted in this article, and we gladly seize the opportunity of speaking of it as a model of diligence in collecting, and skill in condensing information. From it the entire details of the following proceedings will be taken.

William, Viscount Wallingford and Baron Knollys, was created Earl of Banbury by letters patent, dated 18th August, 1627. Precedency being therein granted to him over some earls of older creation, the following spring a committee of privileges proceeded in the Lords to take the matter into consideration, but were stopped by a message from the king, shewing good reason for the grant, and requesting, that as the Earl was old and childless, he might be permitted to enjoy it, upon promise that the king would never thereafter occasion the like dispute. Upon this an order of the House was passed, expressing among other things, that their Lordships were contented, but particularly providing that the said earl should hold such precedency for his life only, and that it should not go to his heirs. Lord Banbury was at this time eightyone years of age, and died in 1632. An inquisition held within a year after found that he died at Caversham, without heirs male of his body, and that his estates descended to his nieces, as his heirs at law. Another inquisition was held eight years afterwards, which found that he had died in London; and that Edward, who on his death became Earl of Banbury, was his son and heir. This Edward was the first child of Lady Banbury, and born in 1627, after the grant of the Earl's patent, but long before the king's message regarding it. Long before this time an adulterous commerce had been understood to subsist between Lady Banbury and Lord Vaux. She lived, however, with Lord Banbury until his death. In 1630 Nicholas, her second son, was born at the house of Lord Vaux, where she and her husband were residing. During his lifetime, and long afterwards, both children bore the name of Vaux. Lord Banbury was possessed of two considerable estates, Caversham and Rotherfield Greys. The former, if he had issue male, was settled on his eldest son; but in 1630 he levied a fine of it, and conveyed the fee absolutely to Lady Banbury. He also covenanted, by another deed, to levy a fine of Rotherfield Greys to his nephew and heir male, Sir Robert Knollys. By his will he left his widow residuary legatee, and did not notice any issue. Immediately after his death Lady Banbury proved the will, and the same day married Lord Vaux.

Edward, the eldest born, died under age. From an indenture, dated the 19th of August, 1646, it appears, that by that time Nicholas had assumed the name and title of Lord Banbury. In 1660 he took his seat as a peer, and the same year the question of his legitimacy was for the first time agitated. Witnesses were examined before the Committee of Privileges, when undeniable access on the part of the husband being proved, and the attorney-general confessing the law clear, they reported Nicholas to be in the eye of the law Earl of Banbury, and recommended an advice to the king to issue a writ of summons to him. But the feeling of the House was against the law of the land; and on the 9th of December, 1661, a bill was brought in to 'declare Nicholas, Earl of Banbury, illegitimate:' stating also, 'that the children had always gone by the name of Vaux, and that many years after the finding of the office of inquisition, that the Earl died without issue, the Countess did first produce the said Edward, and declare him Earl of Banbury, and after his death did produce the said Nicholas.' The bill was not proceeded with.

So strong continued the aversion of the House to entertain what they knew to be a legal claim, that on no one of six several petitions presented by Nicholas or his descendants, would they ever come to a decision, excepting that of 1692, when they resolved that Charles Knollys, the petitioner, had no right to the earldom. This, however, was under peculiar circumstances. The claimant had that year been indicted by the name of Charles Knollys for the murder of his brother-in-law, Philip Lawson, and thereupon he prayed to be tried by his peers, as Earl of Banbury. The House of Lords rejecting the prayer, after long discussion, he pleaded misnomer in abatement, when brought up to the bar of the King's Bench, in Hilary term, 1693. The attorney-general's replication insisted on the resolutions of the House dismissing the petition: to this there was a demurrer and joinder therein. The Court of King's Bench, Lord Holt being Chief, quashed the indictment. We may collect, from the learned Lord's elaborate judgment that the principal ground of decision was the informality of the petition, which should have been first addressed to the king, and by him referred to the lords, which not having taken place, the resolutions of the House thereon were not conclusive on the defendant as a legal judgment. For this proceeding of the judges, the lords called them to account; but Lord Holt being intractable, and refusing to give his reasons, unless the record were removed before the peers by error, after much deliberation among the indignant lords upon the course to be pursued, nothing was ultimately done.

* For cases on the dictum of Hale, see Pendrill v. Pendrill, Strange, 925. Rex v. Reading, Cas. Temp. Lord Hardwicke, 82. Rex v. Luffe, 8 East, 208. See also, Rex v. Rook, Say. Rep. 61. and Rex v. Inhab. of Bedell, Andr. 8.

In the year 1806, William Knollys, the lineal descendant of Nicholas, made the eigth and last attempt to establish the legitimacy of his ancestor. The petition was discussed at great length before the Committee of Privileges, in the years 1808, 1809, 1810, and 1811: and in 1813 a resolution of the House decided that the petitioner had not made out his claim. We must now consider the arguments employed.

Sir Samuel Romilly, who was counsel for the claimant, considered the evidence against the legitimacy of Nicholas, as reducing itself to the following heads:—

1. The advanced age of the Earl.
2. That he was childless in 1628.
3. That he never knew he had such a son.
4. That there was no evidence of the baptism of Nicholas, and that he was treated as the child of Lord Vaux.
5. That the inquisitio post mortem found the Earl to have died without issue.
6. That Rotherfield Greys did not descend to Nicholas.

On the first head he argued, that many older men had become fathers, and quoted the authority of Dr Gregory for the fact, that many men of eighty not uncommonly begot children.

On the second he contended, that although Edward was born before the message of the king declaring the Earl childless, yet, that at the time of granting the patent, and most probably of the Earls representation to the King upon the subject, the birth had not taken place. Many motives might induce the earl to conceal the fact, if a weak or unprincipled man. At any rate the illegitimacy of Edward did not affect the legitimacy of Nicholas.

As to the third, concealment of the child, if proved, is of less weight than the express declaration of the mother, and yet the law considers the latter no evidence.

As to the fourth, the baptismal registers of that period have not been preserved. There is no evidence that Nicholas went by the name of Vaux, until the era of the deed in 1646. The troubles of the time made it unsafe, during his infancy, to assume the title of Banbury.

As to the fifth, the inquisitions were exparte proceedings, and might in many ways be quashed or defeated.

Lastly, it is very doubtful whether a legitimate son of Lord Banbury could have recovered Rotherfield Greys from the heirs of Sir Robert Knollys. The construction of the statute is that on which the question depends, and is not without difficulty.

It will be seen, that although some of these arguments are not without weight and ingenuity, they must be esteemed of much less importance than the fact, that, neither impotence nor want of access being proved, Nicholas was the legitimate son of the Earl, according to the uniform decisions of our courts for upwards of four centuries. We are fortunately possessed of the opinions of the Judges on this subject. Upon the observation of Lord Ellenborough, that 'it was desirable to have the opinion of the judges whether any circumstances could rebut the presumption of access,' and that then 'a question would arise, whether the circumstances of this case constituted such circumstances;' several important queries were submitted to them. Among the most material of their answers were the following.

[To be continued next week.]

ENGLISH CASES.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS—MAY.

Sittings in Banco at Westminster Hall.

Stracey and Another vs. the Bank of England.

Mr Sergeant Spankie, on behalf of the plaintiffs, stated that the action upon which he had to address the Court was brought by Sir Edward Stracey and his brother, Joseph Henry Stracey, against the Bank of England, for refusing to transfer the sum of 605*l.* which stood in their names as trustees, in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England. At the trial a short time since, the Jury found a special verdict to the effect, that in 1808 Sir Edward Stracey and his brothers were the holders of 605*l.* in Long Annuities. That in 1820 this Stock was transferred, and carried to the credit of Mr Gilford Burrington, upon a power of attorney, purporting to be signed by Sir Edward Stracey and the other plaintiff; that said power of attorney was not really signed by them, but that the signatures were forged by Henry Fauntleroy, without the leave of Sir Edward Stracey, or his brother, who had no knowledge of that transfer; that Joseph Henry Stracey was a partner in the house of Marsh and Co., bankers of Berners-street, and that Fauntleroy, who was also a partner, managed the greater part of the business of the house; that he kept the house book, and made many false entries therein, which did not agree with the pass-book; that after the transfer of the above sum in Long Annuities, he (Fauntleroy) made entries, in his own hand, in the books, of the dividends on that stock being still received, the Jury also found that Fauntleroy employed a broker, named Simpson, to sell 605*l.* Long Annuities, for 10,000*l.* without the knowledge of his partners; and that there was no entry of that transfer in their house book. Upon the death of Mrs Stracey, for whom these dividends were received by the plaintiffs, they applied to the Bank to have the stock transferred, but they met with a refusal, and were informed that the 605*l.* Long Annuities had been transferred as above described. Under those circumstances they were compelled to apply to a Court of Justice for redress. He (the Learned Sergeant) should contend that the stock, of which the plaintiffs were possessed, having been taken away from them by a forged power of attorney, such transfer was null and void, and they were entitled to stand in the same situation in which they originally were. It would be evident, from the best authorities, that the nature of stock or annuities was a mere right to receive a perpetual annuity, and that it had no resemblance to what were called chattels movable. Annuities were arranged by Blackstone under the head of incorporal property, and, as such, were incapable of dispossession or disseisin.

The Chief Justice—Will that authority apply to this case? The annuities in question were only created for a given time—until 1860.

Mr Sergeant Spankie thought the cases would apply. The annuities might be granted for life or a given period. The Act which he cited used the precaution of stating that annuities might be considered as personal property; but the holders could not be dispossessed of them by illegal and improper means, such as forged powers of attorney; and, on this ground, he had no difficulty in saying that the Bank of England was answerable for those annuities. It might be said that his clients ought to have trusted to the generosity of the Bank of England, and that it had given the plaintiff, Sir Edward Stracey, a sum equivalent to the dividends on the annuities, on condition of his proving under the commission against Marsh and Co.; but he well knew what the generosity of the Bank amounted to; and that they always availed themselves of any defence they could set up. The defence which they lately brought forward in the Court of King's Bench, would be a proof of his assertion.

Mr Justice Park—That was as shabby a defence as could be taken by such a great body.

Mr Sergeant Spankie—That was rather infra dig.—(laughter.) The Learned Sergeant, in continuation, observed that his clients should not place themselves within the generosity of the Bank, believing that their generosity was not so sterling as their notes—(a laugh.) The Bank of England were only the agents of Government for paying the dividends, and for which they received a handsome emolument annually; they were nothing more than the servants of servants; and he was convinced that if the Government was aware of the conduct of the Bank in this transaction, it would give them a severe reprimand. The Bank ought not, by their tortuous act, to deprive the plaintiffs of their property—he should say they could not—and that the Government were their (the plaintiffs') debtors, and that the Bank was accountable to the Government as agents. He now came to the second ground which the Bank relied upon for resisting the plaintiffs' claim—namely, in consequence of something which they alleged had taken place between them and Sir Edward Stracey, by which they contended that all his right to the stock was gone, because he omitted performing a certain condition; they told him to go and prove under the commission against Marsh and Co.'s estate, and, at the same time, gave him, not the dividends upon the stock, but something that amounted to the same sum. He agreed to do what the Bank had no right to require, but he made this agreemont, salvo jure, and reserving, without prejudice to himself, the right of urging his claim to have the stock replaced. The Bank did not give him a competent satisfaction, and merely gave him a sum equivalent to his own dividend—in fine, they wished to bribe and bubble him with his own money. It was clearly laid down in 'Comyn's Digest,' that an accord, to be good, must be in full satisfaction of all demands, and effectual. The Learned Sergeant here referred to an action in Trover, tried some centuries back. The cause of action in that case was a silk waistcoat, of the value of 20*s.* No less than eight Counsel were engaged in the cause; the Solicitor-General and the King's Sergeant held briefs on the occasion, and they and their learned juniors addressed the Court alternately.—(A laugh.)

Mr Justice Gaselee observed that in those days the speeches of eight Counsel did not occupy as much time as that of one at the present day; and, besides, the Judges at that period used to rise at 11 o'clock.

Mr Sergeant Spankie—I wonder how they were able to go to bed or rise at all—(laughter.)

The Learned Sergeant, in conclusion, contended that there was no uncertainty as to the plaintiffs' rights, and that the Bank had no authority to insist on their proving under the commission against Marsh and Co.; there was no settled agreement to that effect, and even if there were, it could yet be done, and the Bank might bring an action against Sir Edward Stracey, to compel him to do so—this was, therefore, no bar to the present claim. It was also urged on the part of the Bank, that the 10,000*l.* arising from the sale of the 605*l.* Long Annuities, was lodged with Messrs Martin and Co., bankers to Marsh and Co., and to the credit of the latter, and that J. H. Stracey having something to do with that establishment had received an equivalent from his partners; but it was proved that they knew nothing of this stock having been transferred, and the money got by chance into their funds. Besides, the 10,000*l.* paid into the hands of Martin and Co., was not actually the plaintiff's property, but was the money of Burrington, the person to whom the Stock was transferred. Fauntleroy had no right to pledge to his partners, who were ignorant of the whole transaction; and the money raised was got upon his own (Fauntleroy's) credit, or upon his own crime. Upon the whole of the circumstances there was nothing which ought to operate as a bar to the plaintiffs' claim.

Mr Sergeant Taddy addressed the Court on behalf of the Bank of England, and contended that none of the cases cited by his Learned Friend would apply in the present instance. The argument that Stock was on incorporeal property, and that the plaintiff ought to be considered as still in possession of the Annuities, could not be maintained, as there was no just comparison between Stock and real property. The possession of Stock meant nothing more than the right of receiving the dividends. The declaration in this case attributed no negligence to the Bank, when a transfer took place, a credit to the amount of Stock was entered on the leger of the Bank of England; but the Bank had nothing more to do with the transfer, the party himself, or his attorney or agent, did it, and the amount was put to the credit of the party to whom the Stock was transferred. It appeared that Joseph Henry Stracey, one of the partners in the house of Marsh and Co., had received at the Bank the dividends on the Stock in question from 1817 to 1820, and from the time they were transferred to Burrington, he (Joseph Stracey) ceased to receive the dividends, it was rather strange that Mr Stracey, who was in the habit of receiving them for nearly four years up to that period, should on a sudden discontinue doing so; did this show any guilty knowledge?

Mr Justice Park—If the Jury had not negatived that question, there might be some suspicion; but they acquitted all the partners of having had any guilty knowledge of what was done by that unfortunate man, Fauntleroy.

Mr Sergeant Taddy in continuation, observed, that the circumstance of the 10,000*l.* arising from the sale of the Stock having been paid into the house of Martin and Co., who were the bankers to Stracey and Co., was one of strong presumption, and that at all events there could be no doubt but that sum went into their funds, and was entered into the pass-book. It was also clear that Mr J. Stracey had been guilty of gross negligence. The Bank was willing to replace his Stock on a certain condition—namely, Sir Edward Stracey's proving under the commission, and assigning over the proof to them, and not having complied with that agreement, Sir Edward Stracey, shut himself out from all right to maintain this action, and it would be a breach of good faith in him to do so. He should not follow the example of his Learned Friend in using harsh expressions against any of the parties in this case, but he should submit that the Bank were fully justified in the course they had adopted, and that the plaintiffs had not shown sufficient grounds for the redress they sought.

Mr Sergeant Spankie having replied,

The Chief Justice said the Court would take time to consider the case.

---

COURT OF KING'S BENCH—MAY.

Sittings in Banco.

The King vs. Baldwin and others.

In this case Mr Campbell obtained, during the last Term, a rule Nisi, calling upon the defendants to show cause why a criminal information should not be filed against them for the publication of an article in the Library of Useful Knowledge, published by the defendants. The article was contained in a treatise on brewing, and was headed 'Burton Ale.' In this article it was stated that Burton ale could not be made of malt and hops and water alone without the addition of certain ingredients which were considered deleterious.—The Burton ale brewers, thinking the article injurious to their trade applied for the rule.

Mr Brougham, on the part of Messrs Baldwin and Cradock, addressed the Court, saying that the most diligent inquiry had been made into the truth of the statements which had been put forward in the work published by his clients; and he was bound to state that the brewers themselves afforded every opportunity for inquiry, and appeared anxious for the strictest investigation and had given several samples of their beverage to be analyzed. They had even thrown open their brewhouses to a general examination. The result of the strict inquiry which had been made was that the statement made by the learned writer of the article on brewing was founded on error. That gentleman, who was himself a practical brewer, and had twenty years' experience in the tradc, had given it as his opinion in the article in question, that he could not brew Burton ale from malt, hops aud pure water, without the admixture of some saline ingredients. During the inquiry which had taken place, it was discovered that the springs in the neighborhood of Burton ran over a saline rock, which had the effect of giving the water a natural impregnation. This circumstance explained the error into which the writer had fallen. It was the intention of his clients to make this statement in the future republication of the work in question. With this understanding, it had been agreed between himself and the Counsel for the brewers that the rule should be discharged. Mr Campbell said that, under those circumstances, he had no objection to allow the rule to be discharged; but he thought it right to state that he had the affidavits of all the brewers of Burton, declaring most distinctly that they used no other ingredient in the manufacture of their ale, except malt, hops, and pure water. He had a similar affidavit from the gentleman who had analysed the several samples of Burton ale.

Mr Brougham said his clients also admitted that the water used was fine and pure, as were the other ingredients, and that consequently the ale was equally pure.

Lord Tenterden—Now the lovers of Burton ale may drink that beverage with perfect safety. —Rule discharged.

The Court broke up at one o'clock, and Lord Tenterden returned in a few minutes to hear some Common Jury cases.

---

RECENT ENGLISH DECISIONS.

INJUNCTION.

A plaintiff cannot move ex parte for an injunction, after he has served the defendant with subpœnas, and the defendant has appeared.—Perry vs. Weller, 3 Russell, 519.

An obligor in a bond obtained the common injunction to restrain the obligor from proceeding in an action brought in his name by an assignee of the bond. Held, that the answer of the obligee could not be read in opposition to a motion to dissolve the injunction made by the assignee.—Montague vs. Hill, 4 Russell, 128.

INTERPLEADER.

A testator bequeathed 500*l.* to trustees, upon trust to invest the same on government or other good security, and pay the interest to his wife for life, and after her decease to distribute the principal in manner mentioned. The executors and trustees agreed that the interest on a bond for 500*l.* due to the testator, should be appropriated to the payment of the legacy; and the obligor, in pursuance of such arrangement, and with the consent of the executors and trustees, paid the interest to the legatee for some years. Afterwards, the surviving trustee gave notice to the debtor not to pay the money to the executors, who then commenced an action on the bond: the debtor having filed a bill of interpleader, a demurrer by the executors for want of equity was overruled.—Wright vs. Ward, 4 Russell, 215.

ISSUE.

The Court is not in the habit of binding the inheritance by the result of a single trial of an issue, devisavit vel non.—Winchilsea vs. Wanchope, and Tod vs. Winchilsea, 3 Russell, 441.

The assistance of a jury being only one of the means by which the conscience of the Court is to be informed, it is the duty of the Court, before it comes to a decision, to consider all the evidence judicially before it. If, therefore, it thinks the jury have come to a wrong conclusion upon the evidence before them, a new trial will be ordered. —Ibid.

A third issue devisavit vel non was directed, after two juries had found in favor of the will.—Ibid.

LEASE FOR LIVES.

The assignee of a lease for lives, which contained a covenant for renewal, on the falling of each life, provided application were made within six months, having omitted, upon the death of one of the cestuis que vie, to apply for a renewal within the six months, filed his bill on the ground that he neither knew that the person was a life named in the lease, nor that he was dead, until after the expiration of the six months. The bill was dismissed with costs, because he had not used due diligence in ascertaining the facts, nor acted with ordinary prudence.—Harris vs. Bryant, 4 Russell, 90.

LIEN.

Agreement for the sale of lands, with a stipulation that the amount of the consideration money should be secured by the bond of the purchaser to the vendor, with interest at four per cent, and should remain so secured during the latter's life on the regular payment of such interest. The conveyance which was afterwards executed expressed that the purchase money had been paid, and the vendor's receipt was endorsed upon it; but in fact only a part of it had been paid, and the residue was secured by the purchaser's bond, conditioned for payment of the principal, with interest, within twelve months after the vendor's death, and of interest in the mean time. Held, that under the circumstances the vendor retained a lien upon the premises sold, for that portion of the purchase money which was secured by the bond. The Lord Chancellor said, 'In general, where a bill, note, or bond is given for the whole or any part of the purchase money, the vendor does not lose his lien for so much of it, as remains unpaid. The circumstance, that in these cases the money is secured to be paid at a future day, does not affect the lien. I do not think it affected by the fact of the period of payment being dependent on the vendor's life.' Note, in the report the Chancellor is made to say, 'In the present instance the bond was taken as a security for the payment of part of the purchase money twelve months after the death of the purchaser, with interest at the rate of four per cent, in the mean time.' For purchaser we must read vendor.—Winter vs. Lord Anson, 3 Russell, 488.

There is no distinction between copyholds and freeholds, as to the doctrine of a vendor's lien for his purchase money.—S. C.

LUNATIC.

Under a commission of lunacy, the jury found, 'That the party was not a lunatic, but that partly from paralysis, and partly from old age, his memory was so much impaired as to render him incompetent to the management of his affairs, and, consequently of unsound mind, and that he had been so for the term of two years last past.' The Lord Chancellor held, that where a jury state their premises and draw their conclusion and that conclusion does not necessarily follow from the premises which they state, it was not to be taken as a finding by itself: in this case he was not satisfied that the consequence followed necessarily from the premises, and, therefore, he could not allow the verdict to stand; and he ordered a new commission to issue.—In re Holmes, 4 Russell, 182.

[On the inquisition under the second commission the jury found that the party was of unsound mind.]

The Court will protect the property of a supposed lunatic, in the interval between the petition and verdict; but it will, at the same time, take care that those who act on his behalf shall have ample funds for resisting the commission.—S. C.

PARTNER.

A, B & C carried on business as bankers for a term which would expire on the 18th of February, 1807, under articles, by which A should have the power, in the event of his death during the copartnership, of disposing of his share in favor of his wife and children. S, a customer of the bank, and two sureties, covenanted that they, or one of them, would pay to A B & C, or the survivors of them, all sums of money, then due, or which, at any time thereafter before and until the 19th of February, 1807, should become due from S to the bankers, and survivors or survivor of them. A died, having bequeathed his share in the business to his executor in trust for his children. The business was carried on under the same firm, and the executors interfered and participated in the profits. At A's death, the balance due from S, was 14,000*l*.—and he afterwards, in the course of his dealings, paid in more than 14,000*l*. but drew out sums exceeding the amount so paid in; these subsequent dealings were contained in the same account current with the preceding dealings. S afterwards became bankrupt, being in debt to the bank 19,000*l*.: Held, that the partnership which existed after the death of A was a new partnership, and that the guarantee did not apply to sums advanced to S by them. That the balance due at A's death by S must be considered as discharged by the subsequent payments from him to the bank. —Pemberton vs. Oakes, 4 Russell, 154.

LEGACY DUTY.

When a legacy is not paid at the time appointed for payment by the will, the duty is payable, not merely upon the capital sum bequeathed, but on the aggregate amount of principal and interest received by the legatee.—Thomas vs. Montgomery, 3 Russell, 502.

RECENT AMERICAN DECISIONS.

EVIDENCE.

11. Evidence of acts done and declarations made by the claimants of land, after a possession by one of them for thirty years, is admissible to show that such possession was not adverse. Church vs. Burghardt. 8 Pick. 327.

12. Where a witness, who had assisted in erecting and maintaining a mill-dam, and had used it long enough to create the presumption of a grant of an easement in the stream, stated that his right was derived from a written agreement, it was held, that his testimony of the terms of the agreement was inadmissible, without evidence of the loss of the instrument, to prove the title to the easement. Boynton vs. Rees. 329.

13. The testimony of a juror who tried the cause, is admissible upon the hearing of a petition for a review. Ferrill vs. Simpson. 359.

14. The affidavit of a party to a suit may be received to prove the loss of a writing, in order to let in secondary evidence of its contents. Donelson vs. Taylor. 390.

15. Whether the loss of a paper is sufficiently proved to let in secondary evidence of its contents, is a question for the court. Ibid.

16. If the testimony of a witness is inadmissible to prove such loss, by reason of his being interested in the suit, and his being interested is known to the party against whom he is called to testify, he must be objected to before he is sworn and examined, or the objection will be too late. Ibid.

17. The return of an officer that he has attached certain property, is not of itself sufficient evidence of an attachment in fact, in a suit against him by another officer claiming to have attached the same property. Merrill vs. Sawyer. 397.

18. Where a deputy-sheriff returned on a writ, that on the day specified he had attached hay in the defendant's barn, his declaration on the same day, while he was at work on a fence near the barn, that he had attached the hay and was then watching it, was held inadmissible to prove the attachment, it not being a part of the res gestæ. Ibid.

19. In an action brought by the town of W, against the town of O, for expenses incurred in the support of a pauper, on the question whether the pauper derived a settlement in O from his grandfather through his father, it was held, that copies of a deed, executed by the grandfather in 1754, in which he was described as being of O, and of his last will, made in 1758, in which he was described as 'now resident in O,' were admissible evidence to prove that the grandfather gained a settlement in O, under Prov. St. 12 & 13 Will. 3, c. 10. Ward vs. Oxford. 476.

20. Held, also, that evidence proving that the grandfather, for a long time before 1754, had a settlement in the town of S, and that afterward, for years previous to 1784, the father of the pauper was supported as a pauper by S, was admissible to rebut the presumption arising from the description of the grandfather in the deed and will. Ibid.

21. Where on a trial a witness is examined respecting a matter which is irrelevant to the issue, by both parties without objection, one of the parties cannot afterward object to the witness' further examination with regard to the same subject. Young vs. Mason. 551.

22. In order to establish, on a trial, a title to personal property by purchase, it is not necessary for the purchaser to offer his bill of parcels in evidence; but he may prove his purchase by parol evidence. Blood vs. Harrington. 552.

23. If the other party wish to have the bill of parcels produced on the trial, he should give notice beforehand to the party who has it in his possession. Ibid.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

1. An ante-nuptial contract by which the wife is to hold her earnings to her separate use, is fraudulent as it respects previous or subsequent creditors of the husband. Keith vs. Woombell. 211.

2. Whether a settlement upon a wife after marriage, without any previous contract or consideration, by a person free from debt, is valid against creditors, quære; but at any rate the intention to make such a settlement must be clearly proved. Ibid.

3. Husband and wife give their joint promissory notes and take from the promisee a bond, that if they, or either of them, pay all taxes on certain land, he will, upon payment of the notes, convey the land, at the request of the wife, to her or her appointee. The husband is an ignorant man, and incapable, by reason of alienage, of holding real estate. Held, that an intention to make a settlement on the wife was not clearly proved; and she was decreed to deliver the bond over to the husband's assignee. Ibid.

INSURANCE.

1. Insurance was made on a ship 'at and from Boston to all ports and places on the globe, and until her return to Boston, not exceeding two years.' She sailed from the coast of Brazil for Boston, and on arriving in Boston bay, below the harbor, was ordered by the owner to put into Salem, the two years not having yet expired. She accordingly put into that port, for the purpose of being repaired. Held, that the risk did not terminate on her arrival at Salem. Ellery vs. New England Ins. Co. 14.

2. The destination of the vessel to Boston did not, in such case, limit the risk insured, thereafter, to that voyage, but the owner might, at any time before her arrival at Boston, alter her destination, and the risk would still continue. Ibid

3. Putting into Salem in such case was not a deviation. Ibid.

4. Under such a policy, visiting the same port more than once is not a deviation. Ibid.

5. A damage done to a ship by the violence of the wind during an attempt to haul her upon a marine rail-way to be repaired, and while she is partly on land, is covered by a policy of insurance against loss by the perils of the seas and 'all other losses to which assurers are liable,' this being a loss ejusdem generis with those specified. Ibid.

6. Where a new and a safe mode of repairing ships has come into use since the making of insurance on a ship, the assured may avail himself of it without prejudice to the policy. Ibid.

APPOINTMENTS, &c.

On the 10th inst. at Salem, Ellis Gray Loring, of Boston, and Moses Parsons Parish, of Newburyport, were admitted to practise as Counsellors in the Supreme Court.

By the President.—Matthew Harvey, of New Hampshire, to be Judge of the United States, for the District of New Hampshire, in place of John S. Sherburne, deceased.

John M. Gourgas, Jr, of Quincy was admitted an attorney of the Supreme Judicial Court, at its late session in Dedham.

In the Vermont Legislature Oct. 28, 1830—the Governor and Counsel appeared, and both Houses went into joint committee, his Excellency the Governor in the Chair, and proceeded to ballot for Judges of the Supreme Court, and the following persons were declared duly elected.

Hon. TITUS HUTCHINSON, Chief Justice. Hon. Charles K. Williams, Hon. Stephen Royce, Jr, Hon. Ephraim Paddock, and Hon. John C. Thompson, Associate Judges.—Vt. Patriot.

Samuel M. Harrington, Esq. has been appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of this State, vice the Hon. Kensy Johns, appointed Chancellor. George B. Rodney, Esq. who had been previously, appointed, having declined.

We have understood, though we cannot vouch for the fact, that Henry Stout, Esq. has been appointed Secretary of State, in place of Judge Harrington.—Delaware Journal.

Thomas B. Monroe has received the appointment of Attorney of the U. States for the District of Kentucky, in place of Col. John Speed Smith, resigned.—Col. Monroe has a respectable standing at the bar, and his appointment is well received here, and generally admitted to be the best the President could make while confined in the selection to his friends and supporters.—Frankfort Com.

John J. Marshall has been appointed by the Governor of Kentucky, Reporter to the Court of Appeals, in the place of Col. Thomas B. Monroe, resigned.

By the acting Governor of Louisiana.—George Eustis, Esq. Attorney General of the State, vice Alonzo Murphy, resigned.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1830

SUPREME COURT.

TRIAL OF JOS. JENKINS KNAPP, JR.

The Supreme Judicial Court of this Commonwealth met in Salem on Tuesday, 9th inst. Present, Judges PUTNAM, WILDE and MORTON. Chief Justice SHAW having been retained as Counsel for Selman, (one of the persons originally charged with a participation in the murder of Mr WHITE, and who was afterwards discharged, no bill having been found against him by the Grand Jury) and having consulted with the Counsel for the other prisoners in relation to their defence, deemed it improper to preside at the trials in relation to that murder, expected to be the first business of this term, and has not taken his seat.

Mr Attorney General MORTON moved, that JOSEPH JENKINS KNAPP, Jun. indicted as an accessory in the murder of JOSEPH WHITE, should be brought to the bar, and arraigned on the indictment. The prisoner was soon after brought in, when the indictment was read by the Clerk. The Counsel for the prisoner objected to his being required to answer any other counts of the indictment than those which charged him as an accessory, with John F. Knapp as principal—there being other counts which alledged 'Richard Crowninshield' and 'a person unknown' to be principals. The Court decided that the prisoner was only bound to answer so far as he is charged as accessory to J. F. Knapp. He pleaded not Guilty.

The Clerk then proceeded to impannel the Jury.

In the afternoon, the Court met at a quarter before 3.

The Attorney General moved for leave to challenge one of the Jurors sworn before dinner as a talis-man, for cause, and argued that it might be done, not only before swearing the juror, but at any period during the trial.

Mr Dexter contended that a juror could not be challenged, after being sworn, and quoted authorities.

The Court was of opinion that it could not interfere. At common law a juror must be challenged, whether on the part of the government or the prisoner, before he is sworn, or not at all.

Mr Gardiner then inquired of the Court, who was to conduct the cause on the part of government. It had been stated to the prisoner, he said, that the learned gentleman (Mr Webster,) engaged on the former trial to assist the prosecuting officers of the government, now appeared on behalf of a private prosecutor. If it were so, the fact ought to be understood. And although personally it was a subject of pride and pleasure, to be engaged either with or against that gentleman, yet, in behalf of his client, he felt bound to ask, by whom he was to be prosecuted.

Mr Dexter was sorry to be obliged to object to the appearance of that distinguished gentleman in any place where he himself thought it proper to appear. But this was introducing a new principle of jurisprudence, and subjecting every person brought to the bar, to a danger not contemplated by the law. No case could be cited, he believed, where a private prosecutor had been allowed to employ and pay counsel, to assist in the conviction of a prisoner. By the statute of 1807, repealed in 1809, and revived again in 1811, it is made the duty of the Attorney General, and in his absence, of the Solicitor, and in his absence, of the County Attorney, to attend in behalf of the Commonwealth, and have the entire control of their cases. It is also enacted that no prosecuting officer shall receive any reward or fee from any individual for the performance of his duty. He prayed the judgment of the Court, therefore to decide whether the proper prosecuting officers should perform this duty, or whether the prosecution should be managed by private counsel.

The Attorney General said the gentleman was mistaken. Nothing was more common than for the prosecuting officers to obtain the aid of additional counsel. It had been practised even in this country. He had not thought it necessary to ask leave of the Court again to obtain the aid of the gentleman who assisted on the former trials, because he supposed the permission then given, extended to all the trials for the murder of Mr White.

Mr Dexter allowed that aid had been granted to the government, when either the Attorney or Solicitor General was absent or sick, but in no other cases, and then the assistant counsel had been paid by the Government, not hired by a private prosecutor.

Attorney General—In England, private counsel is always allowed to assist in the prosecution.

Dexter—But in England, neither the Attorney nor Solicitor General takes part officially, except in cases of high treason.

Mr Webster thought it incumbent on him to say, that he came merely and solely at the request of the Attorney General. No other inducement had had the least influence on him.

The Court reserved the decision of the question to Wednesday morning, with the understanding that till then Mr Webster should take no part in the case.

Mr Dexter then stated, that he understood that in all cases where the supœnas of the government were issued, the law allowed witnesses for prisoners, in capital trials, to be paid by government, as well as those for prosecution. It had been refused to witnesses on the trial of John Francis Knapp, but if conformable to law, he requested that prisoner's witnesses in that case might be paid by the state.

The Court said, the prisoner was entitled to it. If a prisoner apply to government for a summons which is served, the person upon whom it is served comes at the request of the government, and they of course pay him.

The indictment was then read with the usual forms, after which the opening plea for the prosecution was commenced by the Attorney General. He said, the prisoner was charged as an accessory before the fact, and that it was incumbent on the government to show that he had hired, counselled, and procured John Francis Knapp to commit the murder of Capt. White. He read the law applicable to the case, and then stated that a part of the evidence would consist of the free and voluntary disclosures of the prisoner, received by Rev. Mr Colman, under authority from him to promise a pledge, that any individual, except Richard Crowninshield, jr, who would make a full and free confession, should not be prosecuted. That pledge has been redeemed. The prisoner had the opportunity to avoid the prosecution by testifying first before the Grand Jury, and then in Court, but he declined, and his protection is fairly forfeited. He then cited authorities to support the doctrine that if an accomplice confess, and is called as a witness, and afterwards testify fraudulently, or deny his confessions, the government is redeemed from the pledge of protection, and he is to be tried by his confessions. He then called Mr Colman.

Rev. Henry Colman sworn. Had received a writing from the Attorney General [which was here read by the Attorney General, promising to receive as State's evidence, either of the prisoners then in confinement, except Richard Crowninshield.]

Mr Colman inquired if he was at liberty to read a memorandum made at the time, certifying the circumstances under which the confession was obtained.

The Court said that he might refresh his memory by reference to memorandum, but could not read it.

Mr Colman—The confession was given without any promise, solicitation, bribe, or threat, whatever, that I know of, except the written authority of the Attorney General [referred to above.] I first heard of Joseph J. Knapp, jr, in connexion with the murder of Mr White, on the morning of May 27. Did not visit prisoner on that day. On Friday consulted several gentlemen belonging to the Committee of Vigilance, viz. Messrs Phillip Chase, Dr Barstow, Wm. Fettyplace, and I think, also, John White Treadwell, in regard to visiting prisoner. Obtained their consent to visit him, and then went down to the house of J. J. Knapp, sen. where I saw several members of the family. With their knowledge, approbation and desire went to the prison. They had informed me, prisoner was to be arraigned before the Justice at 10 o'clock. I waited till nearly 11 before Justice Savage came. After prisoner had been arraigned and committed, I went into goal and saw him. Told him I was very sorry to see him in that situation, and that, if I could render him any service which was proper for me to perform I was at his command. Knapp asked me, if I thought they could prove it. I told him I did not know anything about it, other than that certain gentlemen in whom I had confidence, had told me that the evidence against him was conclusive. Asked him who Palmer was. He said he did know. I told him I did not know what could be done, but if anything could be obtained for him, if he saw fit to rely on my honor and make any disclosures to me, he might be sure they should never be divulged, —I would die first,—until I had obtained the ecurity of the government.

[Here Mr Dexter objected to the admission of subsequent confessions, and Mr Colman referred the Court to his testimony on a former trial, showing that he had labored under the erroneous impression, that a clergyman was not obliged to testify in Court to matters confided to him in his professional character.] I charged him, if innocent, by no means, in any way to involve himself—he must be the judge of that. He asked me again, repeatedly, if I thought they could prove it. I told him I did not know. During the whole interview we were sitting near together, upon his bed, and on looking up I saw a crevice in the wall nearly over our heads, from which the saw dust appeared to have fallen. Joseph Knapp told me that George Crowninshield had let down a pencil and paper through that crevice. K. appeared anxious not to be overheard. When going away, he asked me if I would see his wife, and return again. I left the prison, and went to his father's house, where I saw the same persons I had seen before. I returned to the prison about 3 o'clock on the same day. Much the same conversation passed as in the morning, with the addition that, the gentlemen referred to in the morning (Messrs Chase, &c.) as giving their opinion that the evidence against him was decisive, had authorized me to give their names. He asked what I thought. Told him I did not know, but that he would find it difficult to account for those letters, [referring to two put into the post office.] He asked if I thought they would bring up Palmer. I understood that he asked it at the request of one of the prisoners above. I gave my belief that they would. I told him I was nearly exhausted with grief and anxiety, and must leave him; I could do no more; would offer him no bribe nor persuasion; he must act for himself, on his own responsibility; my conscience was discharged. After sitting a few moments in silence, without anything being said, I got up to leave him. He then asked me to see his father and brother, and come with them to the prison. I told him I would, and made an appointment with the gaoler to let me in at 5 o'clock. Conversations occurred with members of the family, which inclined me to stay away, but seeing a chaise pass down toward the gaol, in which were Mrs Beckford and Mrs Knapp, I followed it down with the intention of dissuading them from the attempt to visit the prisoner. While talking with them, Joseph Beckford came out, and told me prisoner wanted to see me. Mr Brown, the gaoler, soon followed with a similar message. I accordingly went in. I should have mentioned before, that in our second interview, I told him that an application had gone on to admit Palmer as state's evidence, and that an answer would go through town at night. If any thing were done for him, then, it must be done that day. At the same visit I also stated that I had inquired of counsel whether if a person confess, and if it did not commit the accomplices, it would avail to the safety of the individual—and I gave him the opinion of Mr Merrill, that it would, provided it was done in good faith. The prisoner then beckoned me to go into a corner of his cell, and in a low voice made a disclosure [which not being in evidence, was not detailed.] I told him I would do all in my power to obtain for him the privilege of being admitted as witness. After I left his cell, I went to Frank's, and then went to see some members of the Committee of Vigilance.

Gardiner—Did you tell Knapp that Mr Merrill said, he thought a pledge for his safety could be obtained from the government? Colman—No. Attorney General—Was there an endorsement upon a copy of the paper obtained from me on this subject? Colman—Yes. I made one; stating that if there was any prevarication, equivocation, &c, the pledge should be null.

Mr Gardiner here made some remarks respecting the admission of Knapp's confession, as testimony against himself. The ground which government go upon here is, that because he has broken his contract (to turn State's evidence) his confession becomes admissible testimony. We call upon government to show its authority for this doctrine. The note in Blackstone, referred to by the Attorney General in his opening, cannot be considered such. The question is as to the circumstances attending the confession. It does not appear that in the case referred to any promises were made to induce confession. According to the quotation from Starkie, 'the convict, by breach of condition, forfeits all claim to favor, and his confession becomes evidence against himself.' This case is merely stated without authority by Starkie, but cannot be found reported anywhere, as it would be if it were an authority worthy of respect. I doubt whether any such decision has ever been made. A refusal to testify does not render that probable which was before incredible.

Mr Dexter wished to call the attention of the Court particularly to one or two expressions of the witness, calculated to exert an improper influence upon the mind of the prisoner. In the first place he says, 'if you will disclose to me, if I die for it, I will not divulge it, if I cannot get safety for you.' Again, prisoner was told, that an application had gone on from Palmer, to which an answer would be returned that night. Thus driving him up to a limited time, and operating strongly upon the two strongest passions of our nature, fear and hope.

At about 7 o'clock, the Court was adjourned to 9 on Wednesday morning.

The decision of the Court, with regard to the admission of Mr Webster, was then read by Judge Putnam, as follows:—

The Court have considered the application of the Attorney General for the admission of Mr Webster to assist him in the management of this Cause.

The Counsel in behalf of the prisoner object and contend that the stat. of 1807 ch. 18, revised by stat. 1811, c. 10. respecting the offices and duties of the Attorney General, Solicitor General, and County Attorneys—makes it their duty exclusively to conduct the prosecutions on the part of the Commonwealth.

We have examined that statute and are of opinion that it was not intended to prohibit the appointment of the Counsellors of this Court in aid of the Law officers whenever the circumstances of the case should require the Court in the exercise of a sound discretion to make such appointments.

It is one of the incidental powers of the Court, and has heretofore been exercised in cases within our own recollection. In cases where civil rights are in controversy and the form of proceeding is by indictment or information, the Court do not perceive any objection that the party in interest should employ Counsel in aid of the law officers.

The same reasons would not apply to cases involving public considerations only. In such cases the statute supposes that the prosecution shall be conducted by the law officers for their salaries, and without any other compensation whatsoever.

In the present case the learned gentleman avows that he is induced to aid the Attorney General merely at his request, and without any other consideration. So that this case presents the question whether a Counsellor may, at the request of the Attorney General, be admitted to aid him in the prosecution, without any pecuniary consideration being paid to him, or any other consideration which may be supposed to influence, excepting a disinterested regard for public good. And we all think that under these circumstances the application should be granted.

[To be concluded next week.]

---

Important to Lawyers.—The Court of King's Bench lately decided in England that where an Attorney accepts a retainer for managing a case, he is bound to carry it to trial, even though his client may not furnish him with sufficient funds at the time.

GRAY AND BOWEN, No. 141, Washington Street, Boston, have recently published the following valuable works.

I. A DESCRIPTION OF TREMONT HOUSE; WITH ARCHITECTURAL ILLUSTRATIONS.—4to.

'Jam scires ab introitu primo—herculentum et amvenum videre et diversonium.' APULEIUS, M. A V.

This work is embellished with a copper-plate engraving, representing the front of the house, and thirty lithographic prints, exhibiting the details of the structure. Its object will be understood by the following extract from the preface.

'The present publication is intended to satisfy a curiosity, which frequent inquiries for a description of Tremont House were supposed to indicate.

'Its original plan was to furnish such particulars relative to this establishment as strangers might wish to possess, but it has been extended so as to comprehend many architectural details, which will probably be interesting to mechanics; as much of the ornamental work of Tremont House was copied or adopted from books, not commonly in their hands, and has not before been executed in this country.

II. AN EPITOME OF UNIVERSAL GEOGRAPHY; or, a Description of the various Countries of the Globe; with a view of their Political Condition at the present time. With sixty Maps. By NATHAN HALE.

III. A DICTIONARY OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE; or, an Explanation of Words and Things connected with all the Arts and Sciences. Illustrated with numerous Wood Cuts. By GEORGE CRABB, A. M., Author of 'English Synonymes,' 'Technological Dictionary,' and 'Historical Dictionary.'

IV. THE VESTAL — A TALE OF POMPEII. 1 Vol. 12mo.

'Oh Time, thou beautifier of the dead,
Adorner of the ruin.' CHILDE HAROLD.

V. AUTHORSHIP. A Tale. By a New Englander over Sea. 1 Vol. 12mo.

VI. AN ORATION; Delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, Cambridge, Mass. August 26th, 1830. By the Rev. ORVILLE DEWEY.

VII. THE DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Published under the Direction of the President of the United States, from the Original Manuscripts in the Department of State, conformably to a resolution of Congress, of March 27, 1818. Edited by JARED SPARKS.

This important Correspondence, now for the first time published, will form eleven volumes. Eight are already published and the remainder will appear very shortly.

VIII. JEFFERSON'S WORKS, In four Volumes. Accompanied with a Portrait on steel, and a fac-simile of the original draft of the Declaration of Independence. Second Edition.

IX. THE NEW TESTAMENT, conformed to Griesbach's Text. 1 Vol. 12mo.

THE TOKEN, a Christmas and New Year's Present, for 1831. Edited by S. G. Goodrich.

'Then take my flower, and let its leaves
Beside thy heart be cherished near,
While that confiding heart receives
The thought it whispers to thine ear.'

The engravings for the Token of this year are executed by Cheney, Ellis, Gallaudet, and others; among the contributors are Dewey, Greenwood, Miss Sedgwick, Mrs Sigourney, Hall, Peabody, Wetmore, author of a Year in Spain, author of Tales of the Northwest, Neal, Thatcher, Mrs Hale, and others of the first reputation.

The work is larger than heretofore, and is done up in splendid embossed morocco. The literary department is considered decidedly superior to the former years, and in all respects it has received the greatest care and attention. Oct 23.

---

BIGELOW'S SUPPLEMENT. HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. have just published A Digest of Pickering's Reports, Volumes 2—7, being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports.—By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law. Oct. 23.

---

PICKERING'S REPORTS, Vol. 8th. This day published and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. Oct. 23.

---

This day received by GRAY & BOWEN, 141 Washington Street.

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW, No XXV. for July 1830.

Contents: 1, The Ballot: 2, Carwell: 3, Government of Lower Canada: 4, Wilson's life of Daniel de Foe: 5, Greek Lexicons: 6, Physiology and Cultivation of Trees: 7, Game of Life: 8, Dobell's Siberia: 9, Bishop of London and Sabbath Breaking: 10, Three Courses and a Dessert: 11, Clarendon: 12, Moorsom's Nova Scotia: 13, Religious Disabilities: 14, Stamp Act and Synod of Somerset House: 15, Patronage of Art, and the President of the Royal Academy: 16, Distress of the Country: 17, Egyptian Notation: 18, Great Britain and France: Postscript to the Article on the Ballot.

The Westminster Review has existed long enough, to see the cause in which its efforts were begun, make a notable advance in the opinions of mankind. Its proposed object was to prove, that the interests which were supposed confined to the wretched and weak, are in reality those of all ranks and orders in the state; and if the course has been successfully shaped, it is unnecessary to discuss what portion of the progress has been consequent on the efforts of the rowers, and what on the general tide which carried them upon their way. The term which was once employed as a name of low reproach, has found its way into high places, and is gone forth as the title of a class, who glory in their designation, and are not afraid to speak with their enemies in the gate. Like the early Christians, they may say to their opponents—Hesterni sumus, et vestra omnia implevimus, urbes, insulas, castella, municipa, concilabula, castra ipsa, tribus, decurias, palatium, senatum, forum.—They cannot even add the Sola vobis, relinquimus templa. What has been gained by reason, will never be wittingly abused; and it will be fame enough for common men, if what they have hitherto defended they hereafter can assist. Oct. 23.

---

DANE'S ABRIDGMENT OF AMERICAN LAW, in 9 vols. with an appendix. A few complete sets for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. H., G. & Co. will also supply the ninth vol. and the appendix to those who are owners of the eight volumes, and the appendix separate to those who have the ninth. Oct. 23.

---

ENGLISH LAW BOOKS. This day received and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & Co.

Browne's Chancery Practice, under the New Orders with the Sanction of the Court, in 2 vols. 8 vo.

Willoch on the Laws of the Medical Profession, 1 vol. 8 vo.

Finelly's Law and Practice of Elections, 1 vol. 12 mo.

Crabbe's History of the English Law, 1 vol. 8 vo.

Oct. 23.

---

PRINTING. The Printing House of I. R. BUTTS, corner of Washington and School Streets, is supplied with materials suitable for Book, Job, and every other description of Printing. Oct. 23.

---

DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS, TO WIT: District Clerk's Office.

BE it remembered, that on the seventeenth day of August, A. D. 1830, in the fiftyfifth year of the Independence of the United States of America, Lewis Bigelow of the said district, has deposited in this office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as author in the words following, to wit:

'A Digest of Pickering's Reports, volumes II.—VII., being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law.'

In conformity to the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned;' and also to an act entitled, 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled, 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned,' and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints.'

JNO. W. DAVIS, Clerk of the District of Massachusetts.

---

GRAY & BOWEN, have in preparation, and will very shortly put to press,

A NEW DICTIONARY OF MEDICAL SCIENCE AND LITERATURE; which will contain a concise account of the various subjects in Anatomy, Physiology, Pathology, Therapeutics, Materia Medica, Surgery, Obstetrics, and Pharmacy, with the Etymology and Orthoepy of the terms of their Greek, Latin, French, and German synonymes;—a copious Bibliography appended to the different articles, and Biographical Notices of the most eminent Authors in the different departments of Medical Science, with a Catalogue of their principal works mentioned and an Epitome of the existing state of Medical Science and Literature. By Robley Dunglison, M. D. Professor of Medicine in the University of Virginia &c, &c.

While many of the nations of Continental Euro possess Dictionaries, which have kept pace with t advancing condition of Medical Science, Great Britain and America possess it may be said, but one of a concise character,—that of Hooper,—which independently of its want of accuracy on many points, is incontestibly far behind the present state of Medical Science and Literature, and unfit for the purposes of the Medical Student. In proof of this, it will be sufficient to remark, that the New Dictionary will contain at least five thousand words more than are to be found in that publication,—while the circumstance of the Dictionary of Hooper being stereotyped in this country, renders it impracticable to make the necessary additions to it, were the ground work such as to render such a course advisable.

The work will not be a mere Dictionary of terms; it will comprise concise histories of diseases: a description and doses of various kinds of medicine, with formula for the different Pharmacentrical preparations, &c, &c.

The important publications daily appearing in France and Germany, have induced the author to add the French and German synonymes to the various terms; so that the work will really contain the substance of an English, French and German Dictionary, at a comparatively trifling expense.—The French Index will be found to include every word in the 'Dictionaire des Science Medicales,' which consists of sixty volumes, as well as in the smaller Dictionaries more recently published.

Great attention has been, moreover, paid to the Greek and Latin synonymes, so that the Dictionary will, it is trusted, form a safe and convenient guide to the study of ancient and modern authors on Medicine.

It will be comprised in one large volume, 8vo. Oct. 23.

---

HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. No 134 Washington Street, Boston, have in press a Trearise on Corporations, with an appendix of the Corporation acts of each state, by Joseph K. Angell, author of a Treatise on Water Courses, Tide Water, Limitations, &c. Oct. 23.

---

LAW BOOKS.—HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. 134 Washington Street, have on hand a large Stock of American and English Law Books, comprising a complete assortment of the best editions of all works in general use. They also purchase and sell second hand Law Books—terms liberal.

H., G. & Co. supply any volumes that may be wanted of Massachusetts or Pickering's Reports.

---

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of adminis ring and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire: and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Price $1,25.

---

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. This day published by HILLIARD, GRAY, & Co. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law: being a continuation of the Digest of Massachusetts Reports; and also a continuation of Metcalf's Digest of the same work. Neatly bound in Sheep,3,50.—Calf, $4,00

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1830. NO. XVIII.

MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE.

LEGITIMACY.

Continued.

'That the presumption of legitimacy arising from the birth of a child during wedlock, the husband and wife not being proved to be impotent, and having opportunities of access to each other, during the period in which a child could be begotten and born in the course of nature, may be rebutted by circumstances indicating a contrary presumption.

'That in every case where a child is born in lawful wedlock, the husband not being separated from the wife by a sentence of divorce, sexual intercourse is presumed to have taken place between the husband and wife, until that presumption is encountered by such evidence as proves, to the satisfaction of those who are to decide the question, that such sexual intercourse did not take place at any time, when by such intercourse the husband could, according to the laws of nature be the father of such child.

'That the presumption of the legitimacy of a child born in lawful wedlock, the husband not being separated from his wife by a sentence of divorce, can only be legally resisted by evidence of such facts or circumstances as are sufficient to prove to the satisfaction of those who are to decide the question, that no sexual intercourse did take place between the husband and wife, at any time when by such intercourse the husband could by the laws of nature be the father of such child.'

Now as there was in the present case no evidence to shew that Lord Banbury was incapable of begetting children, and as there was evidence of his living and even sleeping with the Countess, it appears to us that these decisions of the judges leave little room for doubt upon the law of this highly interesting question.

The peers who most distinguish themselves in the delivery of their opinions were Lords Redesdale, Ellenborough, Erskine and Eldon. The first of these seems to have commenced rather in the style of an advocate than a judge. His lordship observed, 'This is a question not simply between the crown and the claimant; it affects every earl whose patent is of a subsequent date to the patent of William, Earl of Banbury. It is a question which has been frequently agitated within these walls, and one hundred and seventy years have elapsed since the cause of discussion arose. Your lordships are called upon to try a fact which could not be established when the memory of it was fresh, and when, the parties most competent and most interested to prove it being alive, the house was best qualified to give the subject a judicial termination. It must be observed that this delay cannot be imputed to the house, for no obstacles have ever been interposed from that quarter to the prosecution of his claim.' The facts stand thus: Of seven previous petitions presented by the ancestors of the present claimant, one was decided by the committee in their favor, but the house delayed, and at last refused to act thereupon; one was rejected under very unfavorable circumstances; one they declined entering into; the other four they entertained, yet never came to a decision upon them. Is, then, no delay in the matter to be imputed to the house? Or rather did they not constantly take refuge in delay from their conviction, that the law of the land was one way, and the facts of the case another. Furthermore, although the immaculate honor of the peers places them above all suspicion of bias from improper motives, there appears me particular necessity for reminding a judge the moment previous to his arbitrement, on which side his interest lies. Lord Redesdale then proceeded to take the question in detail, and demonstrated, with much skill and care, the undeniable truth, that, on the facts of the case, there existed a very strong presumption against the legitimacy of Nicholas. He affirmed that the uninterrupted course of decision in favor of legitimacy, which we have discussed above, was founded not on the law of England, but on a certain law laid down by Lord Coke. 'I have,' said his Lordship, 'a great respect for the memory of Lord Coke; but I am ready to accede to an assertion made by some of his contemporaries, that he was too fond of making the law, instead of declaring the law, and of telling untruths to support his own opinions.' He concluded by stating, that, in his own opinion, lapse of time alone was a sufficient ground for rejecting this tardy claim. On this point we cannot do better than quote the words of the Edinburgh Review.

'Is it necessary, in answer to this, to state the self-evident proposition, that questions of peerage stand upon a totally different footing from any other description of right? In all cases of property which depend upon legal conveyances and titles, statutes of limitation have been wisely enacted, upon the principle, that every man is presumed to enjoy what is his own; and that whoever has, for a great length of time, neglected to clothe his rights with possession, may be presumed either never to have had such rights, or to have released them for a valuable consideration; and also that it is unjust to disturb those who have been for a series of years in undisputed possession. But, in cases of peerage, there can be neither alienation or surrender; and although there may be omission to claim the right, that omission can never have the effect of transferring the title to another. The successful claimant, therefore, entails on no one the cost or inconvenience of defending a vested interest—he drives no one from his possessions—he interferes with no one in the exercise of a right, save inasmuch as, by establishing an older peerage, he acquires precedence over the representative of a more recent one; and it is this trifling consideration that would urge the legislature to preclude the heir of an ancient title from claiming the honors derived from his ancestors; thus assuming the power of extinguishing a right which the crown itself is not able to destroy.'*

Lords Ellenborough and Eldon concurred in opinion with Lord Redesdale. The substance of of the arguments of all three may be thus briefly stated. This is a question of presumption. The presumption of legitimacy arising from the fact of marriage may be rebutted by circumstances inducing a contrary presumption. Impotence is such a circumstance. So also is any other case or combination of circumstances, proving that the husband could not be the father of the child. It is agreed that neither impotence nor want of access is proved in the present instance. There is, therefore, no physical impossibility of Lord Banbury's being the father. But, in the absence of such evidence, the question may be decided on the ground of a moral impossibility. The conduct of the parties in this case establishes such a moral impossibility.

Granting the last assertion to be true, it is impossible to reconcile this argument with the uniform decisions of courts, or with the dicta of the judges above quoted. It is equally impossible to reconcile it with the declaration of Lord Ellenborough himself, just six years previous, that such proof of non-access was necessary, as shows the absolute physical impossibility of the husband being the father. It is also worthy of remark that this able and learned lawyer could produce only one case in support of his new opinion, that of Foxcroft from the times of Edward the First, when the civil and canon law governed the courts.

Lord Erskine was the principal vindicator of the rights of General Knollys. Although his speech had not, like those of his opponents, the advantage of being corrected by himself, it yet stands pre-eminent for eloquence, and, as we think, for argument. His first care was to overthrow the distinction that had been taken by Lord Redesdale and others, between a legitimacy in law, and a legitimacy in fact.

'It appears,' said he, 'of the first importance that the law by which this case is to be decided, should be accurately laid down. The facts of the case are only of importance with reference to the law, and any conclusion that may be drawn from them, which is not applicable to the law, is equally idle and irrelevant. If a former committee endeavored, in their resolutions on this claim, to distinguish the law from the fact, they cannot be too severely censured, as nothing could be more opposed to justice than such a distinction. Legitimacy on law and legitimacy in fact cannot be at variance; they are in every respect identical, and the apparent ground of distinction between them originates in an erroneous notion of the idea they purpose to convey. Legitimacy is the creature of law, and the term has no other meaning than that which is affixed to it by law. It is the designation of a particular status, the qualities of which have been enumerated and defined by law, as best adapted to preserve the order and security of society. When a question of legitimacy arises, and the claimant has proved the facts which constitute his legal title, whatever suspicions may exist to the contrary, the verdict must be given in his favor. These facts may be very far from convincing the judge that the claimant was actually begotten by his ostensible father: yet the judge has no alternative, for the claimant has fulfilled the conditions prescribed by the law. The province of the judge has been circumscribed by the lawgiver, and it would be a breach of his duty were he to extend his inquiry beyond the limits within which the question is confined.'

* Edinburgh Review for March, 1829, p. 216.

Lord Erskine then proceeded to review the cases on this subject, and to shew that they all concurred in supporting his view. He then went on to vindicate their principle.

'Such is the law of England, as it has existed from early times down to the present hour. I am not here to defend the law, but to administer it. Perhaps the lawgiver may have laid down a rule not always infallible; he may, in some instances, have diverted hereditary wealth from its proper channel, by enriching the fruit of an adulterous intercourse, and he may thus have created the relation of parent and child where it had no real existence.

In my opinion, these occasional and very rare deviations from justice amount to nothing more than the price, which every member of the community may be called upon to pay, for the privileges of an enlightened code. No laws can be framed sufficiently comprehensive to embrace the infinite varieties of human action; and the labors of the lawgiver must be confined to the development of those principles which constitute the support and security of the society. He views man with reference to the general good, and to that alone. He legislates for men in general, and not for particular cases. No one can doubt that the interests of society are best consulted by making a question of such frequent occurrence as legitimacy, to rest on a limited number of distinct facts, easy to be proved, but not to be counterfeited, instead of leaving it to be the result of inference from a series of indefinite facts, separately trifling, and only of importance collectively, from the object to which they are applied. Marriage and cohabitation afford us a more sure solution of the question of legitimacy than we could arrive at by any reasoning on the conduct of the husband and wife. The conduct of Lord and Lady Banbury may be satisfactorily accounted for by the supposition, that Nicholas was considered illegitimate by his mother; but if she cohabited with Lord Banbury at the time of the conception, she may have been mistaken in her judgment of the father to whom she assigned the child, and it would be monstrous that the status of any individual should be left to the determination of the very party, who is expressly disqualified by law from giving any evidence on the subject.'

The exertions of Lord Erskine were unsuccessful, and on the 18th day of June, 1813, the House resolved, that the petitioner was not entitled to the title, dignity, and honor of Earl of Banbury. On this a most eloquent protest was drawn up by Lord Erskine, and signed by three Princes of the blood royal, and seven other peers.* The Edinburgh Review, in an article before quoted, while confessing that this decision of the House has overturned the former law of legitimacy, acquiesces in its propriety on the ground, that it introduces no confusion or uncertainty, but merely adds one to the list of circumstances competent to establish illegitimacy, namely, concealment of the child from the husband. On the proof of such concealment, the reviewer argues, that this case and the subsequent one of the Gardner peerage claim were decided. If such be the fact, we have merely assimilated our own law to that of the Code Napoléon, which admits but three proofs of illegitimacy,—impotence, non-access, and concealment. But we cannot view the matter in this light. In the first place the concealment of the children from Lord Banbury is very far from being actually proved. The grounds for such a hypothesis are his uniform non-recognition of them by deed, will, or other declaration, and the name of Vaux which they bore in infancy. But it must not be forgotten, that the Earl often saw, and perhaps slept with Lady Banbury during her pregnancy. He was in the same house with her at the time of her confinement. Is it likely that neither eyes or ears should give him intimation of the fact? Is it not equally probable, at least, that he was acquainted with the adulterous commerce Lady Banbury carried on, and disposed to tolerate it from corporeal or mental imbecility, or perhaps from base and interested motives? The complaisance which endured the wife, need not extend to recognise the children. He could feel no inclination to confer on them the benefits of his title or property, but would naturally leave them to Lord Vaux to name and nurture. This is an improbable theory doubtless, but we have only a choice of improbabilities. In the second place, if there was a concealment, the report of the case shows that the opponents of the claim used it only as a circumstance, indicating a presumption of illegitimacy. They laid no stress on its nature, nor did they regard it apart from other circumstances. We take the plain statement to be, that the law formerly stood thus,

Presumption of legitimacy may be rebutted by physical evidence proving the contrary.

And that it stands from the Banbury peerage case,

Presumption of legitimacy may be rebutted by physical evidence proving, or by moral evidence rendering probable the contrary.

Mr Phillips is, therefore, justified in laying down as a doctrine to be extracted from this case, 'that the jury may not only take into consideration, proofs tending to show the physical impossibility of the child born in wedlock being legitimate; but they may decide the question of paternity by attending to the relative situation of the parties, their habits of life, the evidence of conduct, and of declarations connected with conduct, and to every induction which reason suggests for determining upon the probabilities of the case.'* Such a law has at least the disadvantage of uncertainty, and of holding out strong encouragement to fraud and perjury. To what evils it may hereafter give rise, we do not venture to predict. But of one thing we are sure, that it puts in peril the legitimacy of every child who may have the misfortune to spring from an adulteress. It needs no ghost to teach us that such a woman will rather ascribe the paternity of her offspring to a favored lover than to a detestable husband. She will try to believe it so, and communicate the belief to her paramour. He is not unlikely to be flattered and pleased by the intelligence, and may be anxious to possess himself of the child from birth, to rear and educate as his own. But this is impossible without concealment. A secret confinement is resolved on, and the child conveyed away at once, and placed under the adulterer's care. It cannot be denied that this child is bastardized by the new law. Yet he, possibly, may be equally legitimate with the most chastely descended peer, who condemns him.

[To be continued.]

* See Lords' Journals, vol. xlix. 178.

* A Treatise on the Law of Evidence, V. ii. p. 288. Ed. 1829.

INDEPENDENCE OF THE JUDICIARY.

We shall now proceed to examine the provisions respecting the judiciary, which are contained in the constitutions of the different states, and their bearing upon the independence of the tribunals. Of these, the first that we shall consider, is found, in terms, in the constitution of Virginia only, but it has been asserted to exist by implication in those of many if not all of the other states, as well as in that of the United States. It is that which authorizes the legislature to abolish a whole court by a single act,—to destroy the office, and thus to remove the incumbent.

This mode of vacating the tribunals has been already adopted in this country, and in more than one instance, and some of our readers have not yet forgotten the deep and long excitement which ensued; it may also be adopted hereafter, and be attended with similar irritation. At the present moment when all party feeling upon the subject has subsided, and when we can recur to the past as matter of history, let us look at the legality and policy of such a measure, and endeavor to ascertain its tendency with calmness and impartiality. Its brief examination may well be allowed to us, for there is no measure that acts more directly or powerfully upon the stability of the tribunals. Before entering upon the immediate discussion, it may be observed that the measure alluded to—the power of abolishing the courts by an act of the legislature—supposes all the provisions expressly made to have failed; it proceeds upon the necessary idea that the legislature cannot be induced by its requisite majority to address the governor, that there is no ground for impeaching the judges, and that they have not been guilty of misbehaviour. In other words, it is to be adopted as a last, and desperate remedy. This measure, we shall contend, is unconstitutional, and dangerous.

And here at the outset, we remark, that nothing warranting such a measure can be found, in terms, either in our own national constitution, or in those of the several states, with the solitary exception already mentioned. Not a line, or word, or syllable, not a hint can be found, referring to such a measure, as having ever been contemplated by their framers. We ask then, is it conceivable that the power in question, one by which the tribunals of a state may be destroyed in a moment, and without any alleged cause for their destruction, has been vested by the people in the legislature—and yet that not the slightest allusion to its exercise or existence should be found? If this may be believed, may we not believe anything—may we not suppose implied powers of any and every description to have been conferred upon the legislature, and thus make them in fact omnipotent?

We also contend that this power has been prohibited, by the provisions actually existing respecting the judicial office. These provisions point out the modes in which the judges may be removed, and they generally vest the power in the governor after he has been addressed by both houses—or in the senate, after a conviction upon impeachment. Aside from these modes of removal, the office is made wholly dependent throughout its prescribed term, whether that extends through life or is confined to a certain age or number of years upon good behaviour only. Such provisions when they declare the manner and the cause of removal, also declare in spirit and by necessary implication, that there shall be a removal in no other manner and for no other cause. The maxim, 'expressio unius est exclusio alterius,' here applies directly.—Without such a construction, the provisions actually made have no meaning and are merely idle words; for if other modes of removal than those specified in the constitution may be legally adopted, why are any specified whatever—why was not the whole subject left expressly to the discretion of every legislature, or why was not the constitution absolutely silent upon the matter?

What is a constitution in the political sense of the term? In a republic, it is that instrument by which the people declare that they have chosen, for their own benefit, to part with certain portions of that power which is originally inherent in themselves, and always derived from themselves. The power thus parted with is usually distributed among three co-ordinate departments—each of which is distinct from the others—each of which has powers peculiar to itself—and each of which derives all its powers, as well as its existence, from the people. So far as these powers are peculiarly vested, no other department can interfere with their exercise; the limit has been assigned and fixed by a higher agent, and cannot be transcended. The moment that the limit thus fixed, in any case, is passed by any other department, its first step is a mere usurpation, and may rightfully be resisted in any manner whatever. To apply then these simple and familiar principles for a moment: if no express and no implicit recognition of the mode of removing the judges which we are now considering, can be found in the constitution, what shall we style its exercise? It is usurpation only, and can claim no obedience.

If the brief hints we have thus presented are as satisfactory to others as they are to our own minds, let us next inquire into the expediency of the measure in question. And it requires no argument to establish the position that, whatever is unconstitutional, is inexpedient and dangerous. A constitution is adopted that it may be obeyed. It is the great charter by which the government are to direct their course. It is the towering landmark which is ever to be kept steadily in view, and which can never be lost sight of without also losing sight of prosperity and safety. To sanction any violation of its articles, however slight, is virtually to sanction every violation; it is in fact to declare, that this solemn expression of the will of the people has no binding force, and it thus makes the legislature supreme over the law and over the community.

The direct influence of the measure in question upon the stability and independence of the tribunals, will be apparent to every one. Invest the legislature with this power, and from that moment the judiciary are defenceless; a single vote not only removes them from office, but abolishes the office itself. To expose the dangerous tendency of such a result would seem superfluous, especially after the examination given to it in the preceding number, yet we shall allude for a moment to the necessary influence which such a state of things will have upon the mind of every judge. He sees himself the creature of the legislature, dependent upon their will, their caprice, for his office and his sustenance, and never secure of retaining them for a single year. How will he ever dare to expose himself to their displeasure, when such is the penalty. To suppose that most judges will look steadily at the point of duty unwarped by any of these counteracting forces, that they will face the frowns of those who are able to displace them, and decide only as law and justice direct, is to suppose what human frailty denies, and facts disprove. Let the judiciary be thus enslaved and public morals and patriotism become sufficiently corrupted, and we shall then have but two departments in our government; a legislature, to enact and virtually to expound the laws; and an executive, which will be little better than the mere organ of their will. A legislature that has usurped power enough, by construction, to make the judiciary dependent, will never be at a loss for means to impose a similar yoke upon the executive.

What then will be the result of the measure under examination upon the community at large? how will the laws be administered to the people by the tribunals? We answer, the people will be affected as all other communities have been affected, where the judges have been the creatures of the supreme power. The government, no matter what may be its form, whether it is vested in one or in a hundred hands, whether it is hereditary or elective, will control the decisions of the court whenever it sees fit; and the scales of justice will be swayed from their equilibrium just so often, and just so far, as its own interest or that of its ministers and favorites shall incline. We do not intend, when using this language, that our own country, where so much now exists and operates to produce a contrary result, will be speedily the scene of such a perversion of justice. Years must elapse, and the tribunals must generally feel their impotence, and the people must become accustomed to the spectacle of their overthrow, before these predictions can be realized. Nay, we do not believe, until our institutions have become generally corrupt, and the people have been gradually made willing to resign their present glorious inheritance of liberty and law, that such predictions can be realized. But we do believe that the introduction of such a mode of removing the judges as a doctrine into the system of our national policy, and its occasional adoption and exercise by successive legislatures, will hasten on the time when all the evils which we have described as now contingent and indefinitely remote, will then be actually and fearfully felt; when the rescripts of a Venetian senate will take the place of impartial decisions, and law and justice will be known among us rather as names than as things. Preserve our tribunals independent, and whatever else declines, we shall yet in a measure be safe; destroy their independence, and in the end everything else that we now prize, will be in danger.

The further discussion of the subject will be resumed, and probably finished, in our next number.—Journal of Law.

CHIEF JUSTICE SHAW.

Mr Chief Justice Shaw is between forty and fifty years of age; of a firm constitution, and of laborious habits; of extensive and of various legal learning; of singular clearness of perception and communication; and of a reach and comprehension of mind, admirably adapted to master the most difficult and complicated legal questions. Men of great acuteness of discernment are often found to be too subtle and refined for the practical business of the bench; but Mr Chief Justice Shaw happily unites the soundest practical sense with a very high degree of acumen and discrimination. He is also uncommonly exempt from party bias of all kinds—(and in these days, such a qualification is of more than ordinary importance in all judicial officers,) and is blessed with a temperament precisely fitted to the station he is called to assume.

There are men in Massachusetts who are more extensively known abroad, and even within the limits of the state—and if the office had been filled by a vote of the primary assemblies of the people, (like that of Governor) it is not probable that Mr Shaw could have succeeded. He has not been a political leader, nor has he been led by politicians. Though often called by the people of Boston into the Senate or House of Representatives, he has not pursued the course which gains the highest eclat—but has diligently attended to the best interests of his constituents and of the commonwealth; and exerted his efforts for their good, without direct reference to his own fame or advancement.

This is the second instance only, in which a Chief Justice of Massachusetts has been taken from the bar. But it has always been done in the Supreme Court of the United States; and the present Chief Justice of the King's Bench is the only man who, for the last century, has been promoted to that office from a lower seat on that bench.

As a general rule it seems to us decidedly preferable, for many reasons, that a Chief Justice should be taken directly from the bar. He will better know the deficiencies and peculiarities in the court, (if any exist) which require correction, than one who has been on the bench, and who, therefore, has been excluded from that unreserved intercourse with the members of the profession, which alone can apprize him of their views and opinions on topics of this nature. A puisné judge it is true, may on his accession to office, carry equal knowledge of these things to the bench—but he cannot carry there an equal power of correction. We believe we express a very common sentiment, when we say that much more confident and rational hope of improving the jurisprudence of any state or country is allowable, when the head of the court is selected from the bar, than when a side judge is made Chief Justice. There are doubtless exceptions to this remark—and we doubt not that either of the associates of the late Judge Parker whom he left to mourn his sudden death, would have ably and satisfactorily fulfilled the duties which are devolved on his successor.

ENGLISH CASES.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.—OCT.

Present,—His Honor the Chief Justice, and the three Puisné Judges.

This being the last day of the term, judgment was delivered in various cases that had come before the Court, of which the following were those of most interest.

Keys vs. The Quebec Fire Insurance Company.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff as one of the Stockholders of the Quebec Fire Insurance Company, to obtain from that Company an account of all the profits and advantages to which he, as a proprietor of ten shares therein was entitled, according to the articles of association; for the purpose of establishing his right to a full proportionate share of such profits and advantages, notwithstanding a by-law, or resolution, of the Directors which would operate to abridge his share of those profits and advantages most materially. It appears that a Resolution was entered into by a board of Directors of the said company, on the 23d of Feb'y last, that after the next 31st of March, the discount to be allowed to Stockholders upon the amount of premiums to be paid to the Company, should be 33⅓ per cent, and that all Stockholders should be entitled to such discount to the annual amount of £500 for each share.' The Plaintiff never having effected any Insurance with the Company, was deprived, by the said Resolution of an entire third of his just share of the profits and advantages arising from such insurances as were effected by other Stockholders; and brought this suit to try the validity of that Resolution, by which the Tariff of premiums, established in conformity with the articles of association, was divided into two different rates, one applicable to Stockholders effecting insurance with the company and the other to individuals, not being Stockholders, effecting insurances.

The defendants had entered a demurrer, or defense en droit, on the ground that the suit was improperly brought as making the illegality of the by-law, a specific ground of action, inasmuch as the by-laws of any corporation could not be within the jurisdiction of a Court of law.

The decision of the Court hereon was delivered by his honor the Chief Justice, who said the case was an important one, not only to the parties concerned, but to all the partners in every Joint Stock Company. With regard therefore to the defense en droit, it had been argued that no action could be specially brought by one partner of a Joint Stock Company, against the Company as a corporation, in the same manner as the partner of a mercantile concern, could not maintain an action against another partner for any claim arising out of the partnership. But here there was no demand of money, no claim of debt—there was nothing but the demand of an account; and the declaration was a mere narration as to the grounds, on which the plaintiff considered the by-law, or resolution of the Directors, which he complained prejudiced him, as insufficient, and contradictory to the articles of Association of the Company. It was an account, and nothing but an account that was asked for. The Counsel for the Company had admitted that an account existed in conformity with the resolution in question, which it was denied, the plaintiff could legally object to in a Court of Law, but if he could not bring it before this Court, he would be remediless in case of Adlee, vs. the Whitstable Fishery and Dredging Company, (Cases in Chancery, p. 315, et seq.) in which the validity of a by-law was sought to be called in question, it was laid down by Lord Eldon, that a partner of a Joint Stock Company has a right to bring an action against the Corporation of which he is a member, for, 'if the consequence of such management (in forming by-laws) is that a Court of law, cannot enter into the validity of a by-law, the question is whether this Court will not hold jurisdiction for the purpose of sending that question to a Court of law, otherwise the most unreasonable thing might be done without a remedy in any Court.' 'The mode of trying the question of the validity of a by-law, appears to be by an action.' Hence if such an action in common law can be maintained, it appears that this action may, and the general allegations of the defendants are met by this case. There is a special allegation, however, that the declaration does not state any refusal to grant the account desired; but this is in fact an application to set aside the resolution entered into by the directors—there is no conclusion—no prayer for judgment of a debt claimed—so there need not be any statement of a refusal to grant an account. But it is shewn on the face of the declaration that the account required would never have been obtained had it been asked, it being considered, that the plaintiff was not entitled to any portion of these profits which were given up to certain stockholders, in consequence of the resolution in question. The declaration thus accounts for there being no demand of account made, nor any refused to grant it.

The Court determined that the defense en droit should be over-ruled; and that the parties should proceed.

Dalkin Sen. vs. Dalkin Jun.

This was an action brought by the father against the son, for wages during several years he had been employed in superintending the rope walk of the defendant. It appeared that the father boarded and lodged with the son, and several sums had been paid to him from time to time, but no specific agreement existed as to the amount of wages. This action had been brought three or four terms back for services rendered by the plaintiff to the defendant, and as there was no evidence of the quantum of wages, that question had been referred to arbitrators, who reported that £25 should be paid to the plaintiff, and £25 per annum afterwards to him for life. With this report the plaintiff was not satisfied, and, on the ground of its not stating what specific balance was due to the plaintiff, it was set aside, and fresh arbitrators appointed, (Messrs Tremain and Newton.) who reported no wages at all were due to the plaintiff. It was now prayed to have this report also set aside, and other reference made, (but not to the same arbitrators,) as it did not fulfil that which it was directed to establish, namely the quantum of wages that was due.

Mr Aylwin, for the plaintiff, observed that the only question for the consideration of the referees, was the quantum of wages due, the judgment of the court being in favor of the plaintiff, sending the case to arbitrators, only to determine how much that judgment should be for. The first referees did not appear to have been at all regulated by the ordinary principle of law, but, taking this to be a question of alimentary allowance between farther and son, had wandered into equity, and followed their own ideas in that respect, for though they hed awarded one sum of £25, to be forthwith paid, that seemed to be meant only as an advance of the first year's life annuity they awarded. In the last award the referees erred on the contrary. The only question referred to them was the quantum of wages due—the judgment being a declaration that wages were due; but they erected themselves into a court, thought fit to unrip all the proceedings and pronounce judgment de novo and after this come gravely into court, and say that the defendant owes nothing. It was to be regretted that Mr Tremain had not been objected to as referee, as he had himself been engaged in partnership with the defendant in that very rope-walk. Yet, if they had confined themselves to the single question before them, how much was due? the plaintiff would have submitted to receive whatever sum they awarded. But this award leaves the question in the same state as when the interlocutory order was given, for the only query left to the referees remained unanswered.

Mr Justice Bowen observed that the terms of the order of reference were, to inquire what wages were due, if any.

The Court took the case en deliberé, and on the 20th decided that the plaintiff should take nothing by his motion, the award having been made upon a reference to report, what wages were due, if any, was ordered to be homologated, and the action dismissed, each party to pay his own costs.—Quebec Star.

---

ROLLS COURT—MAY.

Miller vs. Cooper, Minett, and Co.

This case came on for further directions on the Master's report.

Mr Bickersteth appeared for the plaintiffs. This bill had been filed to set aside a fraudulent deed of assignment, and to obtain restitution of the property thereby wrongfully acquired. The plaintiffs were the executors of a man named Miller, who, by the death of his father, had been left heir, after the death of his mother, to the reversionary interest in a considerable property, including 4,300*l.* in Old Navy Five per Cents. Miller during his father's life was in great indigence, and at one time a prisoner in the Fleet, where he became the subject of the transaction which gave rise to this bill. A man named Cooper, the defendant, obtained from him, for the consideration of 1,000*l.* the assignment of his interest in the 4,300*l.* Navy Five per Cents. Cooper had obtained the 1,000*l.* from Minett and Co., bankers, in Austin-friars, into whose hands he had transferred the assignment, and who had been made defendants to this bill, but had been dismissed afterwards, as it appeared that they had not participated in the fraud. In his answer to the original bill, Cooper had affirmed that Miller had been indebted to him to the amount of 1,800*l.* and a reference had been directed to the Master to inquire into that fact. It appeared that Cooper had induced the unfortunate Miller to sign a paper, acknowledging a debt to that amount, but the Master found that no such debt had ever existed between the parties. Miller died shortly after the assignment, and his mother died in 1823, from which time the defendant had enjoyed that sum which he had obtained from Minett and Co., in lieu of the reversion of the 4,300*l.* The restitution of that sum was the object of the bill.

Mr Agar, on the part of the defendant, argued that the plaintiff had no right to file the bill. The deceased, Miller, had the power of appointing the 4,300*l.* The assignment was tantamount to an appointment. If that appointment was good, there was no matter for a bill—if it were not, then the reversionary interest went to Miller's next of kin, and not to his executors.

His Honor said that this was a case of great fraud. The defendant had persuaded the deceased, Miller, whom, as proved by the evidence, he called 'a wretch' (and a poor wretch indeed he must have been, observed his Honor,) to acknowledge in writing a debt to him (Cooper) of 1,800*l.* By the exhibition of this acknowledgment, the latter had been enabled to obtain the loan, which otherwise would have been impracticable, of 1,000*l.* The objection to the bill he considered most superficial, and, sitting there in a Court of Equity, he could not consider Cooper in any other light than as a trustee to that fund, of which he had so fraudulently possessed himself. He should, therefore, order Cooper to pay the difference between 1,000*l.* and the 4,300*l.* with interest on the latter from the time of the death of Mrs Miller. He should also decree that Cooper should pay the entire costs of this proceeding.

RECENT ENGLISH DECISIONS.

RELEASE.

A nephew who was the heir-at-law, and sole next of kin of the testator, having taken the opinion of counsel as to the widow's rights under her husband's will, and being advised that she took the residue absolutely, contracted to sell her a house which had descended to him as heir; and part of the agreement was, that he should release all demands against her as executrix, or against her deceased husband's personal estate. A general release executed in pursuance of this agreement, was held to be valid, and to vest the stock in the executrix absolutely, though it made no specific mention of the stock.—Collier vs. Squire, 3 Russell, 467.

Where disputed claims are compromised, the party actually entitled cannot afterwards claim the value of his rights.—S. C.

REVOCATION.

A covenant to surrender copyholds, made subsequent to a will, is not in equity a revocation of such will, except pro tanto, as such a revocation only, is, at law, the legal effect of a surrender made in pursuance of that covenant.—Vawser vs. Jeffery, 3 Russell, 479.

Testator devised all his real estates, and some years afterwards made a conveyance in fee of certain land included in his will to trustees upon trust to sell for payment of debts. Held, that this conveyance did not revoke the will, because it declared that the surplus moneys arising from the sale should be personal estate of the testator.—Hodges vs. Green, 4 Russell, 28.

But if such a conveyance has the further purpose to provide an annuity for the separate use of the wife until the sale, it will be a revocation, because the wife would be entitled to the annuity after the death of the husband, if the sale do not take place in his lifetime.—S. C.

SETTLEMENT.

Upon the marriage of A & B, the father of B settled a sum of money upon her and her husband, and the issue of the marriage; and covenanted, by will or otherwise, to settle upon the husband, and wife and their issue, as full and great a share of his property, as he should by will or otherwise, provide to or for the use of any of his younger children, 'to take effect on the death of the survivor of himself and his wife;' and in case he should die intestate, or omit to make such provision, that his executors should pay to the trustees of the settlement, as great a share of his property as his younger children should 'in that event' become entitled to. Held, that the trustees had a claim upon the estate in respect of advances made to the testator's younger children during his lifetime and subsequently to the marriage, and not merely for a provision equal to that which any of the younger children became entitled to at his death; the words 'in the event' not meaning 'upon his death,' but 'in the event of his dying intestate, or omitting to make the specified disposition of his property.—Willis vs. Black, 4 R. 170.

J M previous to his marriage with M A, transferred certain stock to trustees; and by a settlement made in contemplation of that marriage, the trusts of such stock were declared to be for the separate use of M A during her life; and, after her death, for J M if he survived her; but if he died in her lifetime, then for such persons as he should by deed or will appoint to; and in default of appointment, for his executors and administrators. J M died in the lifetime of M A having appointed an executrix, but without exercising his power. Held that the executrix was not entitled to the stock beneficially; but that it was to be administered by her as part of his general personal estate; on the ground that it was the property of J M before the marriage, and that the purpose of the settlement being only to make a provision for M A during her life, the presumed intention must be, that after her death, it was again to become a part of the estate of J M.—Collier vs. Squire, 3 Russell, 467.

SOLICITOR AND CLIENT.

A defendant will not be ordered to produce papers containing confidential communications between him and his solicitor, or between the country and the town solicitor, made in the relation of client and solicitor, either during the cause, or with reference to it, though previous to its commencement.—Hughes vs. Biddulph, 4 Russell, 190.

A plaintiff is not entitled to the production of a letter, admitted to be in the defendant's possession which was written by him to his solicitor after a dispute had arisen between the parties, directing the opinion of counsel to be taken upon the matter in question.—Vent v . Pacey, 4 Russell, 193.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

Bill for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of an estate. The facts were, that after the delivery of the abstracts which had been compared with the deeds by the solicitor of the defendant, but prior to any approbation of the title, the office of the plaintiff's solicitor was accidentally burnt down, and some material title-deeds were destroyed. The Master reported that the abstracts delivered did disclose a good title to the estate, and that the plaintiff could then make a good title, regard being had to the fact of the destruction or loss of the title-deeds. The bill was dismissed with costs.—Bryant vs. Busk, 4 Russell, 1.

Every vendor must necessarily be bound to furnish the purchaser with the means of asserting his title, and defending his possession. The title-deeds are the ordinary and primary means for that purpose. If the primary means do not exist, there may be secondary means to the same end. There may be means of proving what were the contents of the deeds, and that the deeds were duly executed and delivered; and the vendor must furnish the purchaser with the means of such proof. If no such proof can be furnished, the purchaser is entitled to be discharged.—Per Cur. S. C.

RECENT AMERICAN DECISIONS.

INSURANCE.

7. Thus, a ship was insured for two years, by a policy made at Boston, where there was no marine rail-way, and before the expiration of the time she put into a neighboring port to be repaired upon such a rail-way, this mode of repairing having got into pretty general use since the making of the policy, and while she was hauling upon the rail-way she was blown over and bilged; and it was held, that this was a loss within the general words of the policy, 'all other losses and misfortunes to which assurers are liable by the rules and customs of insurance in Boston.' Ellery vs. N. E. Insurance Co. 8 Pick. 14.

8. A party interested in a ship, but whose name does not appear in the custom-house documents or bill of sale, is not obliged, for this reason merely, to disclose the nature of his interest at the time of getting insurance, unless he is questioned in this respect by the underwriters. Bixby vs. Franklin Ins. Co. 86.

9. Where a master of a vessel, insured from one port to another, intends to deviate by putting into an intermediate port and actually puts in there, the assured may nevertheless give evidence that necessity, and not the original intention, was the immediate cause of putting in, and that consequently there was no deviation. Hobart vs. Norton. 159.

10. A vessel being advertised for a voyage from Boston to Charleston, took goods for the latter port, which, by the bill of lading, were to be delivered there, and which the shipper caused to be insured for such a voyage. She took other goods for Edgarton in the island of Martha's Vineyard, it being the original intention to put into that port. The vessel did in fact put into Edgarton, but the course of the wind and tides was such that she must have so put in, had there been no such intention originally. The goods were damaged by perils of the seas in the course of her voyage to Charleston, and sold at a loss. Held, that the owners of the vessel were not answerable to the shippers for this loss. Ibid.

11. The intention, at the commencement of a voyage, to put into an intermediate port out of the course of the voyage described in the bills of lading and advertisements, the termini being still the same, is not the substitution of a different voyage, but is only an intention to deviate. Ibid.

INSURANCE COMPANY.

1. The by-laws of an insurance company provided that the certificates of stock should be transferable only at the office of the company, by the holder personally or by his attorney, and that transfers should be authenticated by the president and attested by the secretary, and that it should be the duty of the president to attend at the office during business hours. An assignment of some shares was made to two copartners, with a power to them both, to transfer the same on the books of the company, and one of the partners called at the office during business hours, and, the president being absent, exhibited to the secretary the assignment and power of attorney, and demanded that the shares should be transferred on the books of the company and certificates issued to himself and his co-partner, but the secretary declined doing anything in the matter, saying it was the president's business. The assignors were indebted to the company in one sum that was then due, and in others not then due. Held, that the company had no lien upon the shares as security for their demands against the assignors, and that they were bound to make a transfer of the shares on their books as demanded, and to issue new certificates to the assignees. Sargent vs. Franklin Ins. Co. 90.

2. The purchaser of shares of the stock of an insurance company is entitled to a certificate, on producing evidence of the assignment, to the officers of the company at their office. Ibid.

3. The shares of the capital stock of an insurance company are personal property of an assign-able character, and any by-law of such company which should require the transfers to be made only at its office personally or by attorney with the consent of the president, would be a restraint contrary to the general law of the commonwealth, which permits the right of personal property and incorporeal hereditaments to be transferred in various ways. Ibid.

4. An insurance company has no implied lien on the shares of the stock, as security for debts due from any of the stockholders. Ibid.

5. Dividends declared by an insurance company, on shares of a stockholder indebted to the company, may be retained by the company towards satisfaction of the debt. Ibid.

6. Where an insurance company, being bound to enter on its books a transfer of shares in pursuance of an assignment of the same, made by the former holder, refused to enter such transfer, and caused the shares to be attached and sold as the property of the former holder, it was held to be liable in damages to the assignees of the shares; and the amount of damages in such case is the value of the shares at the time of such refusal, with interest from that time. Ibid.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1830.

SUPREME COURT.

TRIAL OF JOS. JENKINS KNAPP, JR.

Concluded from page 135.

It is to be recollected, that at the trial of John F. Knapp the same learned gentleman was at the request of the law officers appointed to aid them, and that there was no objection then made by the prisoner, or his counsel. And although that appointment strictly was for the then pending trial, yet if the other trials had followed immediately, the Counsel for the Government would have had reason to suppose that they were to receive his assistance in those trials, unless good objections should have been made. It is said by the law officers, that the preparations for this trial have been made under a similar expectation on their part, and no objection was made to this measure until the jury were empannelled.

It is to be understood that the Solicitor General concurs in the application on the part of the Attorney General, and that two gentlemen only are to address the jury in the case.

It is further to be understood that the 'direction and control of the prosecution' are to be with the Attorney General, who acts under oath, and upon his official responsibility.

We give no opinion upon any application of this nature under any other circumstances than such as are found in the case now before us.

When the reading was concluded, Mr Gardiner observed, that the statute required that there should be no fee or hope of reward to stimulate the exertions of the prosecuting counsel. The objection in this case arose from the belief that the assistant counsel was retained and feed by a private individual. The objection falls to the ground, if this is not the fact.

The Court so understood Mr Webster—and observed that there was now no question before the Court.

Mr Dexter here observed that he did not understand Mr Webster to have said he received no fee from any private individual—and if he were wrong he should like to be set right.

Wilde, Justice, said he distinctly understood Mr Webster to say that he came solely at the request of the Attorney General, and had no other inducement.

The Attorney General here rose to explain the manner in which he procured Mr W., but was stopped, there being no question before the Court.

Mr Dexter said he should like to know whether Mr W. expected any fee from any private individual.

Mr Webster said if it would make it any stronger, he would repeat it.

Mr Dexter said he was satisfied.

The Court again decided, in reply to the Attorney General, that no objection to a juror could be raised after he was sworn.

The question respecting the admissibility of Knapp's confession then came up. Mr Webster was impressed with the conviction that it was clearly admissible, according to the best English authorities. Between the confession made by a man, of his own crimes, and a gratuitous disclosure implicating others, there was a wide difference.—In a simple confession, it is supposed he may be influenced by hope of reward, or favor, or fear of punishment. He may divulge or withhold whatever he thinks may promote his own interest. But in disclosures, made under offer of indemnity, the prisoner is not at liberty to disclose or to refrain from doing so, at his option. He must tell the whole truth. And from the circumstances in which he is placed, it is to be presumed that he does speak truth. The moment he receives assurance from the government that he shall not be prosecuted, he is beyond hope or fear; he is as secure as if pardoned. The practice in this country places the defendant much farther beyond hope or fear, than the practice in England. There the prisoner can only receive the assurance of the Justice of Peace who commits him, that he will recommend that his testimony may be received; which recommendation may be overruled by the Court. In this country the public prosecutor has the absolute power of preventing his ever being brought to trial, and thus securing him perfect indemnity, and placing him beyond the reach of hope or fear. He can be thrown back into a state of uncertainty only by departing from the truth.—What motive induced the defendant to adopt this course, and violate the pledges which he had given to the government in return for the assurance which he had received? Truth was the only condition of his safety. Everything depended upon his telling the truth.

Why should the evidence of a criminal be admitted against others, when not good against himself? The principle would deprive the law of one of its most important prerogatives, and greatly impede the administration of justice. A man might receive this assurance of indemnity on condition of his turning State's evidence—alter his mind, and refuse to testify on the stand against his accomplices— they are consequently acquitted for want of evidence—and he then comes forward and claims his privilege, on the strength of which he is acquitted—and nobody is brought to justice.

The objections which exist to receiving the confessions of a man not certain of his fate have no bearing upon the disclosures made by the prisoner at the bar. Lord Mansfield says, if a prisoner make confessions implicating his accomplices, on receiving promise of indemnity, and when brought into Court, refuse to testify, fail to disclose the whole truth, or falsify in the minutest particular, he must be hanged on his own confession. Modern usage has modified the rigor of the ancient law so far, that if the prisoner demonstrate the honesty of his intentions, he is allowed to go clear. The ancient law allowed not the slightest accidental discrepancy. If he did not testify in Court precisely as he had confessed elsewhere, he was hanged on his own confession. The meaning of confession in this case is obvious. The prisoner is convicted on that confession which, if adhered to, would have saved him. Learned men would not waste words to show that a man might be hanged on his own confession of individual guilt. Every body knows that. But they mean to say that a prisoner who makes such disclosures as to induce the Government to give him assurance of indemnity, and then violates the pledge on his part, may be hanged on his former confession. Judge Christian relates a case of a man thus circumstanced, who, when brought upon the stand, refused to abide by his former confession, whereupon the Judge ordered a new indictment to be found, and he was convicted upon his former confession. Starkie relates the case of a man who made confession of his guilt in consequence of a constable having falsely represented to him that his accomplices were taken, but having discovered the deception, denied all previous confession and refused to give evidence, yet was convicted upon his own confession. It is true this case is only given in a note, and has not found its way into any volume of reports, but its authority has never been questioned or doubted by any. Moreover, there is no opposing authority. Cases of this kind must have been constantly occurring in England, and if the objections raised in this case were sustainable, it could certainly be shown.

The English Courts and this Court say that whatever a man confesses under the excitement of hope or fear, is not to be received in evidence. But no threat of consequences or hope of immunity was held out to the defendant at the bar, to induce him to confess. The whole thing originated with him and his friends. Indeed, it may be said to have originated with the defendant personally. The first thing we hear of, is, his asking Mr Colman whether he thought they could prove it? Prove what? Mr Colman had not charged him with guilt. The conversation began with himself, and with the supposition that he needed the mercy of the State. Mr Colman uttered neither threat or promise in the technical acceptation of the words. No promise, except that he would keep his secret inviolable. He gave him no advice to confess, and in reply to a question of the defendant, told him he did not know what course was best for him to adopt; but offered his confidential services.

The mere communication of facts or other conversations, would not rule out the confession. There must be an inducement. The mere statement of the fact, that Palmer was confessing, and had made application to be admitted as State's evidence, is no valid objection to the admissibility of his disclosures. It was true. To shut out confessions on this ground, would exclude all disclosures made on knowledge of facts. To say that a confession should not be received, because the party was acquainted with facts, would be strange doctrine. No doubt the prisoner was assured of the services of the witness in procuring him indemnity if possible. The last interview, at which the prisoner did confess, was sought by the defendant himself. Mr Colman strove to avoid it, and was twice sent for before he went into the cell. He did not tell defendant it would be better or worse for him to confess, but told him he must act on his own responsibility; and when carrying the offer of indemnity from the government to him, told him it was given upon the sole condition that his confession should be full and implicit, and that if it were not so, if there was any withholding, denial, or contradiction, it was not to avail him.

Mr Dexter said, this was a question of great importance, and he regretted to be obliged to reply entirely without preparation—it was so difficult to take up and follow another's arrangement. It had been urged against the recognition of the rule of law which would exclude the confession of prisoner, that it would lead to public inconvenience and injury, by sometimes preventing the conviction of the guilty. True; but the same may be argued against any rule of law protecting the prisoner. It is acknowledged to be settled, that no confession induced by any promise or threat can be received; but it is contended, that the confession in this case could not have been obtained by any such consideration, because the prisoner was in perfect safety at the time of making it. Wherein does this differ from common cases of involuntary confession, voluntarily repeated? We have a right to show that it does not differ at all, and that the circumstances attending the verbal confession were such as to taint the posterior one in such a manner as to prevent its being received. Nothing occurred to give the latter a different character from the former, and the question recurs, what was the inducement to the first confession? The doctrine which it is desired to introduce in this case, is precisely the old doctrine of approvements not modified according to the modern practice, as is contended, but in all its unmitigated severity.

No case in the English books touches this, except that of Hall. If a statement is made to a prisoner, which has a tendency to excite hope or fear in him, that rules out his testimony; but the truth or falsehood of the information so given has no effect on the admissibility of his confession. A confession made under expectations excited by another, is not a voluntary confession, whether the expectation be of government indemnity or any other benefit. The admission of a prisoner to testify amounts to a recommendation to favor; and if he refuse to perform his agreement, he forfeits all claim to favor on that ground. Here is a hope and a fear. We are willing our case should stand upon this ground. The contract with government is forfeited by the prisoner's own act, but this does not authorise them to introduce evidence not otherwise allowed. If he is put upon his trial and executed, upon evidence that could not have been admitted under other circumstances, he is then executed, not for being accessory to the murder of Mr White, but for breaking his contract with the government.

It cannot be said with justice, that no inducements were offered the defendant, which ought to cause this evidence to be ruled out. Mr Colman's offer of aid, must have meant, I will do all in my power to extricate you from your perilous situation.—From whom did the proposition to confess proceed? Not from the defendant; he was led into it. The remark of Mr Colman that he would not divulge what defendant should communicate to him, except for the purpose of procuring an indemnity from government, amounted to a promise, that he would use all his exertions to procure such indemnity. At the second interview between that gentleman and the prisoner, Mr Colman told him that certain gentlemen in whose opinions he had confidence, thought there was evidence enough to convict him; that Palmer had applied and would probably be admitted as State's evidence; that he did not know what could be done with respect to admitting Knapp as State's evidence, but that he would do for him all that he could. Here are inducements. If the verbal confession was not a credible one under these circumstances, no subsequent repetition can render it admissible.

The point was reserved by the Court, for decision on Wednesday morning.

Mr Gardiner, in reply to a question from the Court, would not dispute that Mr White was found dead in his bed, but would deny that John Francis Knapp was present, aiding and abetting in his murder.

Morton, Justice. They have a right to show that John Francis Knapp was not a felon himself, or was innocent of the particular crime for which he suffered, but no further. A record of conviction, is all that is necessary to prove the guilt of the principal.

Gardiner. Record of conviction is evidence to establish the guilt of the principal and all its legal consequences as to himself, but cannot compromise the rights of him who is accused as accessory. In the record it appears that John Francis Knapp was convicted as principal, being present, aiding and abetting. But the accessory notwithstanding the record of the conviction of a principal, may dispute his guilt.

Dexter. In this case, the indictment charges, that Joseph Jenkins Knapp, jr, hired and procured the murder to be committed. There are two facts to be proved here: that the principal was guilty, and that the accessory hired and procured, &c. Defendant might say that if he had been tried with his principal, both would have been acquitted; or that his counsel would have been able to satisfy the jury of his own innocence. Both the charges in the indictment are to be proved. It is against the rules of evidence to refer to the testimony produced in former trial against prisoner.

At 12 o'clock, the Court adjourned to 2 P. M.

In the afternoon, evidence was introduced to prove the death of Mr White, &c.

Benjamin White, Lydia Kimball, Catharine Kimball, Henry R. Daland, Lewis Endicott, Dr Johnson, John W. Treadwell, Benjamin Leighton, Thomas Hart and Mr Lummus were severally sworn, and testified, as on the former trials.

Mr Dexter objected to the introduction of testimony respecting Richard Crowninshield, jun. Whether defendant hired Crowninshield or not, was not in question in the present trial.

Mr Colman, in reply to a question from Court respecting an endorsement made by him on the written promise of indemnity from government to defendant, stated that it was as follows:—'His confession was to be full and explicit, and if there was any withholding, denial, or contradiction, it was not to avail him.'

A little before 6 o'clock, the Court adjourned to Thursday morning.

At the opening of the Court Thursday morning, a learned and able opinion of the Judges, in writing was delivered by Judge Putnam on this question which it seemed to be agreed by the Counsel was the first time it had arisen in any of the United States:

Whether the confession of an accomplice, made in consequence of a promise from the Attorney General to admit the accomplice as a Witness for the Government on the application of the accomplice, can by law be admitted as evidence against the accomplice himself, after he shall have refused to testify on the trial of those whom he had accused?

The Court, in their opinion on this question, discussed the general principles of evidence and numerous cases in English law bearing on the question. They considered it fully proved in the present case that the Prisoner had no other inducement operating on his mind to make the written Confession offered in evidence than the promise of the Attorney General that if he chose to disclose fully all he knew as to the murder, and would ingenuously testify all his knowledge at the trial of his accomplices, such confessions should not be evidence against himself; and the Court decided that the Prisoner, having thus been made sure of his own safety, did not make the Confessions under the influence of hope or fear, and that his mind was left free and unbiassed, and that he had no temptation to swerve from the truth, and that the government could give in evidence the confessions of J. J. Knapp, jun. on his trial, in the same manner as the voluntary confessions of other accused persons are usually given in evidence, their weight and credibility to be judged of by the Jury.

The opinion was listened to with profound attention by the members of the Bar and a crowded auditory. The written confessions were then read to the Jury by the Attorney General.

Salem Gazette.

---

Rhode Island.—The Supreme Court of Rhode Island has determined that a license for retailing spirits cannot be transferred [illegible] other place than that named in it. A question is before the court, whether lottery tickets, after a drawing, is such evidence of property as to make the taking of them larcency.

Perjury.—A prisoner accused of perjury alleged to have been committed in taking a false oath before the Judges of elections at Charleston, S. C. in regard to his qualifications as a voter, was recently brought before Judge Bay, on a writ of habeas corpus, and after argument, the Judge gave an opinion that taking a false oath at an election is not perjury. To constitute the crime of perjury at common law, a false oath must be taken in a judicial court, in some matter of consequence occurring in a civil suit or criminal prosecution.

Judge Collet.—We learn, with regret, of the severe sickness of Judge Collet. Should he not recover, there will be three Supreme Judges to elect this winter.—Cincinnati American.

---

RECENT ENGLISH PUBLICATIONS.

The Practice of the High Court of Chancery; to which is added a Collection of the Forms of Pleadings, and of Proceeding in that Court. By J. Newland, of the Inner Temple, Esq. Barrister at Law. The Third Edition, with very considerable Additions. In 2 Vols. 8vo. Price 30s. boards.

Parish Law: being a Digest of the Law relating to Parishes, Churches and Chapels, Parish Registers, Ministers of Churches and Chapels, Vestries and Parish Meetings, Churchwardens, Parish Clerks, Sextons and Beadles, Dissenters, Highways, Parish and County Rates, Watching and Lighting Parishes, Weights and Measures, Disorderly Houses, Militia and Jury Lists, Justices of the Peace, Constables, Watchmen, &c, Vagrants, Lunatics, Overseers, Guardians, &c, &c. And the Relief, Settlement and Removal of the Poor. By John Steer, Esq. Barrister at Law. In 8vo. Price 21s. boards.

GRAY AND BOWEN, No. 141, Washington Street, Boston, have recently published the following valuable works.

I. A DESCRIPTION OF TREMONT HOUSE; WITH ARCHITECTURAL ILLUSTRATIONS.—4to.

'Jam scires ab introitu primo—herculentum et amvenum videre et diversonium.' APULEIUS, M. A V.

This work is embellished with a copper-plate engraving, representing the front of the house, and thirty lithographic prints, exhibiting the details of the structure. Its object will be understood by the following extract from the preface.

'The present publication is intended to satisfy a curiosity, which frequent inquiries for a description of Tremont House were supposed to indicate.

'Its original plan was to furnish such particulars relative to this establishment as strangers might wish to possess, but it has been extended so as to comprehend many architectural details, which will probably be interesting to mechanics; as much of the ornamental work of Tremont House was copied or adopted from books, not commonly in their hands, and has not before been executed in this country.

II. AN EPITOME OF UNIVERSAL GEOGRAPHY; or, a Description of the various Countries of the Globe; with a view of their Political Condition at the present time. With sixty Maps. By NATHAN HALE.

III. A DICTIONARY OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE; or, an Explanation of Words and Things connected with all the Arts and Sciences. Illustrated with numerous Wood Cuts. By GEORGE CRABB, A. M., Author of 'English Synonymes,' 'Technological Dictionary,' and 'Historical Dictionary.'

IV. THE VESTAL—A TALE OF POMPEII. 1 Vol. 12mo.

'Oh Time, thou beautifier of the dead,
Adorner of the ruin.' CHILDE HAROLD.

V. AUTHORSHIP. A Tale. By a New Englander over Sea. 1 Vol. 12mo.

VI. AN ORATION; Delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, Cambridge, Mass. August 26th, 1830. By the Rev. ORVILLE DEWEY.

VII. THE DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Published under the Direction of the President of the United States, from the Original Manuscripts in the Department of State, conformably to a resolution of Congress, of March 27, 1818. Edited by JARED SPARKS.

This important Correspondence, now for the first time published, will form eleven volumes. Eight are already published and the remainder will appear very shortly.

VIII. JEFFERSON'S WORKS, In four Volumes. Accompanied with a Portrait on steel, and a fac-simile of the original draft of the Declaration of Independence. Second Edition.

IX. THE NEW TESTAMENT, conformed to Griesbach's Text. 1 Vol. 12mo.

THE TOKEN, a Christmas and New Year's Present, for 1831. Edited by S. G. Goodrich.

'Then take my flower, and let its leaves
Beside thy heart be cherished near,
While that confiding heart receives
The thought it whispers to thine ear.'

The engravings for the Token of this year are executed by Cheney, Ellis, Gallaudet, and others; among the contributors are Dewey, Greenwood, Miss Sedgwick, Mrs Sigourney, Hall, Peabody, Wetmore, author of a Year in Spain, author of Tales of the Northwest, Neal, Thatcher, Mrs Hale, and others of the first reputation.

The work is larger than heretofore, and is done up in splendid embossed morocco. The literary department is considered decidedly superior to the former years, and in all respects it has received the greatest care and attention. Oct 23.

---

BIGELOW'S SUPPLEMENT. HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. have just published A Digest of Pickering's Reports, Volumes 2—7, being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports.—By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law. Oct. 23.

---

PICKERING'S REPORTS, Vol. 8th. This day published and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. Oct. 23.

---

This day received by GRAY & BOWEN, 141 Washington Street.

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW, No XXV. for July 1830.

Contents: 1, The Ballot: 2, Carwell: 3, Government of Lower Canada: 4, Wilson's life of Daniel de Foe: 5, Greek Lexicons: 6, Physiology and Cultivation of Trees: 7, Game of Life: 8, Dobell's Siberia: 9, Bishop of London and Sabbath Breaking: 10, Three Courses and a Dessert: 11, Clarendon: 12, Moorsom's Nova Scotia: 13, Religious Disabilities: 14, Stamp Act and Synod of Somerset House: 15, Patronage of Art, and the President of the Royal Academy: 16, Distress of the Country: 17, Egyptian Notation: 18, Great Britain and France: Postscript to the Article on the Ballot.

The Westminster Review has existed long enough, to see the cause in which its efforts were begun, make a notable advance in the opinions of mankind. Its proposed object was to prove, that the interests which were supposed confined to the wretched and weak, are in reality those of all ranks and orders in the state; and if the course has been successfully shaped, it is unnecessary to discuss what portion of the progress has been consequent on the efforts of the rowers, and what on the general tide which carried them upon their way. The term which was once employed as a name of low reproach, has found its way into high places, and is gone forth as the title of a class, who glory in their designation, and are not afraid to speak with their enemies in the gate. Like the early Christians, they may say to their opponents—Hesterni sumus, et vestra omnia implevimus, urbes, insulas, castella, municipa, concilabula, castra ipsa, tribus, decurias, palatium, senatum, forum.—They cannot even add the Sola vobis, relinquimus templa. What has been gained by reason, will never be wittingly abused; and it will be fame enough for common men, if what they have hitherto defended they hereafter can assist. Oct. 23.

---

DANE'S ABRIDGMENT OF AMERICAN LAW, in 9 vols. with an appendix. A few complete sets for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. H., G. & Co. will also supply the ninth vol. and the appendix to those who are owners of the eight volumes, and the appendix separate to those who have the ninth. Oct. 23.

---

ENGLISH LAW BOOKS. This day received and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & Co.

Browne's Chancery Practice, under the New Orders with the Sanction of the Court, in 2 vols. 8 vo.

Willoch on the Laws of the Medical Profession, 1 vol. 8 vo.

Finelly's Law and Practice of Elections, 1 vol. 12 mo.

Crabbe's History of the English Law, 1 vol. 8 vo. Oct. 23.

---

PRINTING. The Printing House of I. R. BUTTS, corner of Washington and School Streets, is supplied with materials suitable for Book, Job, and every other description of Printing. Oct. 23.

---

DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS, TO WIT: District Clerk's Office.

BE it remembered, that on the seventeenth day of August, A. D. 1830, in the fiftyfifth year of the Independence of the United States of America, Lewis Bigelow of the said district, has deposited in this office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as author in the words following, to wit:

'A Digest of Pickering's Reports, volumes II.—VII., being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law.'

In conformity to the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned;' and also to an act entitled, 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled, 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned,' and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints.'

JNO. W. DAVIS, Clerk of the District of Massachusetts.

---

GRAY & BOWEN, have in preparation, and will very shortly put to press,

A NEW DICTIONARY OF MEDICAL SCIENCE AND LITERATURE; which will contain a concise account of the various subjects in Anatomy, Physiology, Pathology, Therapeutics, Materia Medica, Surgery, Obstetrics, and Pharmacy, with the Etymology and Orthoepy of the terms of their Greek, Latin, French, and German synonymes;—a copious Bibliography appended to the different articles, and Biographical Notices of the most eminent Authors in the different departments of Medical Science, with a Catalogue of their principal works mentioned and an Epitome of the existing state of Medical Science and Literature. By Robley Dunglison, M. D. Professor of Medicine in the University of Virginia &c, &c.

While many of the nations of Continental Euro possess Dictionaries, which have kept pace with t advancing condition of Medical Science, Great Britain and America possess it may be said, but one of a concise character,—that of Hooper,—which independently of its want of accuracy on many points, is incontestibly far behind the present state of Medical Science and Literature, and unfit for the purposes of the Medical Student. In proof of this, it will be sufficient to remark, that the New Dictionary will contain at least five thousand words more than are to be found in that publication,—while the circumstance of the Dictionary of Hooper being stereotyped in this country, renders it impracticable to make the necessary additions to it, were the ground work such as to render such a course advisable.

The work will not be a mere Dictionary of terms; it will comprise concise histories of diseases: a description and doses of various kinds of medicine, with formula for the different Pharmacentrical preparations, &c, &c.

The important publications daily appearing in France and Germany, have induced the author to add the French and German synonymes to the various terms; so that the work will really contain the substance of an English, French and German Dictionary, at a comparatively trifling expense.—The French Index will be found to include every word in the 'Dictionaire des Science Medicales,' which consists of sixty volumes, as well as in the smaller Dictionaries more recently published.

Great attention has been, moreover, paid to the Greek and Latin synonymes, so that the Dictionary will, it is usted, form a safe and convenient guide to the study of ancient and modern authors on Medicine.

It will be comprised in one large volume, 8vo. Oct. 23.

---

HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. No 134 Washington Street, Boston, have in press a Trearise on Corporations, with an appendix of the Corporation acts of each state, by Joseph K. Angell, author of a Treatise on Water Courses, Tide Water, Limitations, &c. Oct. 23.

---

LAW BOOKS.—HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. 134 Washington Street, have on hand a large Stock of American and English Law Books, comprising a complete assortment of the best editions of all works in general use. They also purchase and sell second hand Law Books—terms liberal.

H., G. & Co. supply any volumes that may be wanted of Massachusetts or Pickering's Reports.

---

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of administering and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire: and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Price $1,25.

---

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. This day published by HILLIARD, GRAY, & Co. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law: being a continuation of the Digest of Massachusetts Reports; and also a continuation of Metcalf's Digest of the same work. Neatly bound in Sheep,3,50.—Calf, $4,00

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1830. NO. XIX.

MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE.

LEGITIMACY.

Concluded.

It now remains to notice a question, which may easily arise under all modifications of the law of legitimacy, and is one of the most interesting and difficult problems involved in medical jurisprudence. We mean the extent to which variations from the ordinary term of gestation may take place in woman, whether the birth be premature or protracted. On this, the highest medical authorities are at issue, some adhering closely to the regular period of forty weeks as the extreme time, while others extend their indulgence, even to the utmost verge of eleven calendar months. The latter was of course the favorite opinion in the olden times, when a taste for the marvellous prevailed, while the former accords better with that modern scepticism which grows daily more fashionable, especially among professors of the healing art. Dr Beck, whose work has so often been our text-book in these papers, inclines strongly to believe, notwithstanding the analogies derived from animals, and the recorded cases of medicine and law, that little or no extension beyond the ordinary period can possibly take place. He is supported in this opinion by most eminent practitioners of our own time. Yet the illustrious Hunter declared, that he had known a woman bear a living child in a perfectly natural way, fourteen days later than nine calendar months; and believed two women to have been delivered of children alive in a natural way, above ten calendar months from the hour of conception. Many other scientific and veracious persons may be adduced, who vouch for the possibility of such facts from their own experience. All, however, seem agreed that a prematurity of two months or less is no ground for questioning legitimacy. A few examples of the extent to which credulity was once carried, on these subjects can hardly fail to be amusing. To France the palm of absurdity belongs; for the parliament of Grenoble went so far as to declare the issue legitimate, where the husband had been absent four years, the wife declaring that conception had taken place through the force of imagination alone. 'Ut mulier per fortem imaginationem putaverit, se in somniis rem habuisse cum marito, atque sic concepisse.'

Godefroy mentions a widow who was delivered fourteen months after the death of her husband. The issue was pronounced legitimate by the parliament of Paris, because she had lived during the whole period of widowhood with her husband's relatives, who observed no impropriety in her conduct, and because she showed deep and constant grief for the loss of her partner. Bartholin tells us of a young girl at Leipsic, who on accusing a person of having seduced her, was confined and strictly guarded. At the end of sixteen months she brought forth a child, which lived two days. In 1638, a female was delivered one year and thirteen days after the death of her husband. The opinion of the medical faculty at Leipsic being required, they pronounced the child legitimate. There had however been a month of labor, pains, etc. Sueur, residing at Caudebec, in Normandy, was struck with apoplexy on the 14th of May, 1771, and died on the 16th. His wife, Marie Rose, had never been pregnant during the six years of their marriage. On the 11th of the following September she declared herself with child, and on the 17th of April, 1772, eleven months and one day after his death, she was delivered of a son. On appeal to the parliament of Rouen, a decree was obtained in favor of the child's legitimacy. The unexceptionable nature of Marie's character, and the possibility of protracted gestation were much insisted on. Petit, the celebrated surgeon, relates a case, on the authority of Heister, of a female, wife to a bookseller at Wolfenbuttel, who was delivered thirteen months after her husband's death. The individuals interested proposed to contest the the legitimacy of the infant, but were deterred on account of her excellent character. So convinced was one Christopher Misnerus, who had acted as shopkeeper during her widowhood, of her virtue, that he married her shortly after; and had two children by her, and each of them was born after a gestation of thirteen months. From a large collection of French and German cases on this subject, we may infer that in both countries the law was very unsettled, and the decisions of the Courts mainly regulated by the female's previous character. In France this evil has been remedied by the Code Napoloén, which makes the legitimacy of the child disprovable, where there was no access by the husband from the three hundredth to the hundred and eightieth day before its birth.

The law of England appears to be equally unsettled on this subject. We find these cases in the books. In the 18th year of Edward I. Beatrice, the wife of Robert Radwell, was delivered of a son, eleven days after forty weeks. The husband had been seriously ill, and had no access to his wife for one month before his death. The child was presumed to be a bastard, and judgment was given accordingly. Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Gloucester, died on the 30th of June, of the 7th of Edward II., and on the 28th of January, of the ninth year (within one day of a year and seven months,) his sisters and co-heirs prayed livery. The Countess pleaded, that she was big by the Earl, which was accordingly found per inquisitionem. The matter remained in deliberation for more than a year longer, when the Countess still delaying to bring forth, livery was granted. In another case, during the 18th of Richard II., Andrews, the husband, died of the plague. His wife, who was a lewd woman, was delivered of a child, forty weeks and ten days after the death of the husband. Yet the child was adjudged legitimate, and heir to Andrews, for partus potest protrahi decem dies ex accidente. In another instance: 'Thecar marries a lewd woman, but she doth not cohabit with him, and is suspected of incontinency with Duncomb. Thecar dies. Duncomb, within three weeks of his death, marries her; and two hundred and eightyone days and sixteen hours after his death she is delivered of a son. Here it was agreed: 1. If she had not married Duncomb, without question the issue should not be a bastard, but should be adjudged the son of Thecar. 2. No averment shall be received that Thecar did not cohabit with his wife. 3. Though it is possible that the son might be begotten after the husband's death, yet, being a question of fact, it was tried by a jury, and the son was found to be the issue of Thecar.' All these cases may be found collected in Hargrave's note to Coke Littleton, 123. b.

Britton, Bishop of Hereford, in the reign of Edward I., and distinguished for his knowledge of the common law, has left us a most curious specimen of the wisdom of our ancestors in settling the legitimacy of posthumous children. 'If a woman, upon the death of her husband, gave out that she was enceinte, an examination of her person should take place, and upon the declaration of the examiners, doubting or confirming her statement, she should be committed by the sheriff to a castle, or some other place of safety (so that no woman, or person of whom suspicion could be entertained, should have access to her,) until her delivery. In case her delivery did not take place within forty weeks from the death of her husband, she should be punished by fine and imprisonment; but if her delivery did take place within the forty weeks, then the issue should be admitted into possession, and no one be allowed to aver that it was begotten by other than the husband.' It would seem, then that our sage fathers expected, from lawfully begotten, a more orderly conduct than from others, while they thought those of a less regular origin would keep up their bad character by shewing irregularity and tardiness about their coming into the world.

For more than two hundred years before the contest for the Gardner peerage, the question of protracted gestation seems to have escaped legal inquiry, if we except the single case of Forster and Cooke.* In that instance a legatee filed a bill to have his legacy, and in order to [illegible] the person on whom he had claims, it was necessary to establish a will. But as it is [illegible] in Chancery, for establishing a will, to have the heir-at-law before the Court, it was a question to whom that title properly belonged, and so the period of gestation came to be considered. An issue was directed to try, whether a child, born fortythree weeks after the husband's death, was legitimate; and it appears that the jury found this posthumous child to be the heir-at-law. The interests of the legatee were not affected, whichever way the verdict went; nor does it appear before what Judge the trial took place, nor whether a common or special jury was employed. The Lord Chancellor, who was counsel in the cause, afterwards declared in the Lords, that he held it to be a case of very small importance.

Although the decision of the Gardner barony claim did not depend upon the evidence produced of prolonged pregnancy, but mainly rested on the precedent of the Banbury peerage, the question was, notwithstanding, most elaborately discussed in that case. The following is a brief outline of the facts:

In the year 1796, Captain Gardner (afterwards

* Brown's Chancery Cases, iii. 349.

Lord Gardner) married Miss Adderly. They lived together upon the ordinary terms of man and wife until the 30th of January, 1802, on which day Mrs Gardner took leave of him on board his ship, off St Helens, and proceeded immediately to London. Shortly afterwards, he sailed to the West Indies, from whence he returned to England on the 11th of July following. It appeared in evidence, that for some time before Captain Gardner's departure, his wife carried on a secret correspondence with a gentleman, named Jadis; and during the whole time of her husband's absence there was clear proof of adulterous intercourse. Upon Capt. Gardner's return to England, he found his wife apparently with child; and she, with the hope of being delivered within the proper time, publicly avowed her pregnancy. After employing many expedients to accelerate delivery, such as jolting in her carriage over rough stones, without success, she at length perceived that the child could not be brought into the world in time to make it at all probable that Captain Gardner was the father. She then declared herself to have been deceived in her belief of pregnancy, and that her change of shape was attributable to dropsy; at which imposture her medical attendant appears to have connived. Her husband, and the whole of his family, were deceived by this representation. Mrs Gardner, upon her confinement coming on, revealed the truth to her brother, who took Captain Gardner out of the way. On the 8th of December, 1802, Mrs Gardner was delivered in secret, in the presence of three persons only. The child was immediately conveyed away to an obscure lodging in Swallow Street, and was afterwards christened by the name of Mr Jadis, who, in all respects, treated it as his son. The birth was carefully and successfully concealed from Captain Gardner, who did not even discover his wife's criminality until she left his house, in the year 1803. He subsequently obtained a divorce, and married again. His wife became the bride of Mr Jadis. Captain Gardner succeeded to his family title in the year 1808, and died in 1815, leaving a son by his second marriage, who, in the year 1824, presented his petition to the King, praying to be entered on the Parliament roll as a minor peer. This was opposed by his elder brother, who claimed to be the heir of Lord Gardner. The committee of privileges decided in favor of the junior claimant. Upon the circumstances of concealment and adultery, it seems to have been contended, that there was a moral impossibility of Lord Gardner's being the father of Mrs Gardner's first son, and on this the question was mainly decided. It was further urged, that from the length of time, three hundred and eleven days, that elapsed between the last opportunity of access and the period of birth, there was also a physical impossibility.

At this remarkable trial nearly all the medical practitioners in London, of any reputation or experience in midwifery, were examined at great length. In the evidence of those who appeared to prove, that a variation of any magnitude from the legitimate period of gestation was a thing unknown, we find much more decision and explicitness than in that of their opponents. The former, however, had the peculiar advantage, that their opinions were received as evidence, being, as they averred, the result of their personal experience, while the latter were continually interrupted and silenced by objections raised to their testimony, on the ground that the cases which they quoted were hearsay statements, communicated by women liable to self-deception, und consequently inadmissible by all the rules of law. This, although a correct, appears an unjust cavil; as in a question of this kind, it is very evident that the moment of conception, on which all depends, can very rarely be known to any but the mother herself. Some strong facts were, nevertheless, brought forward. Dr Granville instanced the case of his own wife, where the term gestation, if reckoned from the non-appearance of the catamenia at the proper time for the periodic return (as is commonly the custom,) amounted to three hundred and six days; and, if reckoned from the last appearance of the discharge, to three hundred and thirtyfive days. Mr John Sabine positively affirmed, that the delivery of his own wife had been protracted to the end of ten calendar months. Drs Conquest and Power gave some very clear and satisfactory evidence to the same purport.

Without presuming to give a positive opinion on a subject so involved in obscurity, we must confess an inclination to believe in the possibility and the rareness of these phenomena in gestation. Although we have the declaration of individuals, remarkable for science and experience, that they never knew an instance in which the term of nine months was materially exceeded, such testimony seems more than counterbalanced by the assertion of men equal to them in knowledge aand veracity, who say, that they have known such irregularities in their own personal experience. It is urged against the latter, that their convictions must, of necessity, depend upon the declaration of the mothers themselves; that these mothers are constantly deceived, and many instances are adduced where women have miscalculated most remarkably. The fact is, that on this subject no science or care can insure anything like accuracy. Females are accustomed to date conception from the time of the disappearance of their usual disorder. But it may happen, that pregnancy commenced immediately after its last appearance, or nearly thirty days before, or on any day during the interval. The practice of reckoning from the last possible moment is much in favor of those gentlemen who fix two hundred and eighty days as their limit, because it goes to include cases as conforming to the regular period, which may have gone on to the three hundred and tenth day. But we have the opinion of many scientific men, that it would probably more consist with truth to reckon from the last disappearance of the catamenia, as then pregnancy is most likely to commence. We must think, therefore, that in a matter of so much obscurity and doubt, an extension of three hundred and ten days should be allowed, and that a greater protraction only should be considered proof of illegitimacy.

SAMUEL ROMILLY.

Samuel Romilly was born on the first of March, 1757, in Frith-street, Soho, Westminter. His grandfather, a native of France, retired from that country on the revocation of the edict of Nantz, and settled in England, where his son, Peter Romilly, was brought up to the trade of a jeweller, and married a lady of the name of Garnault, the descendant of a French family; of this marriage the only children who attained the age of maturity were Thomas, Catherine, and Samuel, the subject of this memoir.

He was distinguished in his early youth by great vivacity and sensibility of temperament, the frequent companions of genius. Of his education little has been recorded; but he appears to have been principally indebted for his acquirements to his own exertions, aided by the suggestions and advice of his friend the Rev. John Roget, who subsequently married his only sister. Being originally destined for the profession of an attorney, he was placed by his father under a respectable gentleman in the six clerk's office; but in consequence of the strong predilection which he manifested for the bar, he became, in May, 1778, a member of Gray's Inn, and studied for some time in the chambers of Mr Spranger. In a letter addressed to Mr Roget, who was then travelling on the Continent, he gives the following account of the manner in which he passed his time:—'You ask me how I spend my time;—in a manner so uniformly the same, that a journal of one day is a journal of all. At six or sooner I rise, go into the cold bath, walk to Islington to drink a chalybeate water (from which I have found great benefit), return and write or read till ten; then go to Mr Spranger's where I study till three, dine in Frith-street and afterwards return to Mr Spranger's where I remain till nine. This is the history of every day with little other variation than that of my frequently attending the courts of justice in the morning, instead of going to Mr Spranger's, and of often passing my afternoons at one of the houses of parliament.'

In another letter to the same correspondent, we find traces of that admirable spirit of benevolence which at a subsequent period directed all his exertions in public life. 'Have you ever heard of a book published here sometime since by a Mr Howard, on the state of prisons in England and several other countries? You may conjecture from the subject that it is not a book of great literary merit; but it has a merit infinitely superior: it is one of those works which have been rare in all ages of the world,b eing written with a view only to the good of mankind. The author was some time ago sheriff in the country, in the execution of which office numerous instances of abuses practised in prisons came under his observation. Shocked with what he saw, he began to inquire whether the prisons in the adjacent counties were on a better footing, and finding everywhere the same injustice prevail, he resolved, though a private individual, to attempt the reform of abuses which had become as general as they were shocking to humanity. Accordingly, he made a visit to every prison and house of correction in England, with invincible perseverance and courage; for some of the prisons were so infected with diseases and putrid air, that he was obliged to hold a cloth steeped in vinegar to his nostrils during the whole time he remained in them, and to change his clothes the moment he returned. After having devoted so much time to this painful employment here, he set out on a tour through a great part of Holland, Germany, and Switzerland, to visit their prisons. What a singular journey!—not to admire the wonders of art and nature—not to visit courts and ape their manners; but to compare the misery of men in different countries, and to study the art of mitigating the torment of mankind! What a contrast might be drawn between the painful labor of this man, and the ostentatious sensibility which turns aside from scenes of misery, and, with the mocking of a few barren tears, leaves it to seek comfort in its own distresses!'

In the year 1781, Mr Romilly passed several months on the Continent, visiting Switzerland, the borders of Italy, and the principal parts of France. At Paris, he became acquainted with several of the most distinguished men of letters of that day.

His correspondence with his friends presents a lively picture of the impressions which he received from the state of society in France.

After spending the usual period of probation in unremiting and successful labor, Mr Romilly was called to the bar on the second of June, 1783. In a letter written at this period, he has described the feelings with which he contemplated the entering upon his profession,—feelings which betray the nervous and susceptible temperament with which he had to struggle. 'The nearer I approach the term, which I formerly so often wished for, the more I dread it. I sometimes lose all courage, and wonder what fond opinion of my talents could ever have induced me to venture on so bold an undertaking: but it often happens (and I fear it has been my case), that men mistake the desire for the ability of acting some very distinguished part.'

In another letter we find the early traces of that noble and pure ambition which, throughout the whole of his public life, elevated the character of Sir Samuel Romilly. 'It would seem, my dear Roget, by your last letter, that you thought I had affected doubt of succeeding in the way of life on which I am to enter, in order to draw from you such praises as might encourage me in the pursuit. I assure you that I had no such wish, and that what I wrote to you was but a faithful transcript of what I felt. Could I but realise the partial hopes and expectations of my friends, there would be no doubt of my success, almost beyond my wishes; but in myself I have a much less indulgent censor, and in this, perhaps, alone, I cannot suffer their judgment to have equal weight with my own. I have taught myself, however, a very useful lesson of practical philosophy, which is, not to suffer my happiness to depend upon my success. Should my wishes be gratified, I promise myself to employ all the talents and all the authority I may acquire for the public good—Patriæ impendere vitam. Should I fail in my pursuit, I console myself with thinking that the humblest situation in life has its duties, which one must feel a satisfaction in discharging; that at least my conscience will bear me the pleasing testimony of having intended well; and that, after all, true happiness is much less likely to be found in the high walks of ambition than in the secretum iter et fallentis semita vitæ. Were it not for these consolations, and did I consider my success at the bar as decisive of my future happiness, my apprehensions would be such that I might truly say, Cum illius diei mihi venit in mentem, quo mihi dicendum sit, non solum commoveor animo, sed etiam toto corpore perhorresco.'

For several years the anticipations of Mr Romilly seemed to but too correct. It was truly said by Lord Erskine*, when speaking of advancement in his own profession, that, 'success in life often depended more upon accident and certain physical advantages, than upon the most brilliant talents and the most profound erudition.' Unfortunately, those physical advantages were wanting to Mr Romilly at the commencement of his professional life. A nervous and diffident temperament deprived him in public of the free use of his powerful faculties, and prevented him from displaying the real extent of his skill and acquirements. For four or five years he continued to attend, with little practice or emolument, the courts of equity at Westminster, the midland circuit, and the Warwick sessions. In one of his speeches in the house of commons he has alluded, in answer to the charge of being a mere theorist, to the practice which he had seen in courts of law:—'Whatever may be the opinion entertained of my labors, I can scarcely think that my honorable friend is serious in his opinion that all practical legislative wisdom has quitted this great city, and that we in the court of chancery are a sort of easy speculative dilettanti lawyers, wholly incompetent to form any sound opinion upon criminal legislation. That I may be mistaken I am very ready to admit; but if I am really as ignorant as my honorable friend supposes, my ignorance must be most unpardonable. The subject of criminal law has always been most interesting to me: it has more or less through life been my particular study. For fifteen years I constantly attended our courts of criminal law; and although my researches may not have been very successful, I am in possession of notes by which my honorable friend may be convinced I was not wanting in diligence, and that my endeavors to collect information were not confined to the collection of a few scattered remarks in our superior courts upon the circuit, but extended to the courts of quarter session, where I had the honor for many years to practise.'* At length the assiduity of Mr Romilly was rewarded by a moderate share of encouragement, and by the gradual subsiding of those nervous feelings with which he had been harassed. In 1791, he had acquired considerable practice as a junior counsel; and in 1797 he began to be be known as a leader.

The late Marquis of Lansdowne, to whose friendship and patronage, thirty years earlier, Mr Dunning had been so much indebted, had the acuteness to discover, and the kindness to encourage, the rising talents of Mr Romilly. He was a frequent guest and visitor at the mansions of Lord Lansdowne in London and in Wiltshire, where he attracted the notice and won the friendship of many of the most distinguished persons of his day. Here, too, he first became acquainted with a lady, the eldest daughter of Francis Garbett, Esq., of Knill Court, in the county of Hereford, to whom he was afterwards married.

The promotion of Sir John Scott, the attorney general, to the chief justiceship of the common pleas, in the year 1799, added greatly to the practice of Mr Romilly, who in the following year, was appointed one of his majesty's counsel. From this period he took that distinguished station in the court of chancery, which he held for nearly twenty years.

But as yet he had never ventured into political life. The cares of his profession, and the securing of his own independence, had hitherto wisely claimed all his attention. At length, however, that noble field of exertion, which public life in this country offers, was opened to him, and ample means were afforded him of carrying into effect the great and useful designs which he had so long and so fondly cherished. On the formation of the new ministry, in 1806, he was appointed his majesty's solicitor general, and was immediately returned to parliament as one of the members for Queenborough. On accepting office, he received the customary honor of knighthood. Soon after having taken his seat, Sir Samuel was appointed one of the managers on the impeachment of Lord Melville; a duty which he performed with extraordinary ability.

[To be continued.]

Cobbet's Parl. Deb. vol. vi. p. 427.

* Speeches, vol. i. p. 341.

AMERICAN CASES.

SINGULAR CASE.

A case of rather singular kind has occurred in S. Carolina, growing out of the power vested in its Chief Magistrate to commute the punishment of capital offence. A man named Jeremiah Smith, for a crime committed, was sentenced to death in 1821, but was pardoned by the Governor on condition of his suffering an imprisonment, three months, and then leaving the state, never to return to it. After undergoing the imprisonment, Smith left S. Carolina and settled in N. Carolina, near the line of the two states. He was a blacksmith, and in 1826, the people of a neighborhood in S. Carolina adjacent to that in which Smith lived in N. Carolina, wanting one of his trade, induced this man by their persuasions, to move into their settlement, assuring him he would not be in any danger, and his good conduct since his conditional pardon would make his residence among them safe. It appears that he lived unmolested in S. Carolina in 1826 and 1827, until one of his neighbors with whom he had a fight, informed Governor Miller of Smith's being in the State, when the Governor issued his proclamation offering a reward for his apprehension. Smith in the mean time had returned to N. Carolina, where he was pursued by the person with whom he had a fight and two or three others, seized and brought, without any legal authority, into S. Carolina, and on the affidavit of one of the captors, committed to prison.

Having been brought before Chancellor Harper on a writ of Habeas Corpus, it was urged against his discharge, that although his arrest in N. Carolina was without authority, yet his detention in S. Carolina was lawful—that not having complied, with the conditions of his pardon, Smith was a convicted felon, unpardoned and unpunished, and ought not to be again let loose upon the community, no matter how irregularly he had been brought within the jurisdiction of S. Carolina.

Among other arguments used by the counsel of the prisoner it was contended, that having become a citizen of N. Carolina, he had as such, rights under the Constitution of the United States, of which no inferior tribunal could deprive him—that a clause of the Constitution declares, that 'the citizens of each State, shall be entitled to all the immunities of citizens in the several States.' That as a citizen of N. Carolina, he had a right to come into S. Carolina, and that in this character he came pure into the sister state—he had not become a citizen in N. Carolina upon conditions, as the Constitution makes none. It was contended that the pardon could not affect constitutional rights, and when they came in conflict the conditions of the pardon must yield to the rights which the prisoner had acquired as a citizen of N. Carolina.

The Chancellor decided against the release of the prisoner, and remanded him to jail. His case which has excited a good deal of interest, is to be again argued on the motion to pass upon him sentence of death.—Georgia Recorder.

Joseph Badger vs. Charles Ball.

The case under this title, to which we made allusion a few days since, was decided yesterday in the U. S. Circuit Court. It was an action, in its technical form, for trespass by force and arms upon the plaintiff's daughter, now a young lady about 19. It was given in evidence that the plaintiff, soon after his removal from Boston to Brooklyn, having occasion for the services of a physician in his family, called upon the defendant, a licensed practitioner of very respectable character, who accordingly attended, and was received into the family with all the confidence that usually follows that intimate relation. In July, 1828, Mr Badger was compelled to go to sea, and previous to his departure, solicited the friendly attentions and medical advice of the defendant towards his wife, who was in delicate health. In the latter part of August, Mrs Badger was confined. The defendant attended her. On the third day after her confinement, he called, and on his return from her chamber, requested one of the children to invite Sarah, the daughter, who was in the garden, into the parlor. She obeyed the summons, and set down on the sofa, along side of the Doctor.

After some inquiries respecting her health, the alleged trespass took place, the particulars of which we cannot with propriety detail. The young lady however fainted from terror. When she was in some measure restored to her senses, he arose and took his leave. That night, the family were alarmed by her cries, after she had retired to bed, and on hurrying to her room, they found her almost bereft of reason, exclaiming that 'Dr Ball was in the room, and was under the bed;' and it was not until she was taken into her mother's room, that her agitation was sufficiently calmed to enable her to sleep. The next day, the mother, feeble as she was, dictated a letter to the Doctor, expressive of her feelings at the outrage he had committed, and the matter remained until the return of the father. The health of the young lady continued much in the same state for about two months. Her reason was impaired—the life of Mrs B. was greatly endangered, and the domestic peace of the family destroyed. These facts were sworn to by the young lady, her sister and her sister's husband, Thomas Rand.

On the part of the defendant, it was contended that the daughter had been in feeble health for some time previous,—that the defendant had visited her in his professional capacity and prescribed medicines for her,—that she was subject to hysterical affections,—and that her whole story was the fiction of an hysterical illusion, and not the reality of actual life. That the state of her health occasioned [illegible] ary aberration of intellect, and that her disordered imagination had conjured up this fabrication, from what was nothing more than a medical examination with a view to ascertain the cause of her illness. It was maintained that this prosecution was the result of a family combination, got up to extort money from the Doctor, who was known to possess a handsome property, and that even perjury had been resorted to, in carrying it forward. The interest of the case was heightened by the presence of Elisha Williams, Esq. of Hudson, as one of the defendant's counsel, who acquitted himself in a style of surpassing excellence. He was ably supported by his colleague, George Griffin, Esq. of this city. The counsel for the plaintiff, Messrs O. Hoffman and S. P. Staples, who by the power of their eloquence carried his appeal to the hearts of the crowded assembly, have added new laurels to their well earned reputation.

Judge Thompson charged the jury strongly in the defendant's favor. After an absence of an hour and a half, they returned with a verdict for the Plaintiff of Two Thousand Dollars damages, and 6 cents costs.—New York Journal of Commerce.

CISCUIT COUBT—R. I. DISTRICT.

Opinion of the Court, in case of Saunders vs. Gould

Judge Story, in delivering the opinion of the Court verbally, said that the rule of construction to govern this Court must be the same here, as is settled by the Supreme Court of the United States. In Gardiner vs. Collins, the decision of the Supreme Court that the half blood must inherit, went upon the construction of the statute of descents in R. I. as presented to the Court upon the face of it, without any settled construction on that point ever having been made by the Courts of Rhode Island.

When the same point came again before the Supreme Court, in the case at Bar, they saw nothing to change their opinion already given in Collins vs. Gardiner. They intimated in their decree, that a settled construction against the half blood in Rhode Island, if shown, would alter their opinion. This suggestion brought the cause back to this Court for the purpose of trying whether there were any settled construction.

In coming to a decision, this Court could have no reference to the opinions of legislatures or members of the bar. He was sure that all must see how extremely dangerous it would be to trust for the exposition of a law, to the secret motives that might have induced the passage of an act of a legislature. We can have no safer exposition of the intent of the legislature, than the words in which they have chosen to clothe that intent. The rule uniformly has been in the construction of a law, never to regard the private intentions of private legislatures. If we were to do so, we must examine all who were contemporaneous with the passage of the law, in doing which we should find as many motives as there were legislators—and that many of those present when the law was passed hardly thought of it at all. It necessarily must happen, in all legislative bodies, that most of the general laws will be found to have passed with the attention of a few of those most acquainted with the subject, who gave their minds to it, particularly if they were legal men.

The motive of an individual Legislator, therefore, cannot be received as the motive of the law, and we exclude all opinions of legislators, whose depositions have been introduced into this case, on the same ground that we should exclude parol evidence to explain a written instrument. There is no safety to the community in any other construction, and what would be the effect upon the rights of property or the construction of crimes, if we were to rely upon the frail memories of men for an exposition of what they hoped or feared would be the operation of a particular law.

In reference to another mass of testimony brought into this cause—the dispositions of members of the Bar.

The opinions of the Bar would always have great weight with the Court. We are bound to respect those opinions, and we often listen with delight to the instructions we receive at the Bar, from minds superior to our own. But such as it is, we are required to form our own opinions upon the law, without being at liberty to take the opinion of any man, however elevated. We are enlightened by the reasoning and argument at the Bar, but we cannot delegate our opinions even to minds far above our own. While we respect their opinions, we are not at liberty to bind our judgments by them.

The same remark was more particularly applicable to that mass of the testimony derived from gentlemen who occupied judicial stations, in this State.

The Court regretted that they had not originally confined these depositions to the simple inquiry whether there were any settled practice or exposition in this State, on this subject. It was to be regretted that an examinatian had been gone into in these depositions, which has lead to an exhibition not honorable to the jurisprudence of any State. Very unfortunately there were in them many contradictory statements, which cannot be reconciled, and which had it been necessary, must have led the Court to weigh the relative credibility of the witnesses.

But the whole mass of these depositions all goes to the result; that there never was any settled judicial construction on the point at issue in this State. Nothing therefore, has occurred in this trial, to change the opinion formed by the Supreme Court.

The Judge next inquired whether there had been a long settled opposition of the law, equivalent by the frequent practice under it, to a judicial decision, as in the case of the acknowledgment of deeds by the Judges in Pennsylvania.

The Court could find no such exposition here. The diversity in the opinions of the Bar, show that there could have been no settled practice. In fact, the very great preponderance, and almost unanimity of the Bar, in favor of the construction put upon the statute by the U. S. Supreme Court in Collins vs. Gardiner, was conclusive that no settled practice prevailed, to the exclusion of the half blood. This Court, therefore, was bound by the decisions of the Supreme Court, in Collins vs. Gardiner.

It had often been his fortune to have his opinions in this Court, reversed by the Supreme Court, and he had often been obliged to carry into effect their opinions against his own. It was the duty of this Court, sitting as a subordinate tribunal, to conform to the opinions of its superior tribunal, otherwise we should assume to sit here as a superior Court, to reverse the decisions of the Supreme Court. If then, he would be bound to carry into effect the opinion of the Supreme Court, when against his own, he certainly was bound to do so, when against his own, he certainly corresponded with his own. On these grounds, the Court did not feel at liberty to interfere with the decision of the Supreme Court, in the case at Bar.

It could not be entertained for a moment, that mere traditional opinions were to constitute the rule of construction of a law—that we were to poll a whole state to find out the meaning of a statute. We must follow the terms of the law, or its settled construction by the state courts where it exists. He said this without any reference to what the general opinion might be, as the operation of the statute as it now stands. That was a question entirely debatable. If any one supposed the question presented in this case, was one not involved in great difficulty, he could not have duly considered it; but it must be obvious to all, that there was no settled construction here, that ought to alter the opinion already given by the Supreme Court. If any evils are to result from this, they are easily provided for. If the Legislature think this exposition inexpedient in its operation, five words will alter the statute.

In conclusion he stated that he had given the views of himself and his brother on the Bench (Judge Pitman) who would also speak for himself on that point. Let judgment be entered for Plaintiff, conformable to the decision of the Supreme Court.

Judge Pitman then read an opinion satisfactorily explaining the grounds of his former difference of opinion with Judge Story, in the case of Collins vs. Gardner.

The other three cases vs. Gould were called.

Mr Randall claimed the right to have a trial by jury, and that in Rhode Island, by our common law, the jury were the judges of the law.

Judge Story replied that there was not a single fact to be tried in the case, and that his opinion had been settled for 19 years, that the Court is the sole judge of the law, in civil cases. It was therefore unnecessary to argue that point.

It was then agreed that judgment is to be entered for Plaintiff in all the cases, execution to be staid until the further order of this Court, and to abide the final decision of the Supreme Court. Defendants to take out a writ of Error to the Feb. Term of the Supreme Court in 1831. The argument to be in writing.—Providence Daily Adv.

RECENT AMERICAN DECISIONS.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

1. Where in an action for a malicious prosecution it appeared that the defendant had caused the plaintiff to be twice indicted, and that the attorney of the commonwealth had entered a nolle prosequi on the second indictment, 'it appearing that the accused has been formerly acquitted of the offence charged against him in this indictment,' it was held, that the defendant might notwithstanding show that the second indictment was for a different offence from the one first charged, and that so there was probable cause for the second accusation. White vs. Ray. 8 Pick. 467.

2. There is a material variance between an indictment 'for drawing and depositing in and across a highway a quantity of stones,' and one 'for building a stone-wall in and upon the same highway;' and in an action for a malicious prosecution brought against the prosecutor of the last-mentioned indictment, it being proved that the plaintiff was guilty of the offence therein charged, and it not appearing, upon proper averments, that the two indictments were for the same offence, it was held, that the defendant had shown probable cause for the prosecution. Ibid.

MORTGAGE.

1. Where land is mortgaged, a person who by taking possession of it disseises the mortgager, disseises also the mortgagee, and so long as the disseisor is in possession, the deed of the mortgagee will not pass his, the mortgagee's, interest in the land. Poignard vs. Smith. 272.

2. Where a person, without title, took possession of land which was under mortgage, and built on parts of it a carpenter's shop and a blacksmith's shop, and the tenants of the carpenter's shop occasionly used parts of the lot adjacent to their shop, to spread their boards on, and the tenants of the blacksmith's shop used other parts of the lot to run carriages on, and put tires on wheels, it was held, that this was a disseisin of the mortgagee only for the part of the land covered by the shops. Ibid.

3. Taking possession of a mortgaged estate for the purpose of foreclosure does not operate as a payment of the mortgage money; for the land still remains only a security for the money. West vs. Chamberlin. 336.

4. S having mortgaged an estate to W to secure the payment of several notes, W assigned the notes and mortgage to C, taking from C a written agreement with regard to one of the notes, which was for 500 dollars, that he, C, would pay 500 dollars to W as soon as it could be collected on the note of S. C received 30 dollars of S on account of this note, and took possession of the mortgaged premises for the purpose of foreclosure, and S occupied the estates for some time afterwards as tenant to C, but S, being insolvent, never paid C anything for rent.—In an action brought by W against C on his contract, before the three years for foreclosure had expired, the declaration also containing a count for money had and received; held, that the taking possession of the mortgaged premises did not amount to payment of the mortgage, and therefore that C was not liable on his contract; that C was not liable to pay the 30 dollars until the whole sum was collected, without notice from the plaintiff before bringing a suit for it; and that C, in this action, was not liable for rent which he had not actually received. Ibid.

5. A note, and a mortgage deed given to secure it, were handed with other effects, by A, the administrator of the mortgagee, to B, the guardian of the mortgagee's heirs, on a settlement, as their property, but the note was not endorsed, and no assignment in writing was made of the mortgage, but a power of attorney was given to B to act in the name of A. This power was not recorded. It was held, that the mortgager or his assigns, if acquainted with the equitable assignment, had no right to tender or pay the mortgage money to A, if such tender or payment was made with a design to injure B and the heirs; and that a discharge of the mortgage made by A would not defeat the rights of B. Cutler vs. Haven. 490.

6. It seems that the payment should be made to B, and that he might discharge the mortgage by cancelling the deed and giving up the note. Ibid.

7. Two parcels of land, in which S is entitled to dower, are mortgaged together as security for a debt. Afterward the mortgager conveys all his interest in one parcel to A. H. and in consideration of S's joining in the conveyance and releasing her right of dower, he conveys to her an estate for her life in the other parcel, upon which parcel she enters and takes the profits. The plaintiff purchases the mortgager's right to redeem this second parcel. P. H. having purchased A. H.'s interest in the first parcel, takes an assignment of the mortgage, and enters upon the mortgaged premises for foreclosure. On a bill in equity by the plaintiff to redeem, it was held, that S was not liable to contribute towards the redemption, nor to account for the profits of the second parcel, the lease for life having been made to her as an equivalent to her right of dower in both parcels. Brooks vs. Harwood. 497.

8. Held, also, that as the assignee of the mortgage could not have compelled S to pay over the rents and profits of the second parcel, without subjecting himself to her claim of dower in the whole land, he was not bound to account for them in this suit; and that the plaintiff had no equitable claim to them, as he purchased after the lease for life, and consequently at a reduced price on that account. Ibid.

9. Held, also, that the assignee of the mortgage was bound to account for the rents and profits of the first parcel, from the time of his entry for foreclosure. Ibid.

10. Held, also, that the plaintiff, upon paying the whole mortgage debt, deducting the rents and profits last mentioned, would be entitled to hold the whole estate mortgaged, excepting the part leased to S during her life, until he should be reimbursed the amount paid by him over his proportion of the mortgage debt. Ibid.

11. A and B, tenants in common, mortgage their land to C, to secure the payment of a joint and several bond, and A afterwards mortgages his moiety to C to secure a debt due from himself alone. C enters upon A's moiety of the land for breach of the condition of the second mortgage. He then brings an action against B upon the first mortgage for breach of the condition. Held, that the conditional judgment shauld be rendered for only one half of the amount of the bond. Sargent vs. M'Farland. 500.

12. Where a mortgage is given to secure payment of a note, and the assignee of the mortgage takes a new note from the mortgager, in exchange for the old one, it not being intended as payment, the mortgage debt is not thereby paid, but the mortgage remains good as security for the amount due on the new note, as against the mortgager himself. Watkins vs. Hill. 522.

13. Whether the exchange would operate as payment of the first note, as against a purchaser under the mortgager, quære. Ibid.

NEW TRIAL.

1. A verdict will not be set aside as against evidence where there is evidence on both sides, unless it is manifest that the jury in giving their verdict must have mistaken or abused their trust. Baker vs. Briggs. 122.

2. In an action on the case, for falsely representing H to be 'worthy of credit,' knowing he was not, the defendant pleaded the general issue. The jury retired on Saturday afternoon and separated in about three hours, the judge having authorized them so to do, when they should have made up their verdict: and, on the following Monday morning, they rendered in a verdict, 'that the defendant did not say it was perfectly good, knowing it to be false and with intention to defraud.' The judge informed them what the issue was, directing them to retire again; which they did, and returned with a similar verdict, adding thereto, 'and they therefore find the defendant not guilty.' Held, that the latter verdict was defective in form only, and therefore that the separation of the jury and the return of the second verdict were not grounds for a new trial. Winslow vs. Draper. 170.

NOTICE.

1. A purchaser of land without notice of an incumbrance, may convey the same free of the incumbrance to a purchaser who has notice. Boynton vs. Rees. 329.

2. Where notice of a petition for a review was served on the attorney of record of the nominal party, the party in interest being present when such notice was ordered, the Court, in their discretion, held the notice to be sufficient; no particular mode of notice being prescribed by the statutes respecting reviews. Ferrill vs. Simpson. 359.

PERSONAL PROPERTY.

1. A building erected by an individual on land belonging to the government, he having no right in the soil, is, as between individuals, personal property. Marcy vs. Darling. 258.

2. So held in the case of a bathing-house erected on piles driven into the bed of a navigable river below low-water mark. Ibid.

PRESCRIPTION.

1. The time of legal memory or prescription in this commonwealth, does not extend further back than sixty years. Coolidge vs. Learned. 504.

2. Whether it extends further back than forty years, quære. Ibid.

3. In trespass qua. cl. fr., a plea that the locus in quo has been from time immemorial a public landing place, in which every citizen has had from time immemorial a right of entering was held good. Ibid.

4. In trespass qua. cl. fr., where the locus in quo had for a long time been claimed by the inhabitants of the town where it was situated, as a town landing-place, but not for their exclusive use, evidence of a long continued use of it by the public at large without any objection on the part of the town, was held sufficient to support a verdict finding it to be a public landing-place. Ibid.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

1. A written authority is not necessary in order to enable an agent to sign for his principal, a contract required by the statute of frauds to be in writing. Shaw vs. Nudd. 9.

2. W, an agent for S, agreed with N, at Newburyport, to purchase of him a quantity of fish then at Newburyport, and N told W to go to C the next day and get him to sign the contract for N, if he was not in town himself. W accordingly wrote a contract, stating a sale of the fish by N to S for '12*s.* 3*d.* per quintal, and nine cents per quintal for delivering them in Boston, the wharfage to be paid by S, all other incidental charges to be paid by N, cash to be paid in Boston, the fish to be at S's risk when on board the vessel at Newburyport.' C signed this contract for N, and received from W a counterpart signed by W in behalf of S. C had no authority to act for N, except that communicated by W. C delivered the counterpart to N the same day, who received it without objection, and did not object to it for several days. N having refused to deliver the fish, S brought an action on the written contract to recover damages for the non-delivery; Held—

That N was bound by the contract, even if C had no authority to sign it, having adopted it. Ibid.

3. Also that by the contract the fish were to be delivered in Boston, and would not become the property of S until delivered there. Ibid.

4. Also, that therefore the damages recoverable must depend on the value of the fish at Boston, at the time when they ought to have been delivered. Ibid.

RECENT ENGLISH DECISIONS.

WILL.

1. A., the son of B., died, having by his will charged his real estates with the payment of his debts, and subject thereto, having devised all his property, real and personal, to his wife. B. shortly afterwards made his will, and thereby gave an annuity for her life to the widow of his son, and made his grandson his residuary devisee and legatee. The son's estate being insufficient for the payment of his debts, B., by a codicil, directed his trustees and executors to pay his son's debts. Held, that the father meant, by this direction, only the payment of such part of his son's debts, as, after the due application of the son's estate, should remain unsatisfied.—Walker vs. Lodge, 3 Russ. 459.

2. Where legacies are given upon trust to accumulate the interest and dividends, such accumulation will not, in the absence of evidence of the testator's intention, pass by a gift over of the principal sums.—Harvey vs. Cooke, 4 Russ. 34.

3. A bequest of 'a cabinet, with whatever it contains, except money,' does not include a promissory note found in the cabinet.—Read vs. Stewart, 4 Russ. 69.

4. A bequest to all the children of A. and their issue, share and share alike, to be paid twelve months after the death of the testator, is an absolute gift to such children of A. as were living at the testator's death, to the exclusion of the issue of those children, and of the issue of such children of A. as died during the testator's lifetime.—Butler vs. Ommaney, 4 Russ. 71.

5. Where a testator bequeathed the residue of his estate, after the death of two persons, to such children of B. as should then be living, and as to such of them as should then be dead, leaving children, such children were to stand in the places of their parents; it was held, that the children of such children of B. as died during the testator's lifetime took no interest.—S. C.

[The children who died in his lifetime were all dead at the date of his will.]

6. A testator, by his will, gave certain annuities, and directed that the sums by which they were secured, should, as the annuitants died off, sink into the residue of his estate. By a codicil, he stated, that in case his property should not be equal to the payment of the annuities, they should be rateably reduced; the estate was not sufficient to pay them in full. Upon the death of any annuitant, the sum set apart for providing his annuity, will sink into the residue, and not go to increase the reduced annuities to the amount given by the will.—Farmer vs. Mills, 4 Russ. 86.

7. The intention of a testator, that a legacy should not vest until actually remitted, will be given effect to, when clearly expressed, and due diligence is used in remitting.—Law vs. Thompson, 4 Russ. 92.

8. Where a testator bequeathed as follows: 'unto my wife, who I make fully and wholly my executrix, I give and bequeath my house, with all my household furniture of every description, as also all my plate, china, books, linen, and every other article belonging to me, both in and out of the house, and which may not be herein mentioned, she being subject to the payment of all my debts, funeral and testamentary expenses:' it was held, that money in the funds was not included.—Collier vs. Squire, 3 Russ. 475.

9. A testator bequeathed the residue of his personal estate to trustees, upon trust, to convert it into money, and invest the same in or upon government or real securities, of which they were to stand possessed, upon trust to pay the interest to A. for life, and after her death, the principal to B. The trustees permitted a share, which the testator had in an Indian Loan, called the Decennial Loan, and which paid ten per cent interest, to remain several years in that security, during which they paid A. the interest at that rate: the loan being afterwards paid off, they invested the money in the three per cents. Held, that the language of the will being imperative the executors ought to have converted this fund immediately; the tenant for life, therefore, was entitled only to such interest as the same would have produced, if converted into three per cent stock, a year after the testator's death; and that the trustees were chargeable for all surplus payments beyond what they would have paid if the money had been so converted.—Dimes vs. Scott, 4 Russ. 195.

WITNESS.

Where a defendant prayed that he might be at liberty to examine one of the plaintiffs as a witness, and it appeared that the plaintiffs were copartners, and had a common interest adverse to the defendant, the petition was dismissed with costs.—Fereday vs. Wightwick, 4 Russ. 114.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1830.

PAINE AND DUER'S PRACTICE.

We introduce into our paper this week the contents of the second volume of the above work, intending hereafter to notice the Book more particularly. It may, at least, be satisfactory to our readers to know what the volume contains, that they may judge of its design and probable utility.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

PART III.—Of Incidental matters and proceedings connected with the progress of personal actions, brought for the recovery of any debt, or for damages only.

Chap. 1.—Of privilege from Arrest.

Chap. 2.—Of the Plaintiff's remedies if Special Bail be not put in and perfected according to the Condition of the Bail bond.

Sec. 1. Of the assignment of the bail bond and the proceedings thereon

Sec. 2. Of proceedings against the sheriff.

Chap. 3.—Of proceedings against Special Bail upon their Recognizance; their Liability; and of Bail's surrendering their principal, and the entry of an Exoneretur.

Chap. 4.—Of Judges' Orders, Common Rules, Affidavits, and Notices.

Sec. 1. Of judges' orders

Sec. 2. Of common rules and rules by consent

Sec. 3. Of affidavits

Sec. 4. Of the various notices, and of the service of notices and other papers.

Chap. 5. Of Special Motions and Rules.

Sec. 1. Of the different kinds of motions, and of bringing on and arguing the same

Sec. 2. Of motions to set aside proceedings for irregularity

Sec. 3. Of motions to stay proceedings

Sec. 4. Of motions to consolidate actions

Sec. 5. Of motions for a commission to examine witnesses out of the state and the proceedings thereon

Sec. 6. Of motions to change the venue

Sec. 7. Of motions for a struck jury and trial at bar

Sec. 8. Of motions to set aside verdict or nonsuit, and for a new trial; and herein of making and settling cases

Sec. 9. Of motions in arrest of judgment, for a repleader, and for judgment non obstante veredicto

Chap. 6.—Of Oyer.

Chap. 7.—Of Bills of Particulars.

Chap. 8.—Of Bringing money into court and of Tender after Action brought.

Chap. 9.—Of Set-off

Chap. 10.—Of Reference.

Chap. 11.—Of proceedings on Demurrer.

Chap. 12.—Of proceedings on Nul Tiel Record.

Chap. 13.—Of Attachments and proceedings as for contempts, to enforce the civil rights aud remedies of parties.

Chap. 14.—Of the removal of causes from a Court of Common Pleas or Mayor's Court into the Supreme Court before trial or judgment.

Chap. 15.—Of the Abatement of suits by death, marriage or otherwise.

Chap. 16.—Of proceedings and Actions in particular cases.

Sec. 1. Of the prosecution and defence of actions by next friend and guardian

Sec. 2. Suits by poor persons

Sec. 3. Of actions for penalties and forfeitnres.

---

PART IV.—Of Judgment, Execution, Jail Liberties, Discharge of Insolvents, scire facias, Satisfaction of Judgments, Audita Querela, and Proceedings in Error, in Personal Actions, brought for the Recovery of any Debt, or for Damages only.

Chap. 1.—Of Judgments.

Sec. 1. Of the nature and different kinds of judgments, and of their qualities and incidents

Sec. 2. Of judgment records

Sec. 3. Of entering and docketing judgments, and of the priority and lien of judgments

Sec. 4. Of amending judgments; of setting off judgments; of the satisfaction and cancelling of judgments; and of audita querela.

Chap. 2.—Of Execution.

Sec. 1. Of executions generally, including what is common to the different kinds of execution

Sec. 2. Of the fieri facias as regards personal property, and the proceedings under it

Sec. 3. Of the fieri facias and proceedings under it, as regards lands, tenements, &c.

Sec. 4. Of the return of the fieri facias, and proceedings thereupon

Sec. 5. Of the capias ad satisfaciendum

Sec. 6. Of jail liberties and escapes

Sec. 7. Of the discharge of insolvent debtors

Chap. 3.—Proceedings in Scire Facias.

Chap. 4.—Of Writs of Error and the proceedings in Error.

Sec. 1. Of the writ of error, when, and by and against whom, it may be brought, and to what courts it lies

Sec. 2. Of the issuing and return of the writ of error, and of the security required to be given by the plaintiff in error

Sec. 3. Of the proceedings after the return of the writ of error until judgment

Sec. 4. Of the judgment and subsequent proceedings in error.

---

PART V.—Of the Practice in Ejectment, Mesne Profits, Waste, Nuisance, Partition; Replevin, Proceedings against Vessels, against Foreign Corporations, against Absconding, Concealed, non-resident Debtors, against Debtors confined for Crimes; Arbitrations; quo warranto, Mandamus, Prohibition; and Proceedings for the Admeasurement of Dower.

Chap. 1.—Of the practice in the Action of Ejectment.

Sec. 1. Ejectment in ordinary cases

Sec. 2. Ejectment for dower

Sec. 3. Ejectmeat upon right of re-entry for non-payment of rent or otherwise

Sec. 4. Ejectment upon compulsory proceedings

Chap. 2.—Of the practice in the Action for Mesne profits.

Chap. 3.—Of the practice in the Action of Waste.

Chap. 4. Of the practice in the writ of Nuisance

Chap. 5. Of the practice in Partition.

Sec. 1. Of the proceedings until judgment of partition

Sec. 2. Of the proceedings after judgment of partition, until final judgment of confirmation of partition, or an order of sale

Sec. 3. Of the proceedings upon an order of sale

Chap. 6.—Of the practice in the Action of Replevin.

Sec. 1. Of the proceedings in replevin in ordinary cases

Sec. 2. Of the proceedings in replevin peculiar to cases of distress

Chap. 7.—Of proceedings for the Collection of Demands against Ships and Vessels.

Sec. 1. Of the proceedings until a discharge or sale of the vessel: and also of the proceedings on the bond

Sec. 2. Of the sale of the vessel, and distribution of the proceeds

Chap. 8.—Of Attachments against Absconding, Concealed, and Non-resident Debtors.

Sec. 1. Of the proceedings until the appointment of trustees, or an application for a discharge of the property

Sec. 2. Of the different modes of obtaining a discharge of the property

Sec. 3. Of the appointment of trustees, with their powers and duties, and of the subsequent proceedings

Seec 4. Of the proceedings on certiorari and in error

Chap. 9.—Of Attachments against Foreign Corporations.

10.—Of Attachments against Debtors confined for Crimes.

11.—Of Arbitrations.

12.—Of the Practice in Quo Warranto.

13.—Of the Practice in the Writ of Mandamus.

14.—Of the Practice in the Writ of Prohibition.

15.—Of Practice in Admeasurement of Dower.

Colonial Judiciary Act.

Forms of Judgment Records.

---

QUARTERLY LIST OF LAWYERS

It will be perceived that we have placed on the last page of this week's paper a list of Lawyers now in practice, for the convenience of our readers and such as have occasion to transact business with members of the profession in different parts of the Country. Our design is to continue the list quarterly. If there shall be found any errors in it, we hope our patrons will do us the favor to furnish us the means of correction. We should be glad of the names of such gentlemen in New York, Philadeldhia, and Baltimore as are disposed to appear in the Jurisprudent as candidates for professional business.

---

☞ We have received the letter of J. D. through the Post Office and think it expedient only to say, at present, that we found his pamphlet in the market and considered it a proper subject of remark and criticism. We selected from it such law as suited our purpose and left the rest. We did not suppose our readers would be much interested in the detail of facts and therefore omitted to introduce them. With these we have nothing to do. We must decline going into the investigation of that matter altogether, and, therefore must decline publishing his communication. There are other Journals less exclusively professional, and of greater circulation, to which we would commend him, if he thinks any further 'development of the facts' would be useful. There is nothing which could support us through such a trial but the prospect of a generous retainer—a thing that has not passed our hands since last Christmas. We will 'name through the post office our time and place' —for any other purpose than to be shot—whenever he will give us assurance that our services shall be even moderately rewarded and our time productively employed.

---

Judges in Ordinary for Kent, and Durham and Northumberland. Mr Brougham's bill.—Mr Brougham's bill for the establishment of two new courts, one for Kent, the other for Durham and Northumberland, was introduced during the last session of parliament, and will be acted upon at the next session. The judges of these courts are proposed to be called judges in ordinary, with jurisdiction in causes of action in the nature of debt to £100, and in costs to £50, but not in actions where the title to real estate, or any franchise or right to toll, is in controversy. Questions may be carried from these courts to those of Westminster Hall by a bill of exceptions, as cases are carried to the Supreme Court in Massachusetts, by exceptions to the decisions of the Common Pleas. One provision of this bill is worthy of particular attention, and we recommend it to the consideration of our legislators. We refer to the provision that the parties may, by consent, refer their case to the decision of the judge, without the intervention of the jury, but the judge may still, if he chooses, take the verdict of a jury upon any particular fact, or upon all the facts.—Jurist.

---

Qui tam Suit.—Geo. J. Willis vs. H. F. Sanders and L. Willson,—brought to recover a penalty incurred under the statute to prevent the making or setting up of lotteries, was tried before the County Court of this county, which closed their session last week. The Jury found the respondents had incurred a penalty under the statute equal to the whole amount of the scheme, and accordingly returned a verdict for the complainant of $402,660.

Vermont Gazette.

---

ADVERTISMENT.

A gentleman in the city who has been seven or eight years in practice and can furnish the best recommendations—would be glad to connect himself with some person of advanced standing and full business in the profession, as a partner, or otherwise on reasonable terms. Address to A. B at this office, with real n me.

QUARTERLY LIST

OF

LAWYERS AND ATTORNEYS AT LAW.

Boston, Edward Blake,
James Bowdoin,
J. P. Cook,
Chs. P. Curtis,
Jona. Chapman,
Moses Draper,
A. A. Dame,
Derby & Rogers,
Dexter & Gardiner,
E. R. Dorr,
Richard Fletcher,
H. H. Fuller,
Timo. Fuller,
W. P. Gragg,
W. J. Hubbard,
Wm. Hilliard, Jr.
H. W. Kinsman,
John Knapp,
Sherman Leland,
Chs. G. Loring,
Wm. Minot,
S. F. Mc Cleary,
O. Pickering,
Jno. Pickering,
Ewd. G. Prescott,
Wm. T. Heydock,
Willard Phillips,
Josiah Quincy, Jr.
Rand & Fisk,
Brad[illegible] Sumner,
Sidney P[illegible]tt,
Wm. Su[illegible],
Calvin T[illegible]d,
S. D. W[illegible]d,
Peabody & Watts.

Aurora, N. Y. Isaac Woods.

Andover, Ms. David Mack,
N. W. Hazen.

Amherst, Ms. Edward Dickinson,
Osmyn Baker,
Lucius Baltwood.

Ann Arbor, M. T. Calvin Smith.

Amherst, N. H. Chs. H. Atherton.

Augusta, Geo. Andrew J. Miller.

Adams, Ms. Thos. Robinson.

Annapolis, Md. Jas. F. Brice.

Barre, Ms. C. S. Baldwin,
Eleazer James,
Seth Lee.

Bradford, N. H. Tappan Weare.

Bangor, Me. John Godfrey.

Bristol, N. H. D. Blaisdell.

Baltimore, Md. [illegible]mon[illegible] L. Dugan,
Wm. D. [illegible]ir,
Wm. Gw[illegible],
J. Meredi[illegible],
S. A. Raszad.

Bath, N. H. Goodall & Woods.

Canaan, N. H. Wm. P. Weeks.

Concord, N. H. Chas. H. Peaslee.

Chesterfield, N. H. Larkin G. Mead.

Cambridgport, Ms. L. S. Cushing.

Calais, Me. Anson G. Chandler.

Dedham Ms. Theron Metcalf,
J. H. Coll,
Sam'l F. Haven,
S. B. Barrell.

Deerfield, Ms. Elijah Williams, 2d,

Dudley, Ms. G. B. Slater.

Danville, Me. E. T. Little.

Derry, N. H. Thornton Betton.

East Bridgewater, Ms. Welcome Young.

Exeter, N. H. Joseph Tilton, Jr.

Fall River, Ms. Hezh. Battelle.

Fitchburg, Ms. Forrey & Wood,
D. Brigham.

Fairhaven, Ms. Gustavus Gilbert.

Gilmanton, N. H. Stephen Moody.

Greenfield, Ms. J. C. Alvord.

Gardiner, Me. J. P. Chandler.

Great Barrington, Ms. Increase Sumner,
Seth J. Hurd.

Hanover, N. H. Wm. Olcott.
Mills Olcott.

Haverhill, N. H. Bell & Olcott.

Haverhill, Ms. J. R. Howe,
Jas. H. Duncan.

Hardwicke, Me. Jos. Knox.

Harrison, Me. Chas. Washburn.

Hollis, Me. Sam'l Bradley.

Hancock, Ms. J. H. Gardner.

Keene, N. H. Joel Parker,
Jas. Wilson, Jr.

Litchfield, Conn. C. W. Rogers,
F. H. Brigham.

Lynn, Ms. J. C. Stickney.

Leicester, Ms. Waldo Flint,
Nath. Denny.

Lenox, Ms. Geo. I. Tucker,
Henry Raymond.

Lowell, Ms. S. Ames,
J. P. Robinson,
J. B. French,
Elisha Glidden,
J. R. Adams,
Nath. Wright,
Luke Eastman.
Sam'l H. Mann.

Lancaster, Ms. Wm. Steadman,
Jos. Willard.

Lanesboro', Ms. G. N. Briggs.

Meredith, N. H. Warren Lovell,
Henry H. Orne.

Middleboro, Ms. Zech. Eddy,
Isaac Stevens.

Nantucket, Ms. Chas. Bunker.

Nashville, Tenn. F. B. Fogg.

North Andover, Ms. Franklin Wright,
Amos Spaulding.

Norwich, Ct. Alfred Lee,
John A. Rockwell.

New Chester, N. H. Geo. M. Phelps.

New Haven, Ct. Isaac H. Townsend.

New Bedford, Ms. Samuel Williams.

Newburyport, Ms. S. W. Marston,
Geo. Lunt.

Ossipee, N. H. Francis Coggswell.

Otis, Ms. L. Filley.

Portsmouth N. H. Jas. Smith, 2d,
Chas. B. Goodrich,
John L. Sheafe,
Wm. Claggett, Esq.

Plymouth, N. H. Thompson & Bliss,
N. P. Rogers.

Powellton, Geo. Jas. Hodges.

Pine Plains, N. Y. Stephen Eno.

Plaistow, Me. John Kelly, 2d.

Potsdam, N. Y. B. G. Baldwin.

Philadelphia, Chas. Chauncey.

Plymouth, Ms. Jacob H. Loud.

Petersham, Ms. Aaron Brooks, Jr.

Pawtucket, R. I. Collins Darling.

Portland, Me. A, Ware,
Fessenden & Deblois,
N. Amory,
R. G. Green,
Greenleaf & Kinsman,
W. P. Fessenden,
Wm. I. Smith,
John Neal,
W. T. Vaughn,
Simon Greenleaf.

Providence, R. I. W. E. Richmond,

Randolph, Ms. Aaron Prescott.

Roxbury, Ms. F. S. Eastman.

Seabrook, N. H. E. French, Jr.

Saccarappa, Me. Wm. Graffum.
David Hayes.

Sutton, Ms, Edward Clark.

Southbury, Ct. R. D. Smith.

Salem, Ms. Benj. Merrill,
Rufus Choate,
David Roberts,
E. Shillaber.

Springfield, Ms. Geo. Ashman.

Shrewsbury, Ms. Wm. Pratt.

S. Hadley, Ms. Wm. Bowdoin, Jr.

Standish, Me. Wm. Boyd.

Shancateles, N. Y. A. Kellogg.

Sheffield, Ms. P. L. Hall.

Sandisfield, Me. Thos. Twining.

Taunton, Ms. W. A. F. Sproat.
Henry. Williams,
Horatio Pratt.

Troy, Ohio, Z. Riley.

Vincennes, Ind. John Law.

Worcester, Me. C. G. Prentiss,
Nath. Paine,
Ed. J. Vose.

Walpole, N. H. John S. Marcy.

Wakefield, N. H. Sawyer & Hobbs.

West Brookfield, Ms. Arad Gilbert,
John Bliss.

Westfield, Ms. Norman T. Leonard.

Watertown, Ms. Levi Thaxter.

W. Bridgewater, Ms. Wm. Baylies.

Westville, Mi. Chas. R. Brown.

[To be continued.]

GRAY & BOWEN, have in preparation, and will very shortly put to press,

A NEW DICTIONARY OF MEDICAL SCIENCE AND LITERATURE; which will contain a concise account of the various subjects in Anatomy, Physiology, Pathology, Therapeutics, Materia Medica, Surgery, Obstetrics, and Pharmacy, with the Etymology and Orthoepy of the terms of their Greek, Latin, French, and German synonymes;—a copious Bibliography appended to the different articles, and Biographical Notices of the most eminent Authors in the different departments of Medical Science, with a Catalogue of their principal works mentioned and an Epitome of the existing state of Medical Science and Literature. By Robley Dunglison, M. D. Professor of Medicine in the University of Virginia &c, &c.

While many of the nations of Continental Europe possess Dictionaries, which have kept pace with the advancing condition of Medical Science, Great Britain and America possess it may be said, but one of a concise character,—that of Hooper,—which independently of its want of accuracy on many points, is incontestibly far behind the present state of Medical Science and Literature, and unfit for the purposes of the Medical Student. In proof of this, it will be sufficient to remark, that the New Dictionary will contain at least five thousand words more than are to be found in that publication,—while the circumstance of the Dictionary of Hooper being stereotyped in this country, renders it impracticable to make the necessary additions to it, were the ground work such as to render such a course advisable.

The work will not be a mere Dictionary of terms; it will comprise concise histories of diseases: a description and doses of various kinds of medicine, with formula for the different Pharmacentrical preparations, &c, &c.

The important publications daily appearing in France and Germany, have induced the author to add the French and German synonymes to the various terms; so that the work will really contain the substance of an English, French and German Dictionary, at a comparatively trifling expense.—The French Index will be found to include every word in the 'Dictionaire des Science Medicales,' which consists of sixty volumes, as well as in the smaller Dictionaries more recently published.

Great attention has been, moreover, paid to the Greek and Latin synonymes, so that the Dictionary will, it is trusted, form a safe and convenient guide to the study of ancient and modern authors on Medicine.

It will be comprised in one large volume, 8vo.

Oct. 23.

PICKERING'S REPORTS, Vol. 8th. This day published and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & CO.

Oct. 23.

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1830. NO. XX.

MERCANTILE LAW.

CONTRACT OF SALE.

Of the origin and nature of the contract of sale, a short exposition was attempted in the second number of the series; and as it is essential that first principles should be kept clearly in view, we beg to direct attention for a moment, to the account there given.

It is plain that we have to do with sales of personal property only; and without entering into a discussion, more technical than useful, as to the precise definition of these words 'Personal property,' we shall content ourselves with the broad and sufficiently intelligible proposition, that, with a very few exceptions, every moveable, which may properly be called a man's own, is freely vendible. One limitation only the policy of our ancient law thought it necessary to impose—that the seller should have the visible ownership of the thing sold, not a mere right to possess, but an actual and apparent possession. Thus, if I bought a commodity and paid the price, I was not allowed to sell it again before delivery—and the same rule applied to the price; for neither, on the other hand, could the person, from whom I bought it, even after delivery, assign to any other his right to the money which I had stipulated to pay. Property so circumstanced, was significantly termed a chose in action; the interest in it being in fact, nothing more than a right to sue for the commodity or debt, if withheld. Indeed the rule was founded on apprehension of the maintenance of suits*—a practice about which our ancestors seem to have been singularly sensitive, and which Lord Coke emphatically calls 'the most dangerous enemy which justice hath.'† But the necessities of commerce broke through the restraint. The law-merchant triumphed over common law and statute, and not only bills of exchange, the very nature of which implies transferribility, and bills of lading, but ultimately, though not without a struggle, promissory notes also were allowed to pass from hand to hand, and become available to the holder by a mere endorsement of the name. To other cases the prohibition still formally applies: but the courts have found it necessary to wink at the evasion of a rule, which it is inexpedient, if not impossible, rigidly to enforce; and at this day the bonâ fide assignee of a chose in action may, by the decent pretext of borrowing the name of the original proprietor, pursue even at common law the necessary remedies for reducing his right into possession.‡ Indeed the prohibition had long been almost nugatory; for the courts of equity, founding themselves on the principles of the civil law, which allowed such transfers, and regarding the conscientious obligation of the assignor, always recognised the rights of the assignee, and treated the former as a mere trustee for his benefit.*

A sale, as has been said, assumes its simplest form, when the bargain is immediately followed up by delivery on the one part, and payment on the other. But though the contract is thus brought immediately to a close, the consequences are not always so. The buyer may be disturbed in his possession by some one who has a prior title, or the quality of the commodity may not answer his reasonable expectation, or the purpose for which it was bought. It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider the effect of want of title in the seller, and the doctrine of our law as to warranty.

It is, as might be expected, a general rule that the seller can transfer to the buyer no better property in the thing sold, than he himself had at the time of the sale: but it is a rule qualified by a most important exception. The free interchange of commodities is so essential to the very being of society, that in most communities it has been considered expedient to protect transactions of sale, even sometimes at the expense of abstract justice. To this policy is referrible the Roman law of usucaption, whereby an innocent purchaser obtained by lapse of time an indefeasible title to the property of another.† The common law of England has adopted the principle, but changed, and in our opinion wisely changed, the application. It regards not so much the time which has elapsed since the sale, (although that also is a consideration by no means overlooked,) as the manner and circumstances of the sale itself. Thus it is laid down by Lord Coke,‡ 'that all sales and contracts of anything vendible in fairs or markets overt, shall not only be good between the parties, but also be binding on all those, who have any right or property therein'—a rule, which serves the double purpose of protecting an honest purchaser, and of encouraging at the same time that publicity of sales, which our law, rightly regarding it as the most effectual check upon knavery, was always particularly anxious to promote. But then, the transaction must be, so far as the buyer is concerned, perfectly bonâ fide. If he knew, or might have suspected the want of title in the seller—if there was anything clandestine or underhand in the dealing—nay, if the whole matter were not literally transacted in public, and before the eyes of men—he has no claim to the privilege. Accordingly Lord Coke, putting instances by way of illustration, goes on to say that, 'the rule does not extend to sales in a covert place within a fair or market, as in a back room or warehouse—or behind a hanging or cupboard, where a person passing before the shop cannot see—or where the windows of the shop are shut—nor to the sale of goods improper or foreign to the trade of the owner of the shop, as plate in a scrivener's shop, and sic de similibus—nor to sales by covin, as where the buyer knows that the seller has no right, or that the seller is an infant, fême covert, &c, unless the sale be of those things, which the fême covert usually trades in by the consent of the husband—nor to sales between sun-setting and sun-rising, though such sales are binding between the parties.'* One other exception it may be necessary to notice. When the subject of the sale is a stolen commodity, then if the owner has taken immediate steps for discovering the offender, and has prosecuted him to conviction or outlawry, he is entitled to reclaim the property, into whatever hands it may have passed, and even though it may have been sold in market overt.† But this privilege of the owner, the policy of which is apparent, does not extend to goods taken in piracy,‡ nor to such as are obtained by fraud and false pretences,§ to neither of which cases are the words of the statute applicable.

The establishment of fairs and markets was not, as some have supposed, matter of positive institution, but sprung, as we have seen, like every other institution,‖ out of the wants of society. That the government early interfered, either to regulate them, or, which is more probable, to turn them to profit, is evident from the fact that the right to hold them is a franchise from the Crown. It would not be uninteresting to trace the history of these licensed resorts for traffic; but it accords better with our present purpose merely to state, that they exist either by charter, or by prescription, which supposes a charter;—that market overt is confined to the spot where the market has been usually held,¶ and to the days which by the original creation were assigned for holding it. In London, however, by immemorial custom, of which judicial notice is taken by the courts,†† every day except Sunday, is market day,‡‡ and every shop is market overt for those goods in which the shopkeeper ordinarily deals. But the privilege is strictly confined within the precincts of the city. A shop in the Strand, for instance, is not market overt.§§

Hitherto we have supposed a bare possession in the seller without pretence of title. But it may be, that though not the actual owner, he is clothed in some respects with the rights and character of

---

* Co. Litt. 214 a. 266 a.

† Co. Litt. 369 a. It is interesting to observe how the laws of each age reflect light on the contemporary state of society. This law of maintenance savors strongly of feudal tyranny. It is a law to prevent the poor from combining to obtain redress for the injustice or oppression of the rich.

‡ 1 T. R 26. 619. The Courts will not allow the claim of the assignee to be defeated by a collusion of the assignor with the party sued; and therefore a plea of bankruptcy of the assignor, or of a release given by him, though ostensibly the person suing, will not in general be a bar to the action.

* 3 P. W. 199.

† Inst. lib. 2. tit. 6.

‡ 2 Inst. 371.

* 2 Inst. 714.

† By common law, enlarged by stat. 21. Hen. 8. c. 11.

‡ Bulstrode 29. Hob. 79.

§ 5. T. R. 175. Both the rule and the exception apply to goods pawned as well as sold. To prevent, however, the abuses to which the protection of sales in market overt might give occasion in London, where the facility of disposing of stolen property has long been a serious evil, it is enacted, by stat. 1 Jac. 1. c. 21., that the sale of any goods wrongfully taken to any pawnbroker in London, or within two miles thereof, shall not alter the property. The word 'sale' includes a pledging. See 2 Campb. 336. n.

‖ The author of the Mirror supposes them to have been established for the purpose of insuring publicity in the sale, and refers the enactment of toll to the same policy.

¶ Godb. 131.

 2 Inst 220. The legal definition of market comprehends a fair. 2 Inst. 220. c. 406.

†† Doug. 380. ‡‡ Cro. Jac. 68.

§§ 16 Mod, 521.

an owner. He may have, to use the language of the law, a special property in the goods. Thus a factor or consignee has charge of the goods of another; and if he sell them in fraud of his trust and to the prejudice of his principal, the fair purchaser will, nevertheless, be protected against the claim of the real owner, upon whom the consequences of his misplaced confidence must fall. But this, it must be observed, applies only to cases where the trust is general. If the possession have been given for a specific purpose, as to a carrier for conveyance, or to a wharfinger for temporary custody, the property is not changed by the sale of such a bailee,* and the owner may recover them even from a bonâ fide buyer. The following is an instance:—An action of trover was brought by one Wilkinson to recover the possession of some lead, which had been sent by him to the wharf of one Ellil, in the Borough, there to remain till sold. Ellil, though accustomed to sell lead from his wharf, had no authority whatever to dispose of the lead in question. However, he did sell it to the defendants, who bought it bonâ fide as his property, and paid for it immediately. It was contended, that this was a sale in market overt, and that no action could be maintained by the owner against the buyers. But Lord Ellenborough held that the sale by Ellil did not change the property in the lead, and observed that the doctrine contended for would give wharfingers the dominion over all the goods entrusted to them; but that a wharf could not be considered, even in London, as a market-overt for the goods bought there. Ellil, he added, had no color of authority to sell the lead, and no one could derive a good title to it, under such a wrongful conversion.†

But even the real owner, though in possession of the goods, cannot always convey an indefeasible title to a purchaser. A judgment may have been obtained against him for some debt or damages; and for the satisfaction of this judgment his effects are bound, anciently from the teste, or date of the writ, and now (in consequence of a most beneficial alteration introduced by the stat. 29 Car. 2. c. 3. s. 16.) from the delivery of the writ to the sheriff.‡ Yet a sale in market-overt before actual seizure by the sheriff will prevail against the right even of a judgment creditor; and the right itself extends only to the immediate purchaser from the judgment debtor. The king, not being especially named in the statute, is, by his prerogative, exempt from its operation, and the goods therefore of a crown debtor are still bound from the teste of a writ of extent.

And now the question naturally suggests itself, what remedy has the buyer, under these circumstances, against the seller? By the civil law, a warranty of title was annexed to every sale; it was considered as a necessary item of the bargain. In this respect, the law of England differs somewhat from the civil, and, consequently, from almost every modern code of jurisprudence. And though it may be granted, that the doctrine of implied warranty is more consistent with strict principles of equity, yet the partial rejection of it by our law is not without strong arguments of justification. The founders of our system adopted the policy of interfering as little as possible with bargains and sales. They considered that, in such matters, men in general may safely be left to themselves: at all events, they thought it was not the business of law to supply the place of vigilance in the party interested. Warranty might be made a positive stipulation in the bargain, and if so, the law would enforce it; but if this precaution were not adopted, the general maxim was caveat emptor—let the buyer look to it. To be sure, if fraud intruded itself—if studied deception were practised—the consequences were visited, in this as in every other transaction, upon him who practised it. Again, the maxim did not apply where the purchaser had no opportunity of exercising the requisite caution, or where he was thrown off his guard by the positive representation of the seller: accordingly, an affirmation by the latter, at the time of the sale, that the goods were his own, was always considered as equivalent to a warranty.

The rules which relate to warranty of title are, for the most part, equally applicable in cases of defect in the quality of the thing sold; and as this is a subject of great practical importance and almost hourly application—as the law also which governs it seems to be in the process of a gradual change—it may be worth the while, even at the risk of prolixity, to consider it somewhat in detail.

[To be continued.]

* For the benefit of the uninitiated, it may be proper to state, that a bailee is one to whose charge goods have been committed with a trust for the owner (baillé.)

† 2 Campb. 335.

‡ Who is bound upon the receipt of the writ to indorse upon it the day of the month and the year in which it was received.

SAMUEL ROMILLY.

Continued from page 47.

No one ever entered the house of commons better prepared to perform the high duties incumbent on him than Sir Samuel Romilly. His habits of reflection, his extensive acquirements, his acquaintance with the laws and constitution of his country, his indefatigable industry, his clear philosophical intellect, his high personal character, and, lastly, but chiefly, the purity of his ambition, all qualified him to act a most distinguished part in public life. In entering upon the duties of his new station, Sir Samuel Romilly well knew that, in order to give effect to the great and useful designs which he contemplated, it was necessary for him to select some particular object, to the attainment of which his efforts might be principally directed. He felt that, however numerous might be the claims upon his patriotism or his humanity, it was necessary to make some one great question the principal end of his exertions, leaving it to others to pursue with the same diligence the various other objects, to the acquisition of which he could only hope to extend occasional assistance. In making this selection, Sir Samuel Romilly was fortunately induced to devote himself to the amelioration of our criminal code; a subject which had, from an early period of his life, interested his feelings and occupied a considerable portion of his attention. It has been sometimes objected to him, that he did not rather apply himself to the correction of those abuses, which had so long cast a discredit upon the court in which he practised; but it ought surely never to be regretted that he preferred the nobler labor of reforming a code, the impolitic severity of which had for centuries disgraced the institutions of our country. That portion of the community which is effected by our civil polity are never without the means of making their complaints heard; but the poor, the destitute, the uninformed, and the misled, the objects upon whom our criminal jurisprudence operates, have no voice to protest against the severities which the legislature may please to denounce. To watch over the interests of this wretched and degraded portion of society; to become the friend of those against whom every other hand was raised, and the protector of those who were abandoned, even by themselves, seemed to Sir Samuel Romilly a duty which claimed a decided pre-eminence.

Some time, however, elapsed, before he found himself prepared to bring forward the various measures which he had contemplated for the reform of the criminal laws. In the meanwhile he distinguished himself by the part he took in some important questions, with which the interests of freedom, and of humanity were closely connected. In the debates on the abolition of the slave trade, and on the alteration of the mutiny bill, he spoke at some length, and he introduced, during the same session, a bill, which subsequently passed into a law (46 G. 3. c. 135.,) for the amendment of the bankrupt laws; and also a bill, which was lost, for making freehold estates assets for the payment of simple contract debts. In the spring of 1807, on the dissolution of the Whig administration, he retired from office.

On the 18th of May, 1808, Sir Samuel Romilly introduced a bill to repeal the statute of 8 Eliz. c. 4. by which the punishment of death was inflicted for the offence of privately stealing from the person. With some amendments, this bill passed into a law. His next legislative effort was, a further improvement of the bankrupt law, by introducing the provisions of the statute 49 G. 3. c. 121. In the course of the same session, he took a considerable interest in the discussions which followed the disclosure of the conduct of the Duke of York.

In the session of 1810, Sir Samuel Romilly, in the prosecution of his humane design to soften the severity of the penal code, introduced three bills to repeal the statutes 10 and 11 W. 3., 12 Ann, and 24 G. 2., making the privately stealing in a shop goods of the value of five shillings, or in a dwelling-house, or on board a vessel in a navigable river, property of the value of forty shillings, capital felonies. His speech on this occasion he afterwards published, with some additions, under the title of 'Observations on the Criminal Law of England.' Notwithstanding the able arguments with which Sir Samuel Romilly supported the principle of these bills, and the industry with which he collected, and the clearness with which he expounded, a vast body of facts in confirmation of his arguments, all the bills were lost, the first in the lords, and the second in the commons, the third being postponed, and at length withdrawn. In the following year, however, Sir Samuel Romilly had the satisfaction of carrying through two bills, to abolish the punishment of death for stealing from bleaching grounds; and in 1812, he succeeded in procuring a repeal of the act of Elizabeth, making it capital in soldiers and mariners to be found wandering about the realm without a pass.

On the dissolution of parliament, in the year 1812, Sir Samuel Romilly was invited by a number of respectable gentlemen to become a candidate for the representation of Bristol. This invitation he accepted, and though defeated by a coalition between the forces of two of his opponents, he counted nearly seventeen hundred votes. He was subsequently returned to the new parliament for the borough of Arundel.

It is impossible, within the limits of this brief memoir, to detail the various efforts made by Sir Samuel Romilly to advance the great interests of freedom and humanity. No opportunity was neglected by him of introducing and recommending to the legislature the amendment of the criminal law; and upon many other important questions of foreign and domestic policy he was not silent. The alien act, the persecutions of the French protestants, the game laws, the suspension of the habeas corpus act, the seditious meetings bill, the state of Ireland, the subject of lotteries, Lord Sidmouth's famous circular, the employment of spies and informers, the state trials in Scotland, the imprisonments for libel, the state of slavery in our colonies:—all these important topics in turn engaged his attention. In many instances, during the debates which arose on these subjects, it was his misfortune to witness the triumph of those who opposed the measures he had so greatly at heart. But the good seed which he and his fellow-laborers sowed was not cast upon a barren and thankless soil. Within the short period which has elapsed since the death of Sir Samuel Romilly, several of the great improvements which he so zealously promoted have been carried into effect.

The statute of William III., inflicting the punishment of death for the offence of privately stealing in a shop to the value of five shillings, was, at the commencement of the present reign, at length repealed,* and transportation or imprisonment substituted, though the house of lords had repeatedly rejected the repealing statute. The statute of George II., making it capital to steal goods to the value of forty shillings on board a vessel in a navigable river, was also repealed about the same time,† and transportation or imprisonment substituted. More recently, the value of the goods stolen in a dwelling-house, necessary to render the offence capital, has been raised from forty shillings to five pounds.‡ These ameliorations Sir Samuel Romilly in vain endeavored to effect. The system of raising money by way of lotteries, which Sir Samuel opposed, as materially conducing to the depravation of public morals, has been abandoned. The practice of placing spring guns for the protection of game, which he reprobated as both cruel and illegal, has been forbidden by statute. A general and effective revision of the criminal law has been commenced; and, lastly, the great question of catholic emancipation, which was ever near the heart of Sir Samuel Romilly, has been finally put to rest. In short, throughout all our institutions, a more liberal spirit has become visible, the growth and progress of which are to be attributed to the efforts of the men, who, like Sir Samuel Romilly, have never ceased, under all circumstances, to advocate the cause of freedom and of humanity.

On the dissolution of parliament, in June, 1818, Sir Samuel Romilly was put in nomination as one of the candidates for Westminster; and, after a most arduous contest, in which he personally took no part, his name was placed at the head of the poll; the numbers being for Sir S. Romilly, 5339; for Sir Francis Burdett, 5238; and for Sir Murray Maxwell, 4808. In this parliament he did not live to take his seat. The following distressing narrative is from the pen of Mr Peter, the author of the Memoir prefixed to the Speeches of Sir S. Romilly.

'The declining health of Lady Romilly, which had been to her husband for several months a source of uneasiness and anxiety, at length excited in his bosom the most serious alarms. During a residence of nearly two months at Mr Nash's seat in the Isle of Wight, where he had taken her for the benefit of a milder air, his mind continued in a state of unceasing agitation—fluctuating at each turn of her disorder between alternate tides of hope and despair. In a letter to his friend Mr Dumont, of the 27th of September, he says, 'Since I last wrote to you, Anna has been worse, and was certainly considered by both her medical attendants as being in some danger. She is at present a little better; but for myself I still apprehend the worst. I take care to let neither her nor the poor children see the anxiety I feel; but it costs me a good deal. With all this, do not suppose that I have not quite resolution enough to undergo everything, and to preserve my health for my children's sake.'

'A few days after the date of this letter, Mr Dumont arrived at Cowes, where he found Lady Romilly so much better as to be able to spend two or three hours each day in the society of her friends. This temporary improvement, however, was soon followed by a severe relapse, and by several days of acute suffering; during which the anguish of her husband could only be equalled by the pious fortitude and resolution with which he endeavored to suppress his feelings. Though for a long period he was either a stranger to sleep, or had his sleep disturbed by the most terrific dreams; though at times he believed his faculties to be impaired, and began even to entertain fears of mental derangement, he still recollected the duties which he owed to his family, to his country, and to his Creator. To the last moment of his reason, he continued to struggle with the sorrows which were overwhelming him. Whatever time remained to him from his attendance in the sick chamber of his wife, was devoted to his children and surrounding friends. With Mr Dumont, in particular, he frequently held the most intimate and unreserved conversations; entertaining him with prospects of the future, and with plans for the education and establishment of his children in life.

'About the middle of October, his sister, whom he tenderly loved, had come with her daughter to the Isle of Wight, at his own express desire, and was followed by the two sisters of his wife; but, though grateful for this proof of their kind attention and regard, he met them without a tear, or any visible emotion. Lady Romilly died during the night of the 29th of October; but the event was not communicated to her husband until the following morning. He heard it with apparent resignation, and without any violent effusions of grief. On the same day he was removed by his anxious friends from the scene of his sorrows, and arrived in London, by easy stages, on the 1st of November. During his journey he had been frequently much agitated, and as he approached home his feelings became more violent. On one of these occasions, as he was shutting his eyes and wringing his hands, Mr Dumont, who had accompanied him from the Isle of Wight, took the hand of his daughter, and placed it in his; upon which, opening his eyes, and casting on his friend a look expressive of gratitude and affection, he tenderly embraced his daughter.

'On his arrival at his residence in Russell Square, he made repeated but ineffectual efforts to compose his mind; and throwing himself on a sofa, joined his hands together for some moments as if in a state of prayer. He was now apparently calm; but his tranquillity was more frightful to his friends than even his former violence: it had the aspect of a man dying from some internal wound. Dr Roget, who had attended his uncle from the commencement of his illness, and watched over his couch with all the pious care and devotion of a son, was, soon after their arrival in London, joined by Dr Marcet, and on the following morning by Dr Babington. But their efforts were vain: long suffering had suspended the faculties of their unhappy patient. His mind became deranged—his heart was broken—and in the violence of frenzy he terminated his own existence.

'In person,' continues his biographer, Mr Peter, 'Sir Samuel Romilly was tall and justly proportioned, with a countenance regular and pleasing; but tinged with deep shades of thought, and susceptible of the greatest or tenderest emotions. His manners were distinguished by singular modesty, unaffected simplicity, and the kindest attention and regard to the wishes and feelings of others. His habits were temperate, studious, and domestic. No man ever indulged less in those pursuits which the world calls pleasure. He rose regularly at six o'clock; and was occupied, during the greater part of the day, and frequently to a late hour at night, either in study or laborious attendance to his professional and parliamentary duties. What little intervals of leisure could be snatched from his toils he anxiously devoted to domestic intercourse and enjoyments. Moderate in his own expenses, he was generous, without ostentation, to the wants of others; and the exquisite sensibility of his nature was never more strikingly displayed than in the fervent zeal with which his professional knowledge was always ready to be exerted for the destitute and oppressed, for those who might seem, in their poverty, to have been left without a friend. Even to the last, when sinking under the weight of domestic affliction, when anticipating as its probable result a wretched life of mental malady and darkness, he was still intent on the welfare and happiness of those around him. The religion of Sir Samuel Romilly was, like his life, pure, fervent, and enlightened. Unclouded by superstition or intolerance, it shone forth in pious gratitude to God, and in charity to mankind.'

To be continued.

* 1 G. 4. c. 117. 4. G. 4. c. 53. 7 & 8 G. 4. c. 29. § 15.
† 4 G. 4. c. 53.
‡ 7 & 8 G. 4. c. 29. § 12.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

In a country which affords a welcome asylum to all whom inclination or oppression may lead to seek its protection, a summary view of the existing state of the laws regulating the naturalization of aliens, can neither be uninteresting nor unprofitable. In this country, all the rights and immunities of citizenship, with the exception of eligibility to the presidency, are extended equally to the native and the adopted citizen; and these high privileges are bestowed on the most liberal terms, no more being exacted than fidelity to the constitution and laws demands. At a future time we propose to notice the subject of expatriation, which is intimately connected with that of which we are now treating,—the adoption of aliens as members of our family, implying an equal right in our citizens, if choice should impel them to abandon it, to become naturalized elsewhere. By the constitution of the United States, power is delegated to congress 'to establish a uniform rule of naturalization throughout the United States,' and congress first legislated on the subject in March, A. D. 1790. Since the exercise of this right by congress it may be considered that the several states are excluded from all power to legislate on the subject. The first act of congress now in force, was passed on the 14th of April, 1802, and is entitled 'an act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal all acts heretofore passed on that subject.' Since that time five different laws have been enacted, the last of which was passed on the 26th of May, A. D. 1824. We shall now proceed briefly to consider the operation of these laws.

In the first place, we may notice that the right to become citizens is granted to none but 'aliens being free white persons.' These may be arranged in four classes.

First. Aliens who have arrived since the 18th of June, 1812.

Second. Aliens who arrived between the 14th of April, 1802, and the 18th of June, 1812.

Third. Aliens who arrived between the 15th of June, 1798, and the 14th of April, 1802.

Fourth. Aliens who arrived before the 29th of January, 1795.

First. An alien who has arrived since the 18th of June, 1812, must have complied with these conditions.

1st. He must have declared on oath or affirmation, before a circuit or district court of the United States, or of the territorial districts of the United States, or before a court of record in any state, having common law jurisdiction, and a seal and clerk or prothonotary, or before either of the clerks of any of the said courts, two years at least before his admission, that it was, bona fide, his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to renounce forever, all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state or sovereignty whatever, and particularly by name to that whereof he may at the time be a citizen or subject, and a certificate from the proper clerk or prothonotary, of the declaration of intention thus made, must be exhibited on his application to be admitted a citizen, and must be recited at full length, on the record of the court, otherwise such admission shall be of no validity.

2d. He shall at the time of his admission, declare on oath or affirmation, before the court, that he will support the constitution of the United States, and that he will absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity in the manner set forth in the first condition, which proceedings must be recorded by the clerk of the court.

3d. The court must be satisfied that he has resided in the United States five years at least, next immediately preceding his admission, without being, during any portion of the said time, out of the territory of the United States, and the court must be farther satisfied that during that time he has behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same. The oath of the applicant shall in no case prove his residence.

4th. In case he shall have borne any hereditary title, or been of any of the orders of nobility in the kingdom or state from which he came, he must expressly renounce such title or order of nobility in the court in which he may be admitted, which renunciation shall be there recorded.

5th. He must have made registry and obtained a certificate in the following manner. If of the age of twentyone years, he must have reported himself, if under that age, or held in service, he must have been reported by his parents, guardian, master, or mistress, to some one of the courts above named; and such reports must have ascertained his name, birth, place, age, nation, and allegiance, together with the country whence he emigrated, and the place of his intended settlement. It is made the duty of the clerk of the court to fusnish to every individual concerned a certificate under his hand and seal of office, of such report and registry; for receiving and registering each report of an individual or family, he is entitled to charge fifty cents, and the like sum for each certificate; and such certificate shall be exhibited to the court as evidence at the time of the applicant's arrival within the United States, and must be recited at full length in the record of the court admitting him, and without such recital his admission shall be of no validity.

If the certificate of citizenship were obtained prior to the 26th of May, 1824, it shall not be invalid in consequence of an omission to insert therein the certificate of report and registry, and of the declaration of intention.

Second. An alien who arrived between the 14th of April, 1802, and the 18th of June, 1812.

1st. He must have made a declaration of intention two years before, as above mentioned.

2d. He must take the oaths or make the renunciation above prescribed, which must be recorded.

3d. The court must be satisfied that he has resided within the United States for five years at least, and within the state or territory where the court to which he applies is held one year at least; and the court must be farther satisfied that during that time he has behaved in the manner required, as set forth heretofore: provided that the oath of the applicant shall in no case be allowed to prove his residence.

4th. He must have made registry and obtained a certificate in the manner above stated, and this registry must have been made five years antecedent to his application, and is the only evidence of the time of his arrival. This certificate of report and registry, and of the declaration of intention, need not be recited at full length in the record as in the previous class.

Third. An alien who arrived between the 18th of June, 1798, and the 14th of April, 1802.

1st. No declaration of intention is required.

2d. The oath or affirmation and renunciation of allegiance and titles, required in the other cases must be made.

It must be proved to the satisfaction of the court, that the applicant was residing within the United States before the 14th of April, 1802, and has continued so to do, which residence, for at least five years, must be proved by citizens of the United States, who must be named in the record as witnesses, and the facts must also be set forth therein; otherwise he shall not be considered a citizen of the United States. He must also have resided in the state or territory where the court is held, one year at least, and the usual proof of good moral character, &c, must be exhibited.

Fourth. An alien who arrived before the 29th of January, 1795.

He may be admitted to become a citizen on proof that he has resided two years at least within the United States, and one year immediately preceding his application in the state or territory where the court is held—he must take the oaths prescribed, renounce his former allegiance and any title he may have held, and make the requisite proof of good moral character, &c, all which must be recorded by the clerk of the court.

No person proscribed by any state, or who has been legally convicted of having joined the army of Great Britian during the revolutionary war, can become a citizen without the consent of the state in which he was proscribed. An alien enemy cannot be admitted to become a citizen, but happily none are excluded by this exception, as our country is blessed by peace with all mankind.

It now only remains for us to notice the provisions of the naturalization laws relative to widows, children, and minors. The children of persons naturalized under the laws of the United States, or of those who, previous to the passage of any law on the subject by the United States, were naturalized under the law of any state, being under twentyone years of age at the time of their parents' naturalization, shall, if dwelling in the United States, be considered as citizens thereof; and any alien having declared his intention, made report and registry as prescribed, and having died before he was naturalized, his widow and children, on taking the oaths required by law, shall be entitled to all the rights of citizenship: and the children of citizens, though born out of the United States, shall be deemed such, provided that the rights of citizenship shall not descend to any person whose father never resided in the United States.

Any alien being a minor, under the age of twentyone years, who has resided in the United States three years next preceding his arrival at that age, and who shall have continued to reside therein up to the time of his application, may, after he shall arrive at the aforesaid age, and shall have resided in the United States five years, including the three years of his minority, be admitted a citizen, without having declared his intention previously, provided he shall make the declaration required, at the time of his admission, and shall declare on oath, and prove to the satisfaction of the court, that for three years next preceding, it has been, bona fide, his intention to become a citizen of the United States; and shall in all other respects, comply with the laws in regard to naturalization. —Jour. of Law, No. 5.

---

We inserted in the fifth number of this journal an article on the naturalization laws of the United States. In that article no notice is taken of an act of congress passed the twentyfourth of May, A. D. 1828, entitled 'An act to amend the acts concerning naturalization.' Our apology for this omission, to which our attention has been kindly drawn by a correspondent, is the difficulty which exists in procuring access to the pamphlet laws of the United States; a difficulty which we have found considerable, even since we have been in pursuit of this particular—and one which ought to be remedied. Others, equally called upon to be accurate, have been drawn into the same or even a greater error on this subject. By the first section of the act referred to, the second section of the act of the fourteenth of April, A. D. 1802, is repealed. That section requires every person who may arrive after its passage, and be desirous of becoming a citizen, to make report of himself, or if under age, that he shall be reported by his parents, guardain, master or mistress—which report must be recorded—and the certificate thereof must, on his application to be naturalized, be exhibited to the court, as evidence of the time of his arrival in the United States By the act of the twentyfourth of May, 1828, the first section of the act of March twentysecond, 1816, is also repealed. By this section it is required that any alien who shall have arrived in the United States since the 18th of June, 1812, shall exhibit in his application to be made a citizen, the certificate and report of registry, required as evidence of the time of arrival, and also the certificate of his declaration of intention, which shall be inserted at full length in the record of the court, and declaring of no validity the admission of any such alien to be a citizen, after the promulgation of that act, who shall not have complied with these conditions.

These provisions being thus repealed, the second section of the act of May twentyfourth, 1828, then enacts that an alien residing in the United States, between the 14th of April, 1802, and the 18th of June, 1812, and who has continued to reside there, may be admitted to become a citizen without any previous declaration of intention, provided, that in cases where there is no certificate or declaration of intention, it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the court, that the applicant was residing in the United States, before the 18th of June, 1812, and has continued to reside there since, which residence for at least five years immediately preceding his application shall be proved satisfactorily by the oath or affirmation of citizens of the United States, which, together with the place or places where the applicant has resided during that time, and the names of the witnesses, shall be set forth in the record of the court, otherwise he shall not be deemed a citizen of the United States.

It will, therefore, appear that in the case of a free white alien who has arrived in the United States since the 18th of June, 1812, and is desirous of becoming a citizen, he is no longer required to report himself, and no certificate need be set forth in the record of the court, further than is required in the law above noticed.—Ibid. No. 7.

RECENT AMERICAN DECISIONS.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

5. A remitted from the United States to W, his general agent in London, certificates of shares in the United States Bank which stood in A's name, and the usual blank powers of attorney to transfer them. W sold the stock to C, and at the bottom of the bill of parcels delivered C, signed an agreement, by which, in consideration of the purchase money, he guarantied the regularity of the documents, and promised 'to be accountable for such dividends as may become due and be received by me or my agent from the first day of January 1825, until transfer, provided such transfer be made within twelve months from this date.'—After this sale, on May 13, 1825, W wrote to A, requesting him if the stock was not transferred by July 1st, to receive the July dividend, adding, 'which I must pay to the purchaser.' A accordingly received the July dividend, and by the next packet remitted to W funds to a much larger amount than the dividend, intending them for the payment of the dividend and other mercantile uses, though nothing was specified as to the mode of appropriating the funds. This remittance made W indebted to A, and he continued to be so until he became bankrupt in October 1825, never having paid the dividend to C. C in May, 1826, demanded this dividend of A, who had never before known who purchased the stock. In an action brought by C against A for money had and received, to recover the amount of this dividend, it was held, that A was originally accountable to C for the dividend, and consequently that the remittance to W exonerated A from any claim by C; and that as the remittance brought W into A's debt, it was not necessary to specify the object of the remittance in order to produce this effect. Cropper vs. Adams. 8 Pick. 40.

6. The rule, that an attorney or agent, to bind his principal, must sign the name of the principal, applies only to deeds and not to simple contracts. New England Mar. Ins. Co. vs. De Wolf. 56.

7. I. C., who was duly authorized by J. D. to guaranty two notes, wrote on one, 'By authority from J. D. I hereby guaranty the payment of this note. I. C.'; and on the other, 'By authority from J. D. in a letter dated September 24, 1824, [from which C derived his authority] I hereby guaranty his payment of the premiun on policy No. 10,079 [for which the note was given.] I. C.' Held, that J. D. was bound as guarantee of the notes, and not I. C. Ibid.

8. The letters from J. D. to I. C. and from I. C. to J. D. and from J. D. to the person whose notes were guarantied, and from him to J. D. and to I. C., written before and soon after the guarantees were made, and in relation thereto and to the transactions in which they originated, being part of the res gestæ, are admissible evidence in an action against J. D. as guarantee of the notes. Ibid.

9. If goods consigned to a commission merchant for sale, and on which he has a lien for a balance due to him from the owner, are attached as the property of the factor, the owner of the goods may maintain trespass againnt the officer who made the attachment. Holly vs. Huggeford. 73.

10. The lien of the factor is a personal privilege, and cannot be set up by any other person in defence of an action by the principal. Ibid.

11. A commission merchant, who had sold an article consigned to him, afterwards purchased it back at a reduced price on his own account, but it proving defective, the original owner who had made consignment agreed to take it back, and it was accordingly charged to him in account by the factor, though it still remained in the factor's possession, without any other act to invest the property. Held, that the property was revested in the original owner who might maintain trespass against any wrong-doer who took the article from the possession of the factor. Ibid.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY.

1. A creditor who has his debt secured by a surety, and has also property pledged to him by the principal debtor as security, is bound to keep the property for the benefit of the surety as well as himself, and if he surrender the property without the knowledge and consent of the surety, he loses his claim against the surety to the amount of the property given up. Baker vs. Briggs. 122.

2. A surety, who is sued alone, is entitled in this state to the same defence in law which he would have in equity. Ibid.

3. Whether the surety can set up such equitable defence when he and his principal are sued in a joint action, quære. Ibid.

4. If the creditor inform the surety that his debt is paid, and the surety thereby loses an opportunity of securing himself against his principal, the surety is discharged, although the debt was not in fact paid, and the creditor acted under a mistake in the declaration which he made. Ibid.

5. Where the creditor received from the principal debtor the note of a third person to a larger amount than the debt, and gave a receipt which stated that the note was received 'in security for all notes signed' by the debtor, it was held, in an action against the surety, that parol evidence might be received to show that the note of the third person was received in payment by the creditor, and with intent to discharge the debtor and his surety. Ibid.

6. Where a promissory note was signed by B and H as principals, and by the defendant as surety, it was held, that the reception of interest in advance, of the principals, by the holders, after the note was overdue, did not discharge the surety. Oxford Bank vs. Lewis. 458

SALE.

1. Where one purchases goods upon an examination of a specimen taken by him out of a small aperture in the case in which the article is contained, this is a sale by sample. Williams vs. Spafford. 250.

2. Where an article was purchased in that manner, as a seroon of indigo, but the greater part of the contents of the seroon proved to be a different substance, and the remainder to be indigo of a quality inferior to the specimen, it was held, that the seller was liable to the purchaser in assumpsit on a warranty, that the article sold was indigo of the same quality as the sample. Ibid.

3. In the case of a sale of chattels bonâ fide and for a valuable consideration, slight evidence of a delivery is sufficient; and if the vendee, with the consent of the vendor, obtain possession before any attachment or second sale, the transfer is complete, without a formal delivery. Shumway vs. Rutter. 443.

4. Thus where furniture in a tavern was sold and the vendee took a lease of the house and went to live there and used the furniture in common with the vendor, who had occupied the house under a previous lease, and who continued to live there and keep the tavern, and afterwards the vendor removed to another house, carrying the furniture with him and using it as his own, and it was there attached as his property, it was held, that there was sufficient evidence of a delivery, to make the sale complete Ibid.

5. The plaintiff contracted to make some pew pannels for J, who was building a meetinghouse, to be paid for in cash on the delivery of the pannels. The plaintiff made the pannels and brought them to the meetinghouse, and deposited them there, but J was not there, being absent from town, but only some of his workmen. Held, that the pannels were not liable to attachment as the property of J. Woodbury vs. Long. 541.

SHIP.

1. A bill of sale is not necessary to transfer property in a ship. Bixby vs. Franklin Ins. Co. 56.

2. The bill of sale and custom-house register or enrolment, are not conclusive evidence of property in a ship. Ibid.

3. In assumpsit, to recover one quarter of the proceeds of the sale of a vessel and of her earnings previously to the sale, the plaintiff, in support of his title, produced a bill of sale of one quarter thereof from S, who with three others was the first owner of the vessel. The defendant produced a paper, executed previously to the sale to the plaintiff, by all the first owners, whereby they agreed to 'pledge' to the defendant the vessel, then building, as security for his advances thereon and to allow the defendant to buy any part of the vessel, at a certain rate per ton. The vessel was afterward sold by the defendant; but his advances amounted to more than the proceeds of the sale and earnings. Held, that the last mentioned instrument was not an absolute transfer, nor a mortgage, nor a pledge; and that it was incompetent to avoid the subsequent transfer to the plaintiff Bonsey vs. Amee. 236.

TROVER.

1. A tortuous taking is, in an action of trover, proof of conversion. Woodbury vs. Long. 543.

2. If the goods of the plaintiff are attached as the property of J, the plaintiff may maintain trover against the attaching officer, without proving any demand, even where the goods are so situated as that the officer might have fairly supposed them to be the property of J. Ibid.

ENGLISH CASES.

PREROGATIVE COURT.—JUNE.

Before Sir John Nicholl.

Chandless vs. Howe.

The arguments in this case were resumed this morning, and Dr Adams was heard at great length on the part of Mr Rowe.

Dr Lushington proceeded to reply, but was interrupted by Sir John Nicholl, who said he should not be justified in wasting the time of the Court, after the ingenious arguments which had already been advanced, by delaying to hear the Learned Counsel in reply, before giving judgment in a case which to him was perfectly clear. The present case arose out of a will, and two codicils to that will, made by Mrs Isabella Chandless, in favor of her sister-in-law, Mrs Elizsbeth Chandless, and to the prejudice of Mr Rowe, the brother of the testatrix. The Learned Judge then proceeded to state the provisions contained in the will, and those also contained in the codicils, both of which we have already stated in the report of the former proceedings in this cause. He then went on to say that the testatrix was the widow of a lawyer, and prided herself on her knowledge of legal business; and the will proved not only that she was a shrewd and clever woman, but that she was also very warmly attached to Mrs Elizabeth Chandless, both of them being the widows of brothers, and that her brother held but a secondary place in her affections, for she ultimately left the whole of the residue to her sister-in-law, who was not so well on in point of fortune as the testatrix. The testatrix was irritable, and quick to take offence, and this disposition was increased by the complication of disorders under which she latterly labored. To assuage the pain she suffered she was advised to drink brandy, but she carried the remedy too far. She was attended by Mr Wilmer, her apothecary, and Dr Davis who attended her in Nov. 1827, in Oct. 1828, and in March and April 1829, a short time prior to her death, which took place on the 17th of May following, somewhat unexpectedly. On the 2d of May and on the 13th of May she executed the disputed codicils, by which she revoked the moiety of 6,000*l.*, which, by the will, she had left to her brother during his life, and gave the whole sum absolutely to Mrs Chandless. She revoked various other legacies also, and gave an additional legacy to Mary Carter, who had given evidence in the cause—Mr Rowe opposed the codicils on the ground of unsoundness of mind on the part of the testatrix, and he had put in an allegation stating that in March, 1829, the testatrix was seized with a species of insanity denominated delirium tremens, which rendered her childish, incoherent, and irrational, and that she was not, at any subsequent period, of sound mind, or capable of managing her affairs, or of making a testamentary document. This account of the state of the testatrix was supported entirely by the evidence of Mr Wilmer, the apothecary, and or Mrs Miller, the cook; but the Court could place little reliance upon the evidence of Mrs Miller, contradicted as it was by the testimony of persons far more worthy of attention, and being also at variance with the testimony given by Mr Wilmer himself. According to her evidence, the testatrix was wholly incapable of managing her affairs from March until her death; but Mr Wilmer deposed that in April he was sent for to the deceased, whom he found in a high state of excitement, which he at once perceived to be the precursor of a delirum tremens. He urged the discontinuance of the brandy. In the first few days of May, he was again sent for, and found the deceased laboring under delirium tremens, from which she was never free until her death. In another part of his evidence he stated that he believed she was laboring under attacks of this kind, which usually came on at night, but that in the day-time she was rational and tranquil. He further stated that delirium tremens was an unnatural excitement of the brain, which would leave the patient in a sound state of mind as soon as the exciting cause was removed. Why this amounted to little more than a proof that the deceased was occasionally intoxicated by drinking brandy.—What the Court had to look to was, whether there was any appearance of delirium tremens at the time the deceased was making these codicils. The principal witness to the state of the deceased on that occasion was Mr Wilson, one of the executors appointed by the codicils, a gentleman upwards of 60 years of age, formerly a practising Barrister and King's Counsel in one of our colonial possessions.

[To be concluded next week]

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1830.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENTS.

'I shall ask for the abolition of death—until I have the infallibility of human judgment demonstrated to me. The punishment of death has always inspired me with feelings of horror.'—[LAFAYETTE, on the proposition of M. De Tracy in the Chamber of Deputies.

The sentiment so boldly and humanely expressed by the venerable friend of universal liberty—to whom America owes much, and France more—was fully and readily responded by the King of the French, when addressed on the subject of M. De Tracy's motion, by the head of the deputation, expressing a hope that the country would owe him the boon of the abolition of the punishment of death, to whom France owed the extinction of civil war. To this the King replied, that he desired the abolition from a conviction which he had entertained through life, and added 'I will do all in my power to realize your wish, which is also mine.'

This subject has deeply occupied the attention and called forth the exertions of the friends of humanity and justice in England, for years past. France, in this respect, at least, seems to be outruning our own country in the race of liberal principles. And even in England, whose criminal code has been sanguinary beyond that of any other civilized nation, the Statute Book is yielding to public sentiment on this subject. It must yield still more, since this sentiment is sustained and aided by all the principles of morality, philanthropy and religion.

The spirit of reform has begun, where it should always begin, with the people; and the time is not far distant when those measures will triumph there and everywhere, which 'have engaged the deep attention of the enlightened and lamented Romilly—have had the aid of the splendid reasonings of McIntosh—the logical and resistless eloquence of Brougham—the moral and intellectual energies of the most distinguished and enlightened Statesmen, with the evidence of practical men and the voice of universal opinion.'

We design again to return to this subject. For the purpose of showing the state of feeling, now existing in England, and the progress which is there making towards a more mild and humane penal code, we insert the following remarks from a late English paper.

'Our readers will recollect that the Forgery Bill was introduced by Sir Robert Peel in the House of Commons, on the principle of revising, consolidating, and ameliorating the laws relative to a crime which, though of great moral guilt, and of pernicious consequences, has been visited with such disproportionate severity by a multiplicity of penal statutes as to prevent, in a great measure, their own execution. It was admitted by the Right Honorable Secretary, on moving for leave to bring in his Bill, that the Legislature, in treating of this offence, from the eighth year of the reign of King William to the present day, had added upwards of sixty capital enactments to the Statute-book; thus including a multitude of offences coming within the definition of forgery, of various degrees of moral and social delinquency, under the one sanguinary denunciation of death! The feelings of society have long been disgusted with the spectacles of extermination which these laws have produced. The repeated executions, some years ago, for the forgery of 1*l.* notes, in consequence of prosecutions by the Bank of England, are fresh in the recollection of the public, who saw, at that time, that the crime, instead of being repressed, became alarmingly more frequent, as one batch of victims after another was offered up to the vengeance of the law! These executions only ceased when the small notes were withdrawn from circulation, so much stronger was the temptation to the crime than the terror of the punishment. Society saw with that horror which, under such circumstances, must ever characterize the feelings of a civilized community, that so much blood was shed in vain. Nor is it to be wondered at that the terrible examples of the law were ineffective, when the severity of the punishment caused the odium of the crime to be lost in sympathy for the offender. Since that time the public aversion to the law of forgery has become more strong, and the expression of that sentiment more loud and general. In compliance with the public call for an alteration of the law, which was growing too powerful to be much longer resisted, Sir Robert Peel commenced his work of revising the statutes relating to this offence. From the manner in which he had executed his task of revising the criminal law in general, we were not led to expect much from him, as his statutory repeals went no further than to lop off some of those ferocious enactments which had fallen into humane disuse, and which, in a practical point of view, had already ceased to exist. In his Bill to amend the law of forgery he pursued the same plan. His own words will justify what we assert. Here is his exposition of the provisions of his Bill, as it stood before the third reading. 'My great principle (said the Right Hon. Secretary) in this Bill is to retain the capital penalty for the crime of forgery of those documents or instruments which may be considered in the light of negotiable and transferable securities, and to remit it to others, where, though continued, this view does not appear to me to be fitly taken. Keeping this principle then in view, I shall now proceed to enumerate the cases in which I propose to remit and retain the capital punishment for the crime of forgery. I shall retain it in all forgeries of the Great Seal, Privy Seal, and Sign Manual; in all forgeries on the public funds, on Bank or money notes, or orders for the payment of money—in short, as I before said, of all documents which represent money, and are negotiable and transferable for it. I also add the forgery of wills relating to personal property.' After some observations, he proceeds to the other branch of his subject—the remission of capital punishments. 'I propose to except from the punishment of death all forgeries of receipts for money or goods—all issuing of forged stamps, or forgeries of stamps—all attempts to defraud by forged orders—all fabrications of Bank paper—that is, the paper on which notes are stamped;—all forgeries of deeds and bonds, and every document which, in short, does not come under the class I have already named, and which are not in the nature of negotiable or transferable securities.

For these offences death, be it borne in mind, is now very rarely inflicted, and I am ready to admit that it ought not to be inflicted.' For the word 'rarely,' in the last sentence, the Right Hon. Secretary ought to have said 'never.' We defy him to point out a single instance of the judgment of the law being, in modern times, carried into execution in the cases of forgery which he has enumerated as those that are to be exempted from the punishment of death. What then was the improvement of the law proposed to be effected by his Bill? Merely to prune away what may be called the dead branches of this portion of our penal system, while the main stem and living arms of the destroying upas were left to flourish in all their fatal vigor and baneful luxuriance! In fact, this Bill would not have the effect, if it passed into a law as introduced by its author, of instigating the practical severity of the law to the amount of a single execution. Yet there were Journals, and among them one which had formerly urged in strong language the necessity of abolishing the capital punishment in all cases of forgery, that praised this Bill as a complete and finished specimen of judicious legislation. We felt it our duty to undeceive the public on the matter. The decision of the House of Commons on the third reading of the Bill has proved that opinion was not erroneous. By that decision an amendment, moved by Sir James Mackintosh, had been introduced into the Bill, which has the effect of repealing the penalty of death in all cases of forgery, except the forging of wills—an exception which the Hon. and Learned Mover of the amendment accounted for by stating that it was a concession which he made to the opinions of others, to whose views he sacrificed, in this instance, his own judgment. Should the Bill, in its amended shape as it now stands, pass into a law, we should still regret that a single fragment of the sanguinary code remained to blot the new Statute-book of a better era of legislation; but it was, perhaps, necessary to give up something to secure the remainder. The reasoning that applies against inflicting the penalty of death for the forging of bonds, bank notes, bills of exchange, &c,—namely, that it is not effective in repressing the crime, and that it confounds a fraudulent invasion of the right of property with offences of violence and blood, is as applicable to the forgery of wills as to the other cases just mentioned. At one time the great argument on which the advocates of the sanguinary principle relied, was the necessity of protecting, by the severest penalty known to the law, the banking and commercial interests; which, they alleged, would be subjected to ruinous depredation, if any punishment short of death was annexed to the crime. That argument has been shown by bankers and merchants to be a gross and pernicious fallacy. Upwards of 200 petitions, we must again remind the supporters of exterminating Statutes, have been presented to the Legislature in the present Session, praying for the abolition of capital punishment for forgery, on the various grounds—that it is opposed to revealed religion—to reason—to the natural sentiments of humanity, and to public opinion; that it is, in consequence of its extreme severity, of uncertain execution, thereby encouraging crime, by holding out the hopes of impunity to the offender, and, consequently, rendering peculiarly insecure the property which it was intended to protect. But, in addition to this mass of petitions, to which appeared the signatures of bankers, merchants, clergymen, barristers, solicitors, and private gentlemen, was one petition, which afforded the best evidence that could be given to Parliament touching the single point of the insecurity of bankers' property, in consequence of the cruelty of the law producing a conscientious disinclination to prosecute offenders.

This petition was presented by Mr Brougham. By whom was it signed? By one thousand bankers! What was the language which they addressed to the Legislature? Here it is—'That your petitioners, as bankers, are deeply interested in the protection of property from forgery, and in the conviction and punishment of persons guilty of this crime—that your petitioners find, by experience, that the infliction of death, or even the probability of the infliction of death, prevents the prosecution, conviction, and punishment of the criminal, and thus endangers the property which it was intended to protect—that your petitioners, therefore, pray that your Honorable House will not withhold from them that protection which they would derive from a more lenient law.' Here, in the simple and forcible language of truth, gathered from long experience, is the appeal to Parliament of one thousand bankers of the United Kingdom, supplicating for the abolition of the capital law of forgery on the interested principle of the insecurity of their property under the existing laws. Such are the witnesses—such the evidence! Leaving religion and all moral and humane considerations out of view, here is the testimony of cold, and even selfish, calculation. It shows the injurious consequences resulting from the present state of the law in a commercial point of view. Bankers do not theorise for the sake of humanity to their own pecuniary prejudice; nor are they exactly the class of men who prefer sentiment to self-interest. It happens, however, in this case, that their particular interests coincide with the view of this question which is derived from the higher considerations of religion, reason, and humanity. Can the Legislature refuse to listen to the evidence of those who know the working of the law best—whose property is most affected by its operation—and whose demand of an efficient law to guard their property against depredation goes not to destroy, but to save, the lives of men? The House of Commons have listened to their appeal—they have decided in favor of the calculations of commerce, and the rights of humanity equally demand it. We hope those who have hitherto opposed the mitigation of the criminal code in the other House will recollect that this is not a question of politics, in which men may safely indulge in speculative opinions even against the sense of a great proportion of the community, but that it is a question of justice, and that life is at stake. In such a question an error on the side of humanity is easily recalled, while on the opposite side it is irreparable. The vote of the House of Commons is now on the records of history, and will assuredly, one day or other, if defeated now, become the law of the land. But we will not anticipate a decision at this time that would severely disappoint the country; we would rather encourage the hope that the House of Lords will make the inchoate triumph of civilized law over cruel prejudices complete, and accede to the earnest supplications of practical men, backed by the highest considerations that can operate on the minds of dispassionate and enlightened legislatures.

---

Answer in Chancery—New Doctrine. The London Law Magazine states a case, Stanbury vs. Gordon, which recently came before the vice chancellor, where the bill charges that the defendant Gordon, had employed the plaintiff to procure his, the defendant's, return to parliament from the borough of Tregony, and that Gordon had advanced several sums to the plaintiff, as agent in this business, for which the plaintiff had made mortgages, and the prayer is for a redemption and discovery. Gordon denies the agency, and objects to answering, on the ground that a disclosure would subject him to a criminal prosecution. The vice chancellor decided that he should answer, and said that the defendant cannot protect himself from answering even where he may criminate himself by the discovery. See contra Redesdale's Tr. 249; 19 Ves. 225; 1 Mer 391; 1 Swanst. 192, 305.

The law promotions to take place on the first day of Michaelmas Term are the subject of general conversation. In addition to three new Judges for the Courts of King's Bench, Exchequer, and Common Pleas, there will be a new batch of King's Counsel.—London Morning Herald.

Butler's life of D'Aguesseau. It will be recollected, perhaps, by the readers of Butler's Reminiscences, that he consulted Sir Samuel Romilly on some occasions, as to the manner of amusing himself in the country during the vacation, and Sir Samuel recommended to him to occupy himself upon the life of the celebrated Chancellor of France, D'Aguesseau. Mr Butler, it seems, followed the suggestion, and the result is a recently published Life of that eminent jurist.—English paper.

---

ADVERTISEMENT.

A gentleman in the city, who has been seven or eight years in practice, and can furnish the best recommendations, would be glad to connect himself with some person of advanced standing and full business in the profession, as a partner or otherwise, on reasonable terms.—Address to A. B., at this office, with real name.

QUARTERLY LIST

OF

COUNSELLORS AND ATTORNEYS AT LAW.

Boston, Edward Blake,
James Bowdoin,
J. P. Cook,
Chs. P. Curtis,
Jona. Chapman,
Moses Draper,
A. A. Dame,
Derby & Rogers,
Dexter & Gardiner,
E. R. Dorr,
Richard Fletcher,
H. H. Fuller,
Timo. Fuller,
W. P. Gragg,
W. J. Hubbard,
Wm. Hilliard, Jr.
H. W. Kinsman,
John Knapp,
Sherman Leland,
Chs. G. Loring,
Wm. Minot,
S. F. Mc Cleary,
O. Pickering,
Jno. Pickering,
Ewd. G. Prescott,
Wm. T. Heydock,
Willard Phillips,
Josiah Quincy, Jr.
Rand & Fisk,
Bradford Sumner,
Sidney Bartlett,
Wm. Sullivan,
Calvin Tilden,
S. D. Ward,
Peabody & Watts.

Aurora, N. Y. Isaac Woods.

Andover, Ms. David Mack,
N. W. Hazen.

Amherst, Ms. Edward Dickinson,
Osmyn Baker,
Lucius Baltwood.

Ann Arbor, M. T. Calvin Smith.

Amherst, N. H. Chs. H. Atherton.

Augusta, Geo. Andrew J. Miller.

Adams, Ms. Thos. Robinson.

Annapolis, Md. Jas. F. Brice.

Barre, Ms. C. S. Baldwin,
Eleazer James,
Seth Lee.

Bradford, N. H. Tappan Weare.

Bangor, Me. John Godfrey.

Bristol, N. H. D. Blaisdell.

Baltimore, Md. Fred. L. Dugan,
Wm. D. Mc Kim,
Wm. Gwynn,
J. Meredith,
S. A. Raszell.

Bath, N. H. Goodall & Woods.

Canaan, N. H. Wm. P. Weeks.

Concord, N. H. Chas. H. Peaslee.

Chesterfield, N. H. Larkin G. Mead.

Cambridgport, Ms, L. S. Cushing.

Calais, Me. Anson G. Chandler.

Dedham Ms. Theron Metcalf,
J. H. Coll,
Sam'l F. Haven,
S. B. Barrell.

Deerfield, Ms. Elijah Williams, 2d,

Dudley, Ms. G. B. Slater.

Danville, Me. E. T. Little.

Derry, N. H. Thornton Betton.

East Bridgewater, Ms. Welcome Young.

Exeter, N. H. Joseph Tilton, Jr.

Fall River, Ms. Hezh. Battelle.

Fitchburg, Ms. Torrey & Wood,
D. Brigham.

Fairhaven, Ms. Gustavus Gilbert.

Gilmanton, N. H. Stephen Moody.

Greenfield, Ms. J. C. Alvord.

Gardiner, Me. J. P. Chandler.

Great Barrington, Ms. Increase Sumner,
Seth J. Hurd.

Hanover, N. H. Wm. Olcott.
Mills Olcott.

Haverhill, N. H. Bell & Olcott.

Haverhill, Ms. J. R. Howe,
Jas. H. Duncan.

Hardwicke, Me. Jos. Knox.

Harrison, Me. Chas. Washburn.

Hollis, Me. Sam'l Bradley.

Hancock, Ms. J. H. Gardner.

Keene, N. H. Joel Parker,
Jas. Wilson, Jr.

Litchfield, Conn. C. W. Rogers,
F. H. Brigham.

Lynn, Ms. J. C. Stickney.

Leicester, Ms. Waldo Flint,
Nath. Denny.

Lenox, Ms. Geo. I. Tucker,
Henry Raymond.

Lowell, Ms. S. Ames,
J. P. Robinson,
J. B. French,
Elisha Glidden,
J. R. Adams,
Nath. Wright,
Luke Eastman.
Sam'l H. Mann.

Lancaster, Ms. Wm. Steadman,
Jos. Willard.

Lanesboro', Ms G. N. Briggs.

Meredith, N. H. Warren Lovell,
Henry H. Orne.

Middleboro, Ms. Zech. Eddy,
Isaac Stevens.

Nantucket, Ms. Chas. Bunker.

Nashville, Tenn. F. B. Fogg.

North Andover, Ms. Franklin Wright,
Amos Spaulding.

Norwich, Ct. Alfred Lee,
John A. Rockwell.

New Chester, N. H. Geo. M. Phelps.

New Haven, Ct. Isaac H. Townsend.

New Bedford, Ms. Samuel Williams.

Newburyport, Ms S. W. Marston,
Geo. Lunt.

Ossipee, N. H. Francis Coggswell.

Otis, Ms. L. Filley.

Portsmouth N. H. Jas. Smith, 2d,
Chas. B. Goodrich,
John L. Sheafe,
Wm. Claggett, Esq.

Plymouth, N. H. Thompson & Bliss,
N. P. Rogers.

Powelton, Geo. Jas. Hodges.

Pine Plains, N. Y. Stephen Eno.

Plaistow, Me. John Kelly, 2d.

Potsdam, N. Y. B. G. Baldwin.

Philadelphia, Chas. Chauncey.

Plymouth, Ms. Jacob H. Loud.

Petersham, Ms. Aaron Brooks, Jr.

Pawtucket, R. I. Collins Darling.

Portland, Me. A. Ware,
Fessenden & Deblois,
N. Amory,
R. G. Green,
Greenleaf & Kinsman,
W. P. Fessenden,
Wm. I. Smith,
John Neal,
W. T. Vaughn,
Simon Greenleaf.

Providence, R. I. W. E. Richmond,

Randolph, Ms. Aaron Prescott.

Roxbury, Ms. F. S. Eastman.

Seabrook, N. H. E. French, Jr.

Saccarappa, Me. Wm. Graffum.
David Hayes.

Sutton, Ms, Edward Clark.

Southbury, Ct. R. D. Smith.

Salem, Ms. Benj. Merrill,
Rufus Choate,
David Roberts,
E. Shillaber.

Springfield, Ms. Geo. Ashman.

Shrewsbury, Ms. Wm. Pratt.

S. Hadley, Ms. Wm. Bowdoin, Jr.

Standish, Me. Wm. Boyd.

Shancateles, N. Y. A Kellogg.

Sheffield, Ms. P. L. Hall.

Sandisfield, Me. Thos. Twining.

Taunton, Ms. W. A. F. Sproat.
Henry Williams,
Horatio Pratt.

Troy, Ohio, Z. Riley.

Vincennes, Ind. John Law.

Worcester, Me. C. G. Prentiss,
Nath. Paine,
Ed. J. Vose.

Walpole, N. H. John S. Marcy.

Wakefield, N. H Sawyer & Hobbs.

West Brookfield, Ms. Arad Gilbert,
John Bliss.

Westfield, Ms. Norman T. Leonard.

Watertown, Ms. Levi Thaxter.

W. Bridgewater, Ms. Wm. Baylies.

Westville, Mi. Chas. R. Brown.

[To be continued.]

GRAY & BOWEN, have in preparation, and will very shortly put to press,

A NEW DICTIONARY OF MEDICAL SCIENCE AND LITERATURE; which will contain a concise account of the various subjects in Anatomy, Physiology, Pathology, Therapeutics, Materia Medica, Surgery, Obstetrics, and Pharmacy, with the Etymology and Orthoepy of the terms of their Greek, Latin, French, and German synonymes;—a copious Bibliography appended to the different articles, and Biographical Notices of the most eminent Authors in the different departments of Medical Science, with a Catalogue of their principal works mentioned and an Epitome of the existing state of Medical Science and Literature. By Robley Dunglison, M. D. Professor of Medicine in the University of Virginia &c, &c.

While many of the nations of Continental Europe possess Dictionaries, which have kept pace with the advancing condition of Medical Science, Great Britain and America possess it may be said, but one of a concise character,—that of Hooper,—which independently of its want of accuracy on many points, is incontestibly far behind the present state of Medical Science and Literature, and unfit for the purposes of the Medical Student. In proof of this, it will be sufficient to remark, that the New Dictionary will contain at least five thousand words more than are to be found in that publication,—while the circumstance of the Dictionary of Hooper being stereotyped in this country, renders it impracticable to make the necessary additions to it, were the ground work such as to render such a course advisable.

The work will not be a mere Dictionary of terms; it will comprise concise histories of diseases: a description and doses of various kinds of medicine, with formula for the different Pharmacentrical preparations, &c, &c.

The important publications daily appearing in France and Germany, have induced the author to add the French and German synonymes to the various terms; so that the work will really contain the substance of an English, French and German Dictionary, at a comparatively trifling expense.—The French Index will be found to include every word in the 'Dictionaire des Science Medicales,' which consists of sixty volumes, as well as in the smaller Dictionaries more recently published.

Great attention has been, moreover, paid to the Greek and Latin synonymes, so that the Dictionary will, it is trusted, form a safe and convenient guide to the study of ancient and modern authors on Medicine.

It will be comprised in one large volume, 8vo.

Oct. 23.

PICKERING'S REPORTS, Vol. 8th. This day published and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & CO.

Oct. 23.

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1830. NO. XXI.

MERCANTILE LAW.

CONTRACT OF SALE.

Continued.

The general doctrine is thus oracularly delivered by Lord Coke:—'By the civil law, every person is bound to warrant the thing that he sells or conveys, although there be no express warranty; but the common law binds him not, unless there be a warranty either in deed or in law, for caveat emptor.'* Of warranty in deed, or express warranty, little need be said. It differs in no respect from every other positive agreement, and must be governed, therefore, by the rules which have been laid down as applicable to contracts generally. Thus, the warranty must be given at the time of the sale,† or at least must be connected by direct reference with the sale;‡ else it forms no part of the bargain, and is a mere naked undertaking, unsupported by an adequate consideration.§ Again, questions may arise, and have frequently arisen, as to the import of the expressions used, and consequently as to the extent of the warranty; and they have been, and must continue to be determined, according to the established rules of legal construction; or, what is the same thing, the presumable intention of the parties. A ship, for instance, is warranted tight, or copper-fastened; a horse sound or free from blemish. Whether the warranty has been fulfilled, depends, of course, upon the meaning of these words: and this can only be ascertained by an inquiry into their acceptation among skilful persons conversant with the subject matter.‖ To those who have paid attention to the preceding chapter, it may also be unnecessary to say, that a warranty by word of mouth cannot be appended to a written contract of sale; neither can a written warranty be qualified, extended or explained by representations previously made and not reduced into writing, unless there has been fraud on the part of the seller. On this subject the words of Lord Tenterden are as follow:—'A matter antecedent to, and dehors the writing, may, in some cases, be received in evidence, as showing the inducement to the contract; such as a representation of some particular quality or incident to the thing sold. But the buyer is not at liberty to show such a representation, unless he can also show that the seller by some fraud prevented him from discovering a fault which he, the seller, knew to exist.'¶

It has been said, and repeated from one text-writer to another, that if the defect be palpable, even an express warranty does not bind.* The case must necessarily be of so rare occurrence, that it is hardly worth while to question the soundness of the proposition. It seems to have originated partly in the well known distinction of the Roman law between latent and manifest defects, and partly in the nature and form of the action once adopted in cases of a breach of warranty. That action was founded on an allegation that the seller had deceived the buyer; and it might, therefore, not unreasonably be questioned how such an allegation could be supposed, when the fault was visible to every eye. But there seems no reason for extending the rule to an action for the breach of a positive undertaking; for to answer that such a bargain never could have been in the contemplation of the parties, is to set up an inference against express ambiguous words, which, as we have seen, the law does not allow. If a man be foolish enough to give such an undertaking, why should he be exempted from the consequences of his folly?

But the warranty in law, of which Lord Coke speaks, is a matter of much greater difficulty. Indeed, in the whole range of mercantile law, there is scarcely any subject more perplexed and unsatisfactory than this. We have taken some pains to trace out the origin of this uncertainty, and a careful investigation of the cases has enabled us, we hope, to explain, if not to remove the difficulty. Anciently, as we have just hinted, the almost universal remedy for the breach of an express warranty was an action, technically called an action on the case, founded upon the wrongful act of the seller in warranting a commodity to be what in reality it was not. Now precisely the same remedy was applicable, upon the most common principles of law,† when the seller, without actually warranting, had knowingly made a false representation of such a kind, as might well elude the caution of the buyer, and by that deception had induced him to purchase. It was, in fact, the ordinary case of a fraud occasioning an injury. The effect, therefore of two cases was the same. The fraudulent misrepresentation, though not in strictness a warranty, was in its consequences tantamount thereto; and hence it received the designation of a warranty in law. The only important difference was this: that in the latter case it was essential to allege and prove that the seller knew the falsehood of the representation which he was making, and that the buyer was actually deceived by it; whereas if the warranty were express, the mind of the seller, and the effect upon the buyer, were equally immaterial.

The ancient doctrine of warranty is so well illustrated by an early case, that we do not scruple to transcribe it verbatim from the report.* 'Chandelor v. Lopus. Action on the case: Whereas the defendant being a goldsmith, and having skill in jewels and precious stones, had a stone which he affirmed to Lopus to be a bezar's stone, and sold it unto him for 100*l.*, ubi revera it was not a bezar's stone. After verdict and judgment for the plaintiff in the King's Bench, error was brought in the Exchequer Chamber. Because the declaration contains not matter sufficient to charge the defendant, viz. that he warranted it to be a bezar's stone, nor that he knew that it was not a bezar's stone, for it may be he himself was ignorant whether it was a bezar's stone or not. And all the justices and barons (besides [except] Anderson) held that for this cause it was error; for the bare affirmation that it was a bezar stone, without warranting it to be so, is no cause of action. And [even] although he knew it to be a bezar stone, it is not material, for every one, in selling of his wares, will affirm that his wares are good, or the horse which he sells is sound; yet if he warrant them not to be so, it is no cause of action. And the warranty ought to be made at the same time of the sale. Wherefore forasmuch as no warranty is alleged, they held the declaration to be ill. But Anderson to the contrary, for the deceit in selling it for a bezar, whereas it was not so, is cause of action. But notwithstanding it was adjudged to be no cause, and the judgment was reversed.'

Now whether Anderson was right or not, is little to the purpose. For ourselves, we should be inclined to agree with him that the declaration was sufficient; for it alleged that the defendant had skill in jewels, from whence it might, without any great strain, have been inferred that he knew the nature of the property; and if so, we confess it seems to us more like a case of downright fraud, than of venial puffing. However this may be, it is clear that without proof of knowledge on the part of the seller (technically styled the scienter,) the warranty in law did not arise. The case, moreover, serves to shew, what was then considered as amounting to a deception of which the law would take notice, and how closely the maxim of caveat emptor was adhered to. Even now, though the rule has been much relaxed, it is not every misrepresentation which makes the seller answerable. As in the civil law, so in ours, 'simplex commendatio non obligat.' Every man, as the court remarked in the case which we have quoted, will trumpet forth the goodness of his wares, and it is the buyer's own folly if he be imposed upon by idle declamations of this kind.* And, generally, a false affirmation of a matter, about which the buyer might, by ordinary diligence, have informed himself correctly, will not amount to

---

* Co. Lit. 102. a.

† 2 Ld. Raym. 1120. 1 Str. 414. Dyer, 76 a. Cro. Jac. 197. 630.

‡ 1 Roll. Abr. 96. 1 Salk. 211.

§ It has been said, and Plowden has been quoted as authorizing the position, 308 b. 309 a. that 'if a warranty be given in writing, the consideration is not inquirable.' We know not how such a position can be maintained, because even though it might be unnecessary in an action on the case, strictly speaking, to prove a consideration, yet if the purchase were not connected with the representation, we apprehend no action would lie. At all events, the circumstances of its being written or unwritten can make no difference.

‖ 5 Dow. 164. 1 Campb. 361. 5 B & A. 240. 1 R. & M. 136. 290. 2 Chitty's Rep. 425. 3 Campb. 523.

¶ 2 B. & C. 684. Ch. J. Gibbs also, in the case of Pickering v. Dowson. 4 Taunt. 779. says: 'If a representation be made before a sale of the quality of the thing sold with full opportunity to the purchaser to inspect the article, and examine the truth of the representation, and a contract of sale be afterwards reduced into writing, in which that representation is not embodied, no action for deceit will lie against the vendor on the ground that the article sold is not answerable to that representation, whether the vendor knew of the defects or not, unless there have been fraud on his part.

* See 10 Ves. 505, where this doctrine is cited as law by Sir Wm. Grant, Master of the Rolls.

† Dyer 75. Roll. Abr. 91. tit. Action sur Case. 3 T. R 56.

* Cro. Jac. 4. See also Springwell v. Allen, Aleyn, 91.; and 2 East, 449. (n;) and the observations of Buller, J. in his elaborate judgment in Pasley v. Freeman, 3 T. R. 56.

† Roll. Abr. 101. pl. 6. 1 Sid. 146. 1 Stark. 75. Yelv. 20. 2 Ch. Ca. 204. 1 Levinz 102.

such a deception, as to impose on the seller the obligation of a warranty.*

With respect to the concealment of defects, the rule has always been that the seller, however in conscience bound, was not required by the law to disclose a defect, which the purchaser himself by exercising due caution might have discovered; but if the fault be latent, and such as the purchaser could not by the greatest attention detect, then, if the seller be aware of it, he is bound to make it known. And, even though the defect be apparent, yet if the seller has used artifice to conceal or disguise it, the rule of caveat emptor will not protect him from the consequences. Now, all these cases, whether of wilful misrepresentation, or studied concealment, or mere suppression, obviously fall within the general doctrine as to fraud, rendering the seller liable to an action on the case for deceit; and these alone are, in our opinion, properly comprehended within the term 'warranty in law.'

In process of time, however, a notion sprung up, that in certain cases a warranty might be implied from circumstances and expressions accompanying the sale. It must be inferred, it was said, that it was the intention to warrant, though no formal words of warranty were made use of. This innovation (for although the doctrine of implied warranty has been absurdly confounded with that of warranty in law, an innovation it unquestionably was) seems to have been first introduced by Ch. J. Holt. He laid down a principle, which has ever since been uniformly adopted, that an affirmation at the time of sale is a warranty, provided it appear in evidence to have been so intended. The question of intention thus let in, was soon pushed to an absurdity. It became an established maxim, applied indeed for the most part, if not solely, to sales of horses, but in principle applicable to every other sale, that if the price paid were equal to the worth of a good and perfect commodity, the seller must be understood to have warranted it such. But this notion of a sound price, as it was called, was exploded by Lord Mansfield, as resting on too loose and unsatisfactory a foundation: he might have added, that it was at variance with the established principles of our law.

Not many years after this, the action on the case for a breach of warranty, began to be superseded by the more convenient form of an action of assumpsit, which founded itself on the undertaking of the seller, and complained of the non-fulfilment of his contract. Now, the notion of an implied undertaking had long been familiar to the lawyers; and it is no wonder, therefore, that with the adoption of the form, the doctrine also began to be applied more generally to the subject of warranties. Indeed, there is little doubt that, to this change in the formal remedy the change in the law is mainly attributable, although it is true, that when once the doctrine had gained a footing, the distinction between the two kinds of action was no longer regarded.

A brief review of the modern cases on the subject of implied warranty, may, perhaps, enable us to lay down a few plain rules for practical guidance. The first in order of time, is that of Parkinson v. Lee.† A quantity of hops had been sold by sample, with which, as was found by the jury, the bulk at the time of delivery corresponded. There was, however, a latent defect, of which, neither the seller nor the buyer was, or could be then aware, but which, ultimately, rendered them worthless. The buyer thereupon brought an action of assumpsit, alleging a promise, on the part of the seller, that the hops should be good, sound and merchantable. There was no evidence that any such warranty was given in fact; and the question therefore was, whether it could be implied from the circumstances of the case. Le Blanc J., who tried the cause, thought that the defect being one against which the buyer could by no precaution protect himself, the rule of caveat emptor did not apply, and that the seller therefore must be answerable for the loss. But the court, upon mature consideration, decided, with the concurrence of Le Blanc himself, that no such warranty as that alleged could be inferred—that the buyer might have protected himself, if he had been so minded, by requiring an express warranty, but that not having done so, and having had an opportunity of exercising his judgment on the commodity, he had bought it at his own risk with all its imperfections.

Jones v. Bowden,* was an action on the case for deceit in the sale of some pimento, which the declaration alleged to have been put up as not sea-damaged, whereas, in reality, it was so. At the trial it was proved, that when sea-damaged pimento was offered to sale by auction, it was usual in the trade to state, that it was so damaged; and that, if nothing were said with respect to its quality, it was understood to be sound. In this case nothing had been said, and the action, therefore, was held to be maintainable. Now, this decision carried the doctrine of Lord Holt one step farther. There was no affirmation at the time of the sale, that the pimento was not sea-damaged, but there was that, which by the usage of trade, was equivalent to such an affirmation. It was evidence, therefore, of an intention to warrant.

But the court, if the report be correct, took a far greater leap in the case of Laing v. Fidgeon,† which occurred soon afterwards. It was an action of assumpsit laid before Chief Justice Gibbs. The plaintiff had bought from the defendant a number of saddles for exportation, of which, samples had been previously sent. It was proved that those delivered were of very inferior materials and workmanship, and that they were in fact useless and unmerchantable. It appeared moreover that they did not correspond with the sample. After verdict for the plaintiff, a motion was made for a new trial on the ground that there was no undertaking proved, as alleged in the declaration, that the saddles should be merchantable. But the court said, that it resulted from the whole transaction that the article was to be merchantable: the defendant might have rejected the order, but having accepted it, he ought to furnish a merchantable article. As the saddles were intended for exportation, it is probable that the buyer might not have had an opportunity of inspecting them at the time of delivery; and if so, the decision of the court may be supported without adopting its reasoning. It was a bold novelty if they meant to say that in every such transaction there was an implied warranty that the goods should be merchantable.

To be continued.

*10 Ves. page 505. Sugd. Vend. & Purch. 282, and 19.

†2 East, 314.

*4 Taunt. 847.

†6 Taunt. 108.

SAMUEL ROMILLY.

Concluded from page 155.

There is no wisdom more to be desired than that which enables us to estimate, at their true relative value, the various objects of human ambition. The highest and noblest minds, deficient in this knowledge, have too often wasted or abused their powers, by devoting them to the vainest or the wickedest purposes. The sanction of public applause to actions indifferent or injurious, has misled many from the pursuit of purer and more excellent objects; and the world has been justly repaid for its false and dangerous adulation, by the scourging vices of those whose ambition it has depraved. Some men, indeed, with a deeper insight into their own nature, and into the true ends and aims of their being, have proposed to themselves a higher and a nobler course, and have found no object worthy of their ambition, unconnected with the happiness, with the improvement, and with the virtue of mankind. To reform and to instruct the human mind, to purify it from the mean and wicked passions which debase it, to purge it of its weaknesses and its errors, and to fill it with all noble views and aspirations, has, in every age, been the object of that small band of good and virtuous men, the 'Salt of the earth, the virtuous few

Who season human kind.'

Among these truly excellent and exalted persons, Sir Samuel Romilly has every claim to be ranked. He was, in the highest sense of the word, a philanthropist, loving mankind with wise and constant affection, not misled by any false sensibility, yet tremblingly alive to their best and truest interests. Without displacing for a moment the beautiful affections of domestic life, the welfare of his fellow creatures ever lay next to the heart of Sir Samuel Romilly; and the feelings which in weaker and meaner minds extend only round the small circle which blood or friendship draws, were in him diffused with undiminished warmth over the wide orbit of human existence.

How noble and pure was the ambition of Sir Samuel Romilly, we may learn from the following beautiful passages, where he has explained the motives by which he was actuated in his proposed reforms of the criminal law. 'It was not,' said he 'from light motives, it was from no fanciful notions of benevolence, that I have ventured to suggest any alteration in the criminal law of England. It has originated in many years' reflection, and in the long-established belief that a mitigation of the severe penalties of our law will be one of the most effectual modes to preserve and advance the humanity and justice for which this country is so eminently distinguished. Since the last session of parliament, I have repeatedly reconsidered the subject: I am more and more firmly convinced of the strength of the foundation upon which I stand; and even if I had doubted my own conclusions, I cannot forget the ability with which I was supported within these walls; nor can be insensible to the humane and enlightened philosophy by which, in contemplative life, this advancement of kindness has been recommended. I cannot, therefore, hastily abandon a duty which, from my success in life, I owe to my profession; which, as a member of this house, I owe to you and to my country; and which, as a man blessed with more than common prosperity, I owe to the misguided and unfortunate.

'Actuated by these motives, it is not to be imagined that I shall be easily discouraged by any of the various obstacles so commonly, and perhaps with propriety, opposed to every attempt to alter an established law; upon such a resistance I calculated, but am not to be deterred. I knew that my motives must occasionally be misunderstood by many, and might possibly be misrepresented by others. I was not blind to the road where prudence pointed to preferment; but I am not to be misled from comforts which no external honors can bestow. I have long thought that it was the duty of every man, unmoved either by bad report or by good report, to use all the means which he possessed for the purpose of advancing the well-being of his fellow-creatures: and I know not any mode by which I can so effectually advance that well-being, as by endeavoring to improve the criminal laws of my country. It has been insinuated, that, indebted as I am to the law, commendation rather than censure ought to be expected from me; and it has been asserted, that under the pretext of proposing apparently immaterial alterations, my real object is to sap and undermine the whole criminal law of England. Such insinuations and assertions have not, I am well aware, been made by any of my honorable and learned friends by whom I am now surrounded, and who have witnessed my whole professional life; but they have been made, and I must of course suppose, have been really believed.'*

In another speech on the Catholic question, Sir Samuel Romilly has, in the same lofty spirit of philosophical benevolence, described the true objects of human ambition:—

'What! is it no hardship to the catholics of Ireland to be told, "You may enter, indeed, into professions which are highly honorable to others, but by you they must be followed merely as the means of gaining a subsistence. As to all the proud objects of honorable ambition; as to everything which can ennoble your labors in your own eyes and in the eyes of others; as to the hope of ever rendering yourselves eminently useful to mankind, or gloriously distinguishing yourselves by services to your country; as to the prospect of establishing a reputation which shall live in the memory of a grateful posterity, of becoming an example which shall serve to kindle the virtues of a future generation, and of leaving a name which your children shall never hear pronounced but with a glow of honest pride and pious exultation; as to all these animating hopes and prospects, they must be by you forever relinquished. You may toil on in the humble situation where gain must be your only object; you may see honors and distinctions distributed to those around you; but you must be forever precluded from them. That profession which to your colleagues leads to the most eminent station, shall be to you an unhonored though profitable trade." '†

The eulogy pronounced by Sir S. Romilly on Mr Horner is full of the same noble sentiments, and well expresses the motives by which his own life had been guided. 'Of all the estimable qualities which distinguished his character, I consider as the most valuable that independence of mind which to him was so remarkable. It was from this feeling, and from a just sense of its importance, that at the same time that he was storing his mind with the most various knowledge on all subjects connected with our internal economy and foreign politics, and that he bore a conspicuous and most successful part in all the great questions on which it was his duty as a legislator to form or to express an opinion, he laboriously devoted himself to all the painful duties of his profession. Though his success at the bar was not at all adequate to his merits, yet he steadily persevered in his labors, and seemed to consider it as essential to his independence that he should look forward to his profession alone for the honors and emoluments to which his extraordinary talents gave him so just a claim.

'But I should very ill express what I feel upon this occasion, were I to consider the extraordinary qualities which Mr Horner possessed, apart from the ends and objects to which they were directed, The greatest eloquence is in itself but an object of vain and transient admiration. It is only when ennobled by the uses to which it is applied, when directed to great and virtuous ends,—to the protection of the oppressed, to the enfranchisment of the enslaved, to the extension of knowledge, to dispelling the clouds of ignorance and superstition, to the advancement of the best interests of the country, and to the enlarging the sphere of human happiness,—that it becomes a national benefit and a public blessing. It is because the powerful talents, of which we are now deprived, have been uniformly exerted in the pursuit and promotion of such objects, that I consider our loss as one of the greatest which in the present state of the country, we could possibly have sustained.'*

Among all the qualities which combine to form a great and powerful character, there is none more strikingly excellent than that constancy of purpose which, through difficulties and defeats, still presses onward to its object. The mind inspired and strengthened by this lofty principle regards every obstacle that would turn it from its settled purpose, not only without dismay, but with exultation, as conferring additional honor upon the struggle which it is so well prepared to sustain. Maturely weighing the means which it possesses for the accomplishment of its great designs, it finds in the strength of its own unswerving resolution the confidence and the promise of success. The misfortunes, the failures which would deter weaker minds, are turned into instruments of power; and, as difficulties multiply around, they but unite more firmly the energies before which they are destined at length to yield. A man of the most ordinary powers, animated by this principle, will perform a giant's labors; while without it the noblest intellect may expend itself in the triflings of a dwarf. Throughout the whole of his life Sir Samuel Romilly was remarkable for the earnest perseverance with which he applied himself to the accomplishment of his designs. In the various attempts which he made to improve the criminal code, his resolution was frequently put to the severest test. Opposition, neglect, ridicule, and reproach, conspired to deter him from his great and excellent purposes; but never, for a moment, made an impression upon his firm and resolute mind. In one of his speeches on the subject of the criminal law, he manifests that unbroken energy of character which, even under the pressure of defeat, never doubts of success.

'From the spirit which I have seen, I shall not be surprised, and I certainly will not be deterred, by any vote of this night. I am not so unacquainted with the nature of prejudice as not to have observed that it strikes deep root; that it flourishes in all soils, and spreads its branches in every direction. I have observed also, that, flourish as it may, it must, by laws sacred and immutable, wither and decay after the powerful and repeated touch of truth. It was my lot to hear in parliament a negative upon that bill which was intended to deliver this enlightened nation from the reproach of the cruel and disgusting punishment of burning women alive. It was my lot, again and again, to witness in this house the defeat of those wise and humane exertions which were intended to rescue Englishmen from the disgrace of abetting slavery. But the punishment of burning is no more and Africa is free. No resistance, no vote of this night, shall prevent my again appealing to the good sense and good feeling of the legislature and of the country. If I live another year, I will renew this bill, with the bill for repealing the punishment of death for stealing a few shillings; and, whatever may be my fate, the seed which is scattered has not fallen upon stony ground.'*

The sentiments of Sir Samuel Romilly on the subject of parliamentary reform are explicitly stated in the following passages:—

'I give this vote, not from any vain hope of popularity,—not from an expectation of being able to gratify those who now influence the public opinion on this subject—but from a sincere and deep-rooted conviction that some reform is necessary. I am a friend neither to universal suffrage nor to annual parliaments. I even doubt whether I am prepared to go all at once so far as to make the right of voting at elections coextensive with taxation; but for some reform, for some material change in the present system, I am, and long have been, a zealous advocate. At at an early period of my life, long before I had a seat in parliament when, from the gallery of this house I first witnessed its deliberations, and heard Mr Pitt, with all the generous ardor of youth, and with the same eloquence which distinguished his maturer age, pleading the cause of parliamentary reform, I became sensible to the necessity of that measure. The impressions which were then made on my mind have never been effaced. Subsequent reflection and observations, more particularly since I have myself become a member, have only served to confirm them.'†

*Speeches, vol. i. p. 317.
†Speeches, vol. i. p. 393.

*Speeches, vol. ii. p. 167.

*Speeches, vol. i. p. 478.
†Speeches, vol. ii. p. 193.

CHANCERY REFORM.

Instead of a reform in the practice of the Court of Chancery, which the public want, it is intended to burden the country with the expense of a new Judge in Equity, whom the public do not want. It was well observed by Mr Brougham, in the debate on the Bill relative to this subject some time since that the motion submitted to the House by Sir C. Wetherell put to the test all those persons who had hitherto professed themselves anxious for a reform in the Court of Chancery. It has done so, and Mr J. Williams, who first made himself known in the House of Commons by an elaborate speech, containing a volume of facts to prove the imperative necessity of Chancery reform, has not stood that test. He now supports a Bill, which, to use a similar phrase, 'gives the go-by' to the question of reform, and appoints an additional Judge to administer that very system which he formerly represented as being inadequate, under any Judge or number of Judges, to serve the purposes of justice, and give satisfaction to the country. Since the delivery of the speech in question Mr Williams was out of Parliament for a time, and one would think he had taken advantage of his interval of political leisure to dip in that 'Bethesda' which cures patriotic lawyers of the fever of reform, and makes them treat their own former statements of intolerable abuses as the wild fictions of a diseased imagination! In allusion to the miraculous change which has been wrought in the opinions of the Learned Gentleman, Mr R. Grant rather sarcastically remarked that 'the memory of the Learned and Honorable Member bad slumbered while he had been absent from the House, and that he had taken no note of the progress of time while he had been away. The House, however, was not equally oblivious of him, and he might be assured no one was forgetful of a man who had so ably and so fearlessly done so much for the cause of legal reform.' The change, or conversion, or cure, or whatever it is to be called, of the Chancery reformer, excited no less astonishment in Mr Brougham, who said 'He was not a little surprised at the course taken that evening by his Honorable and Learned Friend, whom he might now call his successor for Winchelsea, and whose celerity in running after and detecting abuses on former occasions was only to be equalled by the speed with which he seemed anxious to run away from them now. His Hon. and Learned Friend, who from long experience, perfectly understood both sides of the question, told the House that they ought not to burden judicial officers with business, any more than other persons, to a degree beyond their powers. This course of argument was very new to his Learned Friend, who now, for the first time, discovered that the Chancery Judges were worked too severely!'—At the period when Mr Williams thought the Chancery Judges, like schoolboys in holiday time, had 'all play and no work,' Lord Eldon was in office. Censure was then unsparingly heaped both on the Lord Chancellor and the system of the Courts over which he presided; yet it is admitted that there never sat in the High Court of Chancery an abler Judge, and one more profoundly acquainted with the principles of Equity, than Lord Eldon—and since his time the system has undergone no reformation. What then is there to excite the praise of those who never before alluded to this department of Westminster Hall but in tones of the bitterest condemnation? We believe the present Lord Chancellor to be as just and impartial a Judge as any of his great predecessors, but he has certainly disappointed those who were sincerely anxious for a reform of the Chancery system by not redeeming the pledge which he gave, soon after his nomination to the Great Seal to submit himself a plan of effectual reform to Parliament. 'In 1827,' said Mr Brougham, 'the Lord Chancellor, shortly after his accession to office, pledged himself to effect reform, and seemed only desirous to obtain time for the purpose. "Give me," said he, "but a little time, but one season, and I pledge my reputation—I pledge myself on the faith of Parliament, on the faith of the Court of Chancery, and of the practitioners in that Court—that I will mature a plan for securing the discharge of all the business expeditiously and accurately." Such was the pledge of the Lord Chancellor. Well: they gave him not one year, but three; and during the lapse of that time, no change was thought of, no reform agitated by him.' To us it appears very unaccountable that the Lord Chancellor, even supposing he were not bound by any promise, should not undertake or encourage a thorough reform of the Chancery system, as all the delay and vexation which the unreformed system occasions are sure to be visited on himself in public opinion, as was the case with Lord Eldon. It is the interest of a Judge that the machinery of his Court should work well, and to the public satisfaction, otherwise it is impossible to prevent its having an injurious effect on his judicial reputation. We perfectly agree with Mr Harvey, that all the defects of the Court of Chancery, numerous and appalling as they were, were attributable, not to the Lord Chancellor, but to the system over which he presides; and we also agree with him that Lord Lyndhurst has been guilty of a strange inconsistency in abandoning, as Lord Chancellor, those propositions for the reform of the Court of Chancery which he advocated as Master of the Rolls. The ruinous delay and expense which suitors have to encounter in the Court, as at present constituted, is a cause of complaint which every body has either felt or heard.

As to the serious questions of real property, we admit that some part of the delay may be attributable to subtle refinements and metaphysical distinctions, connected with the doctrines of contingent remainders, executory devises, &c; and also to the modern absurd mode of conveyancing, which is as intricate and voluminous as it was formerly clear, concise, and simple; but such defects in the law cannot account for a Chancery suit being carried on, as it sometimes is, for two or three successive generations. Mr Cooper, in his treatise on the Court of Chancery, states that if a legatee entitled to 10,000*l.* under a will have the misfortune to have the testamentary disposition questioned, and that he get an adjudication in his case in eight years, he may consider himself a fortunate man! A delay of so many years in a case like this can only arise from the system of the Court being so constructed as necessarily to produce delay, and make suitors feel that 'sickness of the heart which ariseth from hope deferred.' This delay, in many cases, operates to the suitor as a denial of justice—death or ruin may overtake him before the decree is pronounced, and, as far as he is concerned, the fullest vindication of his right in the end cannot repair the mischief already suffered from the law's delay. The present Bill, it is said, will give relief to the Chancellor; but Mr Brougham asked 'Why should they now give relief to the Chancellor, when they ought to begin with giving relief to the suitors? Let the relief to the Chancellor at least go pari passu with that to the unhappy victims of his jurisdiction.' One cause of the delay in this Court is the payment of fees for judicial services proportionate to the prolixity of the proceedings, which Mr Brougham rightly describes as 'a defeat to justice—a bribe to delay.' Much of the procrastination also arises from the manner in which the Master's office is executed, who, as the same Learned and Hon. Gentleman observed, has all the characteristics of a Judge except his responsibility. Certainly, without corresponding responsibility, no such power as a Master in Chancery exercises ought to be intrusted to any man—'sitting in silence and the dark—seeing no one but the suitors who appeared before him—with no public to watch him—no newspaper to report his proceedings—solving the problem, not how he could expedite justice to the suitor, but how he could get his own salary.' These things, and others justly complained of in the Chancery system, must be remedied by a very different sort of Bill from that at present before the House of Commons.—London Morning Herald.

ENGLISH CASES.

PREROGATIVE COURT.—JUNE.

Before Sir John Nicholl.

Chandless vs. Howe.

Concluded.

Mr Wilson gave an account of all the circumstances attending the making of these codicils and deposed to the expressions of the deceased at the time, to the effect that she would leave the whole 6,000*l.* to Mrs E. Chandless, who had been always her best friend, and not to Mr Rowe, who had never been a brother to her, and who hated the very name of Chandless. This proved that the testatrix was perfectly rational at the time, with mind, memory, and understanding, all complete. There was the evidence of Mr Bennet also, who attested the will; so that, taking the whole account together, unless it was all bottomed in fiction and perjury, there could be no doubt as to the competence of the deceased at the time of her giving Mr Wilson instructions to make these codicils. If further proof of her capacity was wanting, it might be found in the fact of her revoking the bequest to Mr Wilmer, to whom she had taken a dislike; and also in the fact, that, though she revoked the legacies she left by the will to Captain and Mrs Smith, she did not revoke the legacy to their child, Master Smith, who was her godson. Mr Wilson, it was also to be remembered, was corroborated in his statement by the evidence of a Mr Robson, who had no interest whatever in the case, for he derived no legacy nor benefit under the will. Against all this is set up a case of incapacity on the part of the testatrix, and of fraudulent influence on the part of Mrs Chandless. This was only supported by Mr Wilmer and the cook Miller. On the 14th of May, Mr Wilmer wrote to Mr Rowe at Brighton, giving a description of the state of the deceased. This was the day after the last codicil was executed, but whether that fact had transpired or not, was left entirely to be surmised. Mr Rowe immediately came to town, and visited his sister. She died on the 17th, rather suddenly, and a few days after the will was read. Mr Rowe was present, and though he expressed his disappointment at its provisions, though not his dissatisfaction as to its validity. A few days afterwards a suggestion came from some quarter that the deceased had died by poison, and on the Sunday following there was a post-mortem examination, in consequence of this suggestion. Dr Davis, who had attended her for some days prior to her death, attended, when the body was opened by Mr Henry Earl and Mr Bennett, the anatomist, when it appeared, after the most careful investigation, that there was no appearance whatever of poison in the stomach. Dr Davis was of opinion that the disorder was not delirium tremens, and an opinion that she was laboring under that disorder could not have been entertained, or surely her head would have been opened in order to ascertain the fact. Notwithstanding this investigation, Mr Rowe had been induced to set up an allegation, containing various imputations against Mrs Chandless, which appeared to be wholly groundless. Indeed if it had not been for the disinterested conduct of Mrs Chandless, it appeared as if the deceased had an inclination to go further, and take from her brother his life interest in the houses, which she left him by the will itself. As to her being under undue control, she appeared to be of a temper by no means likely to submit to control of any kind. The grounds of opposition, therefore, were not only in the opinion of the Court unfounded, but insinuations were thrown out of a most unwarrantable nature against Mrs Chandless. Although, therefore, Mr Rowe stood before the Court in the favorable situation of next of kin, and of a disappointed brother, yet he chose to throw out the most cruel insinuations, and at the same time, as appeared by the evidence, the most unfounded; and the Court, in pronouncing for the validity of the codicils, felt bound to condemn him also in the costs of the suit. Parties should take care how they put in bitter interrogatories. They were always dangerous weapons, for the party against whom imputations were thus thrown had no notice, and of course were unable always to repel them. The Court, considering how little founded was the opposition, and the manner also in which it had been conducted, felt bound, however reluctant, to condemn Mr Rowe, though next of kin, in the costs of the suit.

---

ROLLS COURT—JUNE.

Bull vs. Johns.

Mr Bickersteth, for the plaintiff—This was a bill filed to obtain the opinion of the Court upon the true construction of the will of Mrs Polly Bull, of Cheltenham. The will having commenced thus. 'This is the last will and testament of me, Polly Bull,' proceeded to direct the payment of the debts of the testratrix and certain legacies, and then devised the residue in trust for the children of her elder brother, John Bull, and the children of Mary M'Cormick Johns, to be divided amongst them at the age of 21 years; until which time she desired that 'not one penny should be laid out on their board or education.' Now Mary M'Cormick Johns was one of the children (a married daughter) of John Bull; and it happened that both those persons had children born to them subsequent to the death of Mrs Polly Bull, the testatrix. From hence arose the ambiguities which occasioned this bill; the first of which was whether Mrs Johns was to take as one of the children of John Bull; and, secondly whether the children born after the testatrix's death, should come in for a share with their brothers and sisters.

Mr Tinney contended, in opposition to the latter, that the bequest to the children was confined to a particular class, in whom alone it would rest at the time of the death of the testatrix.

Mr Garret opposed this construction, on the authority of the case of Leake vs. Robinson, in 2 Merrivale, from which he concluded that the Court always was glad to take advantage of such ambiguous language in a will as that in dispute, to open to all the children the advantages which otherwise would be partially conferred. Against the claim of Mrs M'Cormick Johns, he submitted that the testatrix only contemplated such children of John Bull as, from their youth, required maintenance and education, and that 'a married woman was a person requiring neither board nor education.'

Other Learned Gentlemen followed on the same points.

His Honor said it was quite plain that it had not been the intention of the testatrix that Mrs Johns should take with the other children of J. Bull, since she speaks of them as requiring board and education until 21. There was no expression in the will to enable a Court to conclude that the interest given by the will was not to vest at the death of the testatrix. He was therefore of opinion that Mrs M'Cormick Johns was excluded from the benefit conferred by this part of the will, and that the interests of the children vested at the death of Mrs Polly Bull.

---

Notes of Judgments pronounced by the Hon. Chief Justice Reid, in the Court of Appeals, sitting for the hearing of Appeals from the District of Quebec, the 17th November, 1830.

Montgomery, App. vs. Executors of D. David, Resps.

This was an action of debt instituted by the Appellant as Executor of the last will and testament of the late M. M'Clure, against Francis and William Hunter, as co-partners, on their Notarial obligation dated 1st June, 1811. In consequence of an execution sued out on the judgment rendered against the Defendants in the cause, several lots of land the property of the said co-partnership were seized and sold. An opposition was filed by the Respondents, Executors of the late D. David, claiming the moneys levied, founded on a Notarial obligation executed by Francis Hunter, one of the Defendants, individually on the 7th Nov. 1794, which had been assigned to the said D. David. It was considered by the Court of K. B. that there being a priority of mortgage in favor of D. David, it would attach upon the property of the partnership which had been seized and sold uuder the execution sued out in this cause, and thereupon the Court below adjudged the moneys levied to the Respondents.

But it was held by this Court that partnership property was not liable to the payment of the debts of individual partners—nor could a partner have any separate disposable interest in the partnership property over which his creditors could exercise any control until it had been first ascertained what was the separate interest of that partner in the partnership concern, after the debts were paid. The judgment of the Court of King's Bench was therefore reversed, and the moneys levied, ordered to be paid over to the Appellant.

---

Paterson et al, Apells. and McCallum et al, Resps.

In this case the Appellants and several others, had sued out writs of execution against the lands and tenements of John McCallum, by virtue whereof several lots of land were seized and sold, belonging to him in the Township of Tring, held in free and common soccage. The Respondents, as assignees of one James Thompson, claimed a balance due to them on Notarial obligation, bearing date 27th Nov. 1816, granted by James McCallum, the former proprietor of the lots of land, in consequence of the hypotheque or mortgage, which by virtue of the said obligation it was contended attached thereon.

It was considered by the Court of King's Bench, that the claim of the Respondents was well founded, and the balance of moneys levied was awarded to them. But the Court here held, that the Notarial obligation in question, could be considered only as evidence of a debt, but could create no mortgage upon lands held in free and common soccage. That by the statute 14, Geo. 3, chap. 83, it was declared that lands of this description, then granted, or thereafter to be granted by His Majesty, his heirs and successors, should not be governed by, or be subject to the laws of Canada, touching civil rights, which necessarily implied, that such lands should be subject only to the laws of England, as the law regulating the other domains of the Crown—And to settle all the doubts and differences of opinion which are said to have arisen on this subject, the declaratory act of the 6th Geo. 3, chap. 50, has confirmed this interpretation of the above statute—That a Notarial obligation executed under the laws of Canada, stipulating in general terms a mortgage on the lands of the debtor, cannot create a mortgage on lands in free and common soccage, as according to the laws of England, a mortgage is considered to be a conveyance of lands by a debtor to his creditor as a pledge or security for the payment of money due with a proviso, that such conveyance shall be void, when that payment is made. This conveyance is in the nature of a sale executed, and must have all the properties and qualities incidental to the validity of an absolute disposition. The Court therefore reversed the Judgment of the Court of King's Bench, and ordered that the record should be remitted for further proceeding.

---

Fournier, Appellant, and Oliva, Respondent.

This was an action by the Appellant, Plaintiff in the Court of King's Bench, against the Respondent en complainte, for having trespassed on the Plaintiff's land, and erected on the front thereof, adjoining the River Vase, a certain fence, to the damage of the Plaintiff ten pounds, with the usual conclusions. The Respondent pleaded the general issue. It appeared, that to a certain extent, the river bounding the front of the Appellant's land, was a navigable river, and that in the place where the fence was erected, the ordinary tides came nearly to the bottom of the pickets, but that the highest tides rose nearly to the top of the pickets—that the Appellant and his predecessors had for 30 years and upwards been in the possession of the land where this fence was erected, and had usually cut hay upon it. The Court of King's Bench dismissed the action, considering the place where the fence was erected to be public property in which the Appellant could have no right of possession to entitle him to maintain his action. But this Court held that the Appellant was entitled to maintain his action—that the banks of navigable rivers belong to the persons whose lands adjoin those rivers, subject however to the servitude to all his Majesty's subjects the free communication with the river for all public or useful purposes. That by the Roman law the banks of navigable rivers belonged to the proprietors of the lands adjoining such rivers, and previous to the Ordinance of 1669 no statutory Law in France to the contrary could be found—but it was held by some writers, on the interpretation of this Ordinance, that as a road of 24 feet was thereby reserved on the banks of navigable rivers for public purposes, to this extent the bank of the river was to be considered as public property and vested in the Crown, but this opinion had been controverted by so many other writers of greater weight that the Court could not hesitate in rejecting it—and therefore they reversed the Judgment of the Court of King's Bench and entered Judgment for the Appellant.

---

Routier & al, Appellants, and Robitaille, Resp.

This was an action instituted by the Respondent in the Court of King's Bench against the Appellants, en delivrance de legs under the last Will and testimony of the late Frans. Bonneville, the Respondent's husband. The Appellants filed an inscription en faux against the Will, as not having been made and executed in the manner prescribed by law for a testament solemnel and in the manner certified by the Notary in whose possession the minute was deposited. In support of the moyens de faux several witnesses were adduced by the Appellants, and among others, the two Notaries before whom the Will was made—The Respondent, as well as the Notaries themselves objected to their being examined touching the validity of the Act which they had executed as public officers—but the objection was over-ruled and they were examined. The Court of King's Bench however considered that the Will had been regularly made, and rejected the inscription en faux. The Court confirmed the Judgment of the Court of King's Bench but held that according to the decisions under the Law of the Country, the Notaries could not be examined as witnesses, and that as public officers they could not by law be compelled to give evidence to controvert the truth of what they had certified as such touching the execution of any Act passed before them.

---

ADMINISTRATION OF THE LAWS.

Next to the making of good laws, the administering them, in such a manner as to obtain the confidence of the people, is the first object of a wise Government. It is not enough to put a good law on the Statute-book; to devise the means of effectually carrying it into execution is a no less important part of the duties of the Legislature. The benefit of an excellent system of laws may be counteracted by an injudicious mode of reducing them to practice; in which case the disrespect which the people are led to entertain for the administration of justice will attach to the laws themselves. This has long been exemplified in England, where good laws are brought into disrepute by one of the worst systems of practice ever invented. When we speak of good laws we allude only to the civil jurisprudence of the country, for the criminal code is a reproach to a civilized age; nor do we mean to say that our civil system might not be improved; but what we do assert is, that the laws which govern civil actions are, in general, founded on just and wise principles, and yet are so administered as frequently to appear neither wise nor just. What does this arise from? The practice of the Courts where fiction and form are allowed a most dangerous latitude in defeating substantial justice, and pleadings are so framed as to serve little purpose but to add to the delay, prolixity, and expense of legal proceedings. A judicious and sound administration of the laws would make justice equally accessible to the rich and the poor; but the practice of our Courts is eminently calculated to operate as a denial of justice to all but those who can afford to purchase the luxuries of life, of which law is one of the most costly. It is, indeed, a maxim of our law that there is no wrong without a remedy; but the practice of our Courts makes it too often advisable for those whose means are not very abundant to put up with the wrong rather than go to the ruinous expense of purchasing the remedy. Justice, as well as gold, may be bought too dear. For more than a hundred years past there have been various attempts made to reform the administration of the laws, by making its process cheap and expeditious, but, unhappily, without effect. Public opinion has at length become so loud and urgent upon this subject, that Government has thought it expedient to hold out promises of reform from time to time, and at length to pledge the word of a King in confirmation of such promises, in a speech from the Throne. Government have, however, submitted nothing to the Legislature yet in the nature of a plan for the reformation of justice. Certainly, neither the Bill for appointing a new Judge in Equity, nor that for appointing three new Common Law Judges, and for demolishing the Welch Jurisdiction, which dispensed justice on cheaper and more expeditious terms to the natives of Wales than they can obtain it under the English system, are to be considered as measures of legal reform. The only measure which has been heard of in Parliament this Session for the purpose of diminishing the delay and expense of law, and making justice more accessible to those whose means are limited, is the Bill of Mr Brougham, who, in the midst of his many and arduous professional and Parliamentary labors, has undertaken a task which the Government was pledged to perform, and which, as far as we are acquainted with the outline of it, we think he has executed in a manner which ought to cause it to be put to the test of practice without delay. The Hon. and Learned Member does not ask, in the first instance, to make it a general measure; but as every innovation, however good it may seem a priori, requires the confirmation which experience alone can give to theory, he proposes that it should be first tried in two parts of the kingdom, remote from each other; and then, if it answer the public expectation, the provisions of the Bill can be extended to other places, as soon as the limits of each juridical district shall have been defined. A Bill, the object of which is to afford the means of trying causes at as little expense, and with as little delay and inconvenience as possible to the suitors, must be admitted to be framed upon a principle which, if efficiently reduced to practice, must entitle its learned author to the gratitude of his country. We stated on a former occasion that the old county courts, before our Saxon institutions were broken down to erect upon their ruins the Norman innovations of the feudal system, were so contrived and administered as to bring home justice to every man's door. The District courts proposed by Mr Brougham's Bill are a different sort of institution from what the county courts formerly were, yet the principle is, to a certain extent, the same. In the county courts, indeed, the civil, criminal, and ecclesiastical jurisdiction were originally combined, but the district courts are not to have cognizance of any criminal business, nor are they to interfere with the ecclesiastical courts, any farther than by being empowered to try certain cases of legacies. The Judge, who must be a Sergeant-at-Law, or a Barrister of 10 years' standing, and is to be called the Judge in Ordinary, is to sit once a month, to try all such causes as are set down for trial in different parts of the district. The jurisdiction of his court will extend to the cognizance of all actions where the defendant resides within the district, and the cause of action, if on a debt, does not exceed one hundred pounds—or on a tort fifty pounds, and where title to real estate, tithe, or by bankruptcy, or to toll, market, or other franchise, does not come into question; but it may try all actions at law of all kinds, and to any amount by consent of parties. It will have authority to try, in a summary way, small debts, not exceeding five pounds, under similar restrictions, as to titles to real estates, &c, as in the case of actions to a larger amount. The claims of legacy coming within its jurisdiction are to be limited to 100*l.* which will save much expense and vexation to persons entitled to small legacies, and who are obliged to abandon their claims, or proceed for them according to the expensive and tedious process of the ecclesiastical courts. Besides these powers, the district courts will have authority to try all matters at law or in equity, by way of arbitration, the parties consenting. This provision may prevent many a chancery suit, which might end in the ruin even of the victorious party. They will also have authority to hear and advise on all disputes, by consent of parties with a view to reconcilement—an excellent provision calculated to prevent much litigation, both at law and equity. One of the greatest improvements, however, contemplated by this Bill, is the introduction of a plain, short, simple mode of pleading—just what is necessary to make the matters in dispute intelligible, and bring the points to be tried fairly in issue, and nothing more; thus making law and common sense mutually assist each other, without any disgraceful fictions, sham pleas, or expensive technicality, to convert justice into an engine of rapacity and oppression. It should also be mentioned that, by consent of parties, a Jury may be dispensed with. But not only are sham pleas and unnecessary length of pleading prohibited, but the Judge has the discretionary power, in cases of prolixity and misstatement of facts in the pleadings, of ordering attorneys to pay the costs out of their own pockets. It is likely that, under such a system, fiction and surplusage will be altogether extirpated, as they can no longer be a source of profit to the practitioners in the law. In most cases the superior courts will have a power of revising the decisions of the district courts; and any matter tried before the Judge in Ordinary, whether of law or fact, may be revised by the Judges of Assize; and the sentence of the Judge in Ordinary, or verdict of the Jury, may be set aside, and a new trial ordered by the same Judges. Powers are also given, under certain restrictions, to both the Judge in Ordinary and Judges of Assize, to reserve points, and order cases for the opinion of the courts in Westminster Hall. Such are the principal features of the Bill, which will shortly, we expect, come before Parliament more in detail. It is our opinion, taking it altogether, that it is the best plan that has been proposed in modern times for making justice accessible to the humbler classes of society, and cutting down the ruinous expense and delay, which, where small sums were disputed, or minor grievances were to be redressed, made justice always difficult, and frequently unattainable. We therefore wish that the state of public affairs may not deprive the country of the opportunity of seeing it put to the proof of experience at the close of the present session.—London Morning Herald.

---

COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL.

A great defect in the administration of justice in England is the want of a Court of Criminal Appeal. In this respect the rights of property are more strictly guarded against the consequences of ignorance, passion, or inadvertence, in the tribunals that decide upon cases in the first instance, than life itself. This ought not to be so. The life of the poor man ought at least to be as sacred in the eyes of the law as the property of the rich. There is no appeal from the tribunals of criminal justice, by which the doom of a convict is first pronounced, to any superior Court; while there is more than one appeal in cases of property, of which he who has the pecuniary means to enable him to protract litigation may avail himself; as, for instance, from the inferior Courts in Equity to the Court of Chancery, and from the latter to the House of Lords. Likewise from the Courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas and Exchequer, to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and from that to the House of Lords, which is in questions of property, the Court of Appeal in the last resort. New trials are also granted, sometimes as many as two or three, before a claim of property is finally decided—so tender is the law of every valuable possession of the subject, with the exception of liberty and life! It is true that in cases of misdemeanor, where the punishment is less penal than in cases of felony, a new trial is occasionally granted, but in capital charges a new trial is never heard of. In such cases, indeed, a point of law may, if the Judge pleases, be reserved for the consideration of the twelve Judges, before whom it receives the most considerate attention: but it forms no part of the duty of this tribunal to go into the merits of the case; so that if the technical point, upon being nicely scrutinized and examined by the assembled Judges, be not in favor of the convict, anything that in the eye of reason throws suspicion on the evidence, or tends to impeach the accuracy of the verdict, cannot avail him, because the twelve Judges can only determine points of form and questions of law, but must take the facts according to the evidence and the finding of the Jury. Frequently has it happened that the lives of poor and friendless men have been sacrificed by perjured witnesses for the sake of the reward, or what is vulgarly called the blood money; and a memorable instance occurred a few years ago in the city of London, when four men, who were convicted on such evidence, would have been executed but for the praiseworthy exertions of one individual, who brought the conspiracy to light. Others have been executed under similar circumstances, and the foul contrivance to perpetrate judicial murder for the sake of gain only discovered when it was too late to repair the dreadful consequences. Of this we could give a remarkable case from the books, if space would allow. But it may be asked has not the Secretary of State for the Home Department the power to investigate every capital case regularly brought under his cognizance, and, if he finds cause, can he not recommend the convict to his Majesty's mercy? Undoubtedly he has this power; but, instead of this being an argument against establishing a Court of Criminal Appeal, it only proves the necessity of it. We have the twelve Judges to examine points of law reserved at the trial; and we have one of the Ministers of the Crown, who, as constituting a part of the Executive Government, ought not to have any right of interference in judicial matters, to examine into matters of fact; or, in other words, to investigate the merits of the case when it is the opinion of the Judge who tried it that it requires revision. If this be not a second trial of the case it is nothing; and if it be a second trial, it ought not to be heard in secret and upon irresponsible evidence by a Minister of the crown, but it ought to be regularly tried in open court as is the case in the French Courts of Criminal Appeal, by competent Judges, that the confirmation of the guilt or vindication of the innocence of the party who is the subject of the appeal, might clearly appear. If the administration of justice is to be reformed, this anomalous power of the Secretary of State ought to be superseded by a responsible and competent judicial authority.—London Morning Herald.

---

An Excellent Law.—The Vermont Legislature after a session of five weeks adjourned sine die. A law was passed at this session, authorizing insolvent debtors to take the poor debtor's oath immediately upon the rendition of judgment.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1830.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENTS.

'I shall ask for the abolition of death—until I have the infallibility of human judgment demonstrated to me. The punishment of death has always inspired me with feelings of horror.'—[LAFAYETTE, on the proposition of M. De Tracy in the Chamber of Deputies.

At a court lately held in Middlesex County, of twelve jurors selected to try a capital case, three made oath that they could not conscientiously find a verdict of guilty in any capital case short of murder. They were accordingly excused from serving in that case. These feelings are gaining ground in this Community, and the time apparently cometh when it will be difficult to find men who will be willing to take upon them the responsibilities of such offices. Many of our best citizens cannot feel assured that the regulations and enactments of civil government will discharge them of individual responsibilities. They feel that there are cases where no human institutions can justify the infliction of capital punishment. There are such cases in the English penal code. Few, if any men here, can be made to believe that the counterfeiting of a one pound note, or the commission of a petty larceny can justify such a sentence. The English nation feel it to be so. The voice of public opinion declares it to be so.—Humanity, religion, philanthrophy join it and give the aid of their principles. The tables of Legislation there, groan under the weight of the Petitions, Remonstrances and Prayers of the nation for an amelioration of their penal laws. Juries will not convict—men will not prosecute—witnesses cannot be obtained. In 1828, of four hundred persons indicted for forgery, only ninetynine were convicted and but a part of those executed.

Experience proves that there are fewer crimes here than in England;—and that there are quite as few, in those states where there are the smallest number of capital punishments as in others.

In most of the United States there are not more than 8 or 10 capital offences, and in some of them not more than 2 or 3; while in England, until a recent Act, there were two or three hundred. The removal, of late years, of the terror of death has not been followed by an increase of crime. The laws have been invigorated by such a relaxation of their severity. 'Experience has confirmed the great axioms, which speculative philosophers and practical moralists had long ago inculcated—namely—that capital punishments rarely hinder the commission of crime—but prevent its detection.' Many crimes are now more frequent in England than they were before the punishment of death was annexed to them. Besides, there should be a just proportion between punishment and crimes. The punishment should be in proportion to the moral turpitude of the offence. Montesquieu remarks that, it is an essential point that there should be a certain proportion in punishments; because it is essential that a great crime should be avoided rather than a lesser: and that which is more pernicious to society rather than that which is less. It is a great abuse to condemn to the same punishment a person that only robs on the highway and another that robs and murders. Surely for the public security, some difference should be made in the punishment.

In China, those who add murder to robbery are cut to pieces, but not so the others. To this difference it is owing that 'though they rob, in that country, yet they never murder. In Russia, where the punishment is the same they always murder. The dead, they say, tell no tales. In England they never murder on the highway, because robbers have some hope of transportation, which is never the case in respect to those who commit murder.'

The indignation at the crime should always exceed the public compassion produced by the punishment.

Penal laws should never violate the distinctions of moral guilt.

What coincidence is there between the moral turpitude of many of the crimes, made capital by our laws, and that of murder? And yet the boy of fifteen, who assaults his companion with a deadly weapon and robs from his person the smallest article, is sentenced to the same scaffold with him, who hires to be done, and who aids and abets in the perpetration of the blackest midnight assassination. And the offender who commits an aggravated trespass upon the person, perishes, under the same condemnation, with him who imbrues his hands in the blood of his victim. Is there no difference in Law or morals between the crimes? Do they cry with equal voice, for the retributions of divine and human Laws?

Whatever Legislatures may do, men will judge of crimes by other standards. They will not in this day, respect or give aid to a 'vindictive system of laws, which attempts the suppression of crimes by a violation of those moral distinctions, which are as firmly established by God and nature, as the foundations of the Universe.'

---

Our friend of the Newburyport Herald entirely mistakes our motives in supposing we had any intention of being 'facetious' with him on the subject of an exchange of Papers. As we did not receive his paper we had pretty good reason for supposing the 'declining' to be on the other side. We assure him, however, that we shall be glad to send him our little 'Law paper' weekly, in return for the Herald, which is conducted with considerable ability, and to which we are indebted for several kind words and wishes heretofore. Touching the matter of the List of Lawyers, to which he refers; it is just as we supposed it would be; the shrewd ones will take our idea without any formal promises, or ceremonious annunciation of our plan.

We intend to insert, in our List, the names of all those who patronize our Paper, and such others as may seem to us meet and proper. We shall not forget, next quarter, to add one to the number of the Newburyport 'candidates for professional business.' Many of our brethren, we have reason to think, will be gratified by being thus noticed, and we hope benefited thereby; and none will have any just cause to complain.

---

George Custis, Esq. has been appointed Attorney General of the State of Louisiana.

---

ADVERTISEMENT.

A gentleman in the city, who has been seven or eight years in practice, and can furnish the best recommendations, would be glad to connect himself with some person of advanced standing and full business in the profession, as a partner or otherwise, on reasonable terms.—Address to A. B., at this office, with real name.

Dec. 4, 1830.

This day received by GRAY & BOWEN, 141 Washington Street.

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW, No XXV. for July 1830.

Contents: 1, The Ballot: 2, Carwell: 3, Government of Lower Canada: 4, Wilson's life of Daniel de Foe: 5, Greek Lexicons: 6, Physiology and Cultivation of Trees: 7, Game of Life: 8, Dobell's Siberia: 9, Bishop of London and Sabbath Breaking: 10, Three Courses and a Dessert: 11, Clarendon: 12, Moorsom's Nova Scotia: 13, Religious Disabilities: 14, Stamp Act and Synod of Somerset House: 15, Patronage of Art, and the President of the Royal Academy: 16, Distress of the Country: 17, Egyptian Notation: 18, Great Britain and France: Postscript to the Article on the Ballot.

The Westminster Review has existed long enough, to see the cause in which its efforts were begun, make a notable advance in the opinions of mankind. Its proposed object was to prove, that the interests which were supposed confined to the wretched and weak, are in reality those of all ranks and orders in the state; and if the course has been successfully shaped, it is unnecessary to discuss what portion of the progress has been consequent on the efforts of the rowers, and what on the general tide which carried them upon their way. The term which was once employed as a name of low reproach, has found its way into high places, and is gone forth as the title of a class, who glory in their designation, and are not afraid to speak with their enemies in the gate. Like the early Christians, they may say to their opponents—Hesterni sumus, et vestra omnia implevimus, urbes, insulas, castella, municipa, concilabula, castra ipsa, tribus, decurias, palatium, senatum, forum.—They cannot even add the Sola vobis, relinquimus templa. What has been gained by reason, will never be wittingly abused; and it will be fame enough for common men, if what they have hitherto defended they hereafter can assist. Oct. 23.

---

DANE'S ABRIDGMENT OF AMERICAN LAW, in 9 vols. with an appendix. A few complete sets for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. H., G. & Co. will also supply the ninth vol. and the appendix to those who are owners of the eight volumes, and the appendix separate to those who have the ninth. Oct. 23.

---

ENGLISH LAW BOOKS. This day received and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & Co.

Browne's Chancery Practice, under the New Orders with the Sanction of the Court, in 2 vols. 8 vo.

Willoch on the Laws of the Medical Profession, 1 vol. 8 vo.

Finelly's Law and Practice of Elections, 1 vol. 12 mo.

Crabbe's History of the English Law, 1 vol. 8 vo.

Oct. 23.

---

PRINTING. The Printing House of I. R. BUTTS, corner of Washington and School Streets, is supplied with materials suitable for Book, Job, and every other description of Printing. Oct. 23.

---

DISTRICT OF MASSACHUSETTS, TO WIT: District Clerk's Office.

BE it remembered, that on the seventeenth day of August, A. D. 1830, in the fifty-fifth year of the Independence of the United States of America, Lewis Bigelow of the said district, has deposited in this office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as author in the words following, to wit:

'A Digest of Pickering's Reports, volumes II.—VII., being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law.'

In conformity to the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned;' and also to an act entitled, 'An act supplementary to an act, entitled, 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned,' and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints.'

JNO. W. DAVIS, Clerk of the District of Massachusetts.

---

GRAY AND BOWEN, No. 141, Washington Street, Boston, have recently published the following valuable works.

I. A DESCRIPTION OF TREMONT HOUSE; WITH ARCHITECTURAL ILLUSTRATIONS.—4to.

'Jam scires ab introitu primo—herculentum et amvenum videre et diversonium.' APULEIUS, M. A V.

This work is embellished with a copper-plate engraving, representing the front of the house, and thirty lithographic prints, exhibiting the details of the structure. Its object will be understood by the following extract from the preface.

'The present publication is intended to satisfy a curiosity, which frequent inquiries for a description of Tremont House were supposed to indicate.

'Its original plan was to furnish such particulars relative to this establishment as strangers might wish to possess, but it has been extended so as to comprehend many architectural details, which will probably be interesting to mechanics; as much of the ornamental work of Tremont House was copied or adopted from books, not commonly in their hands, and has not before been executed in this country.

II. AN EPITOME OF UNIVERSAL GEOGRAPHY; or, a Description of the various Countries of the Globe; with a view of their Political Condition at the present time. With sixty Maps. By NATHAN HALE.

III. A DICTIONARY OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE; or, an Explanation of Words and Things connected with all the Arts and Sciences. Illustrated with numerous Wood Cuts. By GEORGE CRABB, A. M., Author of 'English Synonymes,' 'Technological Dictionary,' and 'Historical Dictionary.'

IV. THE VESTAL—A TALE OF POMPEII. 1 Vol. 12mo.

'Oh Time, thou beautifier of the dead,
Adorner of the ruin.' CHILDE HAROLD.

V. AUTHORSHIP. A Tale. By a New Englander over Sea. 1 Vol. 12mo.

VI. AN ORATION; Delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, Cambridge, Mass. August 26th, 1830. By the Rev. ORVILLE DEWEY.

VII. THE DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Published under the Direction of the President of the United States, from the Original Manuscripts in the Department of State, conformably to a resolution of Congress, of March 27, 1818. Edited by JARED SPARKS.

This important Correspondence, now for the first time published, will form eleven volumes. Eight are already published and the remainder will appear very shortly.

VIII. JEFFERSON'S WORKS, In four Volumes. Accompanied with a Portrait on steel, and a fac-simile of the original draft of the Declaration of Independence. Second Edition.

IX. THE NEW TESTAMENT, conformed to Griesbach's Text. 1 Vol. 12mo.

THE TOKEN, a Christmas and New Year's Present, for 1831. Edited by S. G. Goodrich.

'Then take my flower, and let its leaves
Beside thy heart be cherished bear.
While that confiding heart receives
The thought it whispers to thine ear.'

The engravings for the Token of this year are executed by Cheney, Ellis, Gallaudet, and others; among the contributors are Dewey, Greenwood, Miss Sedgwick, Mrs Sigourney, Hall, Peabody, Wetmore, author of a Year in Spain, author of Tales of the Northwest, Neal, Thatcher, Mrs Hale, and others of the first reputation.

The work is larger than heretofore, and is done up in splendid embossed morocco. The literary department is considered decidedly superior to the former years, and in all respects it has received the greatest care and attention. Oct 23.

---

BIGELOW'S SUPPLEMENT. HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. have just published A Digest of Pickering's Reports, Volumes 2—7, being a Supplement to the Digest of the previous volumes of the Massachusetts Reports.—By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law. Oct. 23.

---

PICKERING'S REPORTS, Vol. 8th. This day published and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. Oct. 23.

---

THE PROBATE DIRECTORY. Just received and for sale by GRAY & BOWEN, The Probate Directory: or a Complete System of Forms for the use of Probate Courts, and those who transact business therein: together with Directions for proceeding in the various stages of administering and settling Estates, according to the laws of New Hampshire; and containing also, the substance of the Probate Laws of Massachusetts and Vermont, and adapted to the practice in those States. By a Counsellor at Law. Price $1,25.

---

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. This day published by HILLIARD, GRAY, & Co. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law: being a continuation of the Digest of Massachusetts Reports; and also a continuation of Metcalf's Digest of the same work. Neatly bound in Sheep, 3,50.—Calf, $4,00

---

LAW BOOKS.—HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. 134 Washington Street, have on hand a large Stock of American and English Law Books, comprising a complete assortment of the best editions of all works in general use. They also purchase and sell second hand Law Books—terms liberal.

H., G. & Co. supply any volumes that may be wanted of Massachusetts or Pickering's Reports.

---

HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. No 134 Washington Street, Boston, have in press a Trearise on Corporations, with an appendix of the Corporation acts of each state, by Joseph K. Angell, author of a Treatise on Water Courses, Tide Water, Limitations, &c. Oct. 23.

---

GRAY & BOWEN, have in preparation, and will very shortly put to press,

A NEW DICTIONARY OF MEDICAL SCIENCE AND LITERATURE; which will contain a concise account of the various subjects in Anatomy, Physiology, Pathology, Therapeutics, Materia Medica, Surgery, Obstetrics, and Pharmacy, with the Etymology and Orthoepy of the terms of their Greek, Latin, French, and German synonymes;—a copious Bibliography appended to the different articles, and Biographical Notices of the most eminent Authors in the different departments of Medical Science, with a Catalogue of their principal works mentioned and an Epitome of the existing state of Medical Science and Literature. By Robley Dunglison, M. D. Professor of Medicine in the University of Virginia &c, &c.

While many of the nations of Continental Europe possess Dictionaries, which have kept pace with the advancing condition of Medical Science, Great Britain and America possess it may be said, but one of a concise character,—that of Hooper,—which independently of its want of accuracy on many points, is incontestibly far behind the present state of Medical Science and Literature, and unfit for the purposes of the Medical Student. In proof of this, it will be sufficient to remark, that the New Dictionary will contain at least five thousand words more than are to be found in that publication,—while the circumstance of the Dictionary of Hooper being stereotyped in this country, renders it impracticable to make the necessary additions to it, were the ground work such as to render such a course advisable.

The work will not be a mere Dictionary of terms; it will comprise concise histories of diseases: a description and doses of various kinds of medicine, with formula for the different Pharmacentrical preparations, &c, &c.

The important publications daily appearing in France and Germany, have induced the author to add the French and German synonymes to the various terms; so that the work will really contain the substance of an English, French and German Dictionary, at a comparatively trifling expense.—The French Index will be found to include every word in the 'Dictionaire des Science Medicales,' which consists of sixty volumes, as well as in the smaller Dictionaries more recently published.

Great attention has been, moreover, paid to the Greek and Latin synonymes, so that the Dictionary will, it is trusted, form a safe and convenient guide to the study of ancient and modern authors on Medicine.

It will be comprised in one large volume, 8vo. Oct. 23.

---

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1831. NO. XXIII.

MERCANTILE LAW.

CONTRACT OF SALE.

Continued.

We proceed, as was proposed at the close of our last article, to separate the contract from the performance, and to consider the various relations which may intervene. Henceforth, the word 'sale' must be understood as applying to the bargain, without importing either that the price has been paid, or the commodity delivered.* And this, indeed, is not only the legal, but the ordinary signification of the term. We say, in common speech, 'I have sold my horse,' though he be still in the stable, and no part of the money have been received. It should seem, therefore, a matter of no great difficulty to determine what constitutes a sale, although in this, as in all other definitions, cases will be found on the border-line to which it is difficult to assign their true position.

As it is a bargain, it must of course, be mutual. One party cannot hold the other bound, and leave himself at liberty to be off. If a commodity be offered me for sale, and I say, 'I will think of it, and make known my determination in a day or two;' this is is no bargain, because I am not bound, and there is, therefore, no mutuality. But although, in cases where an interval takes place between the offer and the acceptance, the transaction is no bargain until acceptance, yet it becomes so at the moment of the assent given (if given within a reasonable time) though as yet unknown to the proposer. In this trading community, where numberless sales are concluded by means of letters, this is a rule of much practical importance; and it may be useful, therefore, to give an example of actual occurrence. A, by letter, offered B a commodity at a certain price. The letter was misdirected, and, in consequence, delayed; but when received, the offer was immediately accepted, and a letter sent off by the next post, communicating the acceptance. A, not receiving an answer so soon as he had expected, had, in the meanwhile, but after B's answer had been despatched, sold the commodity to another; whereupon B brought an action against him for the non-delivery. The question was, whether the bargain with B was complete before the second sale; and the Court held, that it was so from the moment when the letter, containing the answer, was sent away.† If there had been delay on the part of B, it would, of course, have been otherwise.

Again, it is no bargain, unless the price is agreed upon. If a man offer to sell me his horse, and I agree to take him for such a price as on inspection I shall think him worth, I can hardly be said to have bought the horse. It is, in fact, merely a promise that I will buy him, if at some future time we can agree about the price. It is not necessary, however, that any precise sum should be fixed; it is sufficient, if the amount can be ascertained without further negotiation between the parties.* Thus, an agreement to give the market price, or so much as a third person shall estimate the commodity to be worth, is undoubtedly a sale.

And, as the price, so the commodity, must be certain. It must be some specific thing, pointed at by both. It follows, therefore, that, if the subject of the dealing do not exist at the time in the form, or under the denomination spoken of in the contract—if, for instance, it be an article, which is yet to be made or manufactured—the transaction, in that case, is not a sale. So far, indeed, as the personal obligation is concerned, the precise character of the agreement is not very material: because, whether I order a chariot to be built for me, or buy one already built, I can equally insist on performance of the contract. It has, however, as will presently be seen, other and very important consequences; and it is necessary, therefore, that the distinction should be borne in mind. Messrs Bell and Co. manufacturers, wrote to a Mr Kaye, the patentee of some improved machinery for the spinning of flax, requesting him to get made for them two spinning frames on the new construction [illegible] necessary directions were accordingly given to one Sleddon, a machine-maker. After some delay the frames were completed, and packed up for carriage, a letter being dispatched to Bell and Co., requesting instructions, as to the mode of forwarding them. They, however, declined to receive them, and the frames, in consequence, remained on Sleddon's premises, till a fire broke out, and consumed them. An action having been brought against Bell and Co. for the price, treating the frames as goods bargained and sold, the Court were of opinion, that it could not be maintained in that form, inasmuch as the transaction was not a sale, but an order.† On reference to that case, it will be found, that the argument turned mainly on the question, whether Bell and Co. had either themselves, or by their agent, adopted the frames when made, so as to appropriate them specifically to themselves. And it must be remarked, generally, that a transaction of this nature may subsequently be converted into a sale, upon delivery and acceptance, or by any other act on the part of the orderer, which fixes the individual commodity destined for himself.

To take the instance above quoted, so long as the agreement would have been fulfilled on the part of Sleddon, by the delivery of any two frames of the kind and quality ordered, there was no sale; but if two frames in particular had been sent to Bell and Co. and accepted by them, or if they or their agent had seen and approved of two in particular, even before delivery, thenceforth, those two might have been treated as goods sold to them. The principle of this, and the like cases, is intelligible enough, although difficulties have occasionally arisen in the application of it, and very nice distinctions have been drawn, both as to what may be considered as subsisting in specie at the time of the contract, and as to what will constitute an appropriation. The following rules may, perhaps, be useful. At all events, they will be found substantially correct.

With respect to the first point: if the commodity bargained for have at the time an existence independent of any will of man—if, to borrow a convenient phrase of the schoolmen, it be in esse and not merely in posse—then the transaction is a sale: otherwise not. Two cases will illustrate the distinction, which, it must be confessed, is somewhat subtle. A. bargains with B. for a quantity of oak pins at a great price, to be cut out of slabs, and delivered to the buyer. This is not a sale—because it is impossible to say that the oak pins have at that time an existence. To resume our scholastic phrase, they exist in posse in the slab, but it depends on the will of another, whether they shall ever have a real existence as oak pins.* But a contract for so many bags of flour, known at the time to be unground, has been considered as a contract of sale, because the flour had an actual existence at the time, though something remained to be done before it was deliverable in the state contracted for.†

As to the second point: whenever there has been on the part of the orderer such an adoption of the thing contracted for, that the contract thenceforth can only be satisfied by the delivery of that individual article, the order may from that time be considered as converted into a sale.‡ In strictness, indeed, it is a new bargain, having reference to and embodying the terms of the former contract.

It has been already stated that a sale can only be of things in possession. There is however a recognised mode of dealing apparently inconsistent with this rule. It is a practice by no means uncommon among mercantile men to enter into bargains for the sale of goods expected from abroad, long before their arrival. These contracts have sometimes been treated as agreements for a future sale, rather than actual sales. But this construction is at variance with another position, which seems however to be generally admitted, that on arrival of the goods the agreement at once becomes a complete sale, provided that the person who has contracted for the purchase, perform or offer to perform his part of the bargain. Now if the transaction were merely an agreement for a future sale, the assent of both parties would be necessary

---

* Emptio et venditio contrahitur simul atque de pretio convenerit. Inst. 1. 3. tit. 24. So in the law of Scotland 'Sale is a consensual contract completed by covenant alone.' 1 Stair, 14. s. 1. 3 Ersk. 3. s. 2.

And in that of France. La vente est une convention par laquelle l'un s'oblige a livrer une chose et l'autre a la payer. Elle est parfaite entre les parties, des qu'on est convenu de la chose et du prix, quoique la chose n'ait pas encore été livrée, ni le prix payé. Code Civile 1582, 1583.

† Adams v. Lindsell, 1 B. & A. 681.

* Certum est quod certum reddi potest. And see Inst. 1. 3. tit. 24. Kit. 181 a. Graham v. Jackson, 14 East, 498.

† Dan. and Lloyd, Merc. Cases, 93. And see Towers v. Osborne, 1 Str. 506. Dunmore v. Taylor, Peake, N. P. C. 41. Mucklow v. Mangles, 1 Taunt. 318.

* Groves v. Buck, 3 M. & S. 178.

† Garbutt v. Watson, 5 B. & A. 613. These cases were considered with reference to the statutes of frauds in the interpretation of the words 'no contract for the sale of any goods, &c.' But a contract for the sale means, we apprehend, a contract of sale.

‡ Compare Mucklow v. Mangles, 1 Taunt. 318, with Woods v. Russell, 5 B. & A. 942. Both were cases of a barge built by order, and in both money was paid as the work advanced. But in the latter case the payments were made by instalments at times previously fixed, on the completion of certain stages of the work, and at each of these periods there was an appropriation of the barge in its then state, by the person for whom it was building.

before it could be changed into an actual sale; and on the other hand, if it be a present sale it seems, as we have said, to violate the rule which forbids the transfer of things not in possession. This dilemma can only be avoided by considering the transaction as a sale of goods, assumed to be, at the time of the contract, in the possession of the agent or carrier of the seller, and therefore constructively, though not actually, in his own possession, upon condition that it is to take effect, entirely or partially, or not at all, according as the fact shall afterwards turn out. And this construction will, as it seems to us, be warranted by the cases which have been decided, notwithstanding an occasional looseness and want of precision in the expression. Thus, in an action for the non-delivery of certain hemp, the broker's note proved at the trial was in these words:—'Sold for Mr H. Siftkin to Mr M. Boyd, about thirtytwo tons, more or less, of Riga Rhine hemp, on arrival, per Fanny and Almira, at 82*l.* 10*s.* per ton, &c.' Lord Ellenborough, in deciding that the action could not be maintained, said, 'I clearly think "on arrival" means on arrival of the hemp. The parties did not mean to enter into a wager. By "bought" and "sold" in the note must be understood "contracted to sell and buy." The hemp was expected by the ship; had it arrived, it was sold to the plaintiff. As none arrived, the contract was at an end.'* It is true, that the question there considered was, whether the arrival of the hemp was a condition precedent to the obligation of the seller? Still the language of Lord Ellenborough imports that he considered the transaction as a sale on condition, and not an agreement for a future sale. Whether the personal obligation of the seller attaches, independently of the arrival, is a question to be determined by the language of the bargain, and not immediately connected with the present subject; because, however that may be, it is quite clear that there is no complete sale until arrival of the goods. Still, as it is a question of not unfrequent occurrence, it may not be thought out of place if we give one or two examples for practical guidance.

In one case† the bargain was stated to be for a certain quantity of hemp sold by the defendants to the plaintiffs, to be shipped on or before the 31st August. A full cargo had in fact been prepared by the agents of the vendors; but before shipment it was seized and confiscated by the Russian government. An action was brought for the non-delivery, pursuant to the contract, and the defendants were held liable, as having positively undertaken that the hemp should at all events be shipped. But where the agreement was in this form:—'Sold for Messrs Scougall and Co. to Messrs Hayward and Co. all the hemp which may be loaded by certain ships now at Riga (not exceeding 300 tons) by Messrs Schmids and Co., the agents of the concern,' Lord Ellenborough construed the contract thus:—'We will sell you all that our agents at Riga ship for us,' [His lordship should rather have said, 'We sell you all that our agents at Riga shall ship for us'] 'to the amount of 300 tons.—If they send us so much you shall have it.—If they send us none, we have sold none to you.'‡

It should be observed that, in these and in other cases of conditional sales, although the transaction is complete, so far as the agreement of the parties is concerned, by the conclusion of the bargain, it does not take effect as an absolute sale, until the determination of the contingency. In the instances which have been given above, until the arrival of the goods it was impossible to say whether anything, much less what quantity had been in fact sold; and it may be laid down as a general rule, that so long as the terms of the contract are floating and unascertained, either as to the commodity or as to the price, the transaction is not a perfect sale.* Thus, if goods, subsisting at the time in bulk, are sold by number, weight or measure, as one hundred measures of wheat in a granary, one hundred gallons of whiskey in a vat, the sale is not complete until the quantity contracted for has been counted, weighed or measured, so as to be specifically appropriated to the buyer. We shall have occasion to allude to this subject hereafter; for the present it is enough to state the rule.

A sale on trial is ex vi termini conditional; and so also are sales by sample, in which it is an implied term of the bargain, that the purchaser shall not be absolutely bound until he has had an opportunity of inspecting and comparing the bulk.† Under this head also may be classed the transaction by which a commodity is delivered to another at a stated price for sale on return. If the person to whom it is delivered (who is at first a mere bailee) either dispose of it to a third, or not having done so, fail to return it within a reasonable time, it may then be considered as sold to him for the price which was named on delivery. In the meanwhile it is entrusted only, and not sold.

To be continued.

* Boyd v. Siftkin, 2 Campb. 326.
Splidt v. Heath, 2 Campb. 57, n.
‡ Hayward v. Scougall, 2 Campb. 57.

* Withers v. Lyss, 4 Campb. 237.
† Lorymer v. Smith, 1 B. & C. 1.

LORD KEEPER GUILFORD.

Continued from page 172.

'Another proposition came to his lordship by a city broker from Sir John Lawrence, who had many daughters, and those reputed beauties, and the fortune was to be 6000*l.* His lordship went and dined with the alderman, and liked the lady, who (as the way is) was dressed out for a muster. And coming to treat, the portion shrank to 5000*l.*; and upon that his lordship parted, and was not gone far, before Mr broker (following) came to him, and said, Sir John would give 500*l.* more at the birth of the first child; but that would not do, for his lordship hated such screwing. Not long after this despatch, his lordship was made the king's solicitor-general, and then the broker came again with news, that Sir John would give 10,000*l.* No! his lordship said, after such usage he would not proceed if he might have 20,000. So ended that affair, and his lordship's mind was once more settled in tranquillity.

'It is said that marriages are made in heaven, and if frequent and unforeseen accidents (often to be observed productive of them) are any argnment, the proverb hath countenance; for so it happened in his lordship's case, for out of a contingent interview, a proposition sprung pregnant with all advantages of honor, person, and fortune, more than which was not to be desired or expected. And it was for a match with the Lady Frances Pope, the middle daughter of three co-heirs of Thomas, Earl of Down, who lived at Wroxton, in Oxfordshire. The eldest was married to Mr Soames, of Thurlow, in Suffolk, within four miles of Catledge, the seat of his lordship's father. And, as the use is, the grave Countess of Down, with her two younger daughters, attended the new-married couple to their habitation, and made some stay there; during which the visits of joy came in, and among the rest the family from Catledge made their appearance; and the countess and her daughters in due time made their return, which happened to be at a time when his lordship was at Catldege. His mother laid her eyes upon the eldest unmarried daughter, and when they were gone, turned about and said, "Upon my life this lady would make a good wife for my son Frank." And, in short, at the next visit, with his lordship's fair consent, she moved it to the countess, who consented that his lordship might make his advances. His next business was to muster what sum of money he could, in order to make an honourable proposition, and with 600*l.* borrowed of a friend, he could compass but 6000*l.* in all to join her fortune, which was estimated at 14,000*l.* for making the jointure and settlement intended to be 1000*l. per annum.* After this he ventured down with a decent equipage and attendance, and in less than a fortnight fixed his point with the lady, and appointed another time to come and finish what was so auspiciously begun. And then his lordship went with full attendance and some friends and after the necessary meetings were sealed, the lovers were happily married in Wroxton church.'

While Sir Farncis North held the office of solicitor-general, he was returned to parliament as member for Lynn; but he had neither the inclination nor the leisure to devote himself to parliamentary business. On the promotion of Sir Heneage Finch to the woolsack, Sir Francis succeeded him as attorney-general, and his practice, which had before been very considerable, now received a sensible increase.

'His business increased, even while he was solicitor, to be so much as would have overwhelmed one less dexterous; but when he was made attorney-general, though his gains by his office were great, they were much greater by his practice, for that flowed upon him like an orage, enough to overset one that had not extraordinary readiness in business. His skull-caps, which he wore when he had leisure to observe his constitution, as I touched before, were now destined to lie in a drawer to receive the money that came in by fees; one had the gold, another the crowns and half-crowns, and another the smaller money. When these vessels were full, they were committed to his friend (the Hon. Roger North), who was constantly near him to tell out the cash and put it into bags according to the contents, and so they went to his treasurers', Blanchard and Child, goldsmiths, Temple-bar.'

Even at this busy period of his life, Sir Francis North did not neglect his more liberal studies, and acquired a general knowledge of the modern languages, French, Italian, and Spanish, and even made some progress in the study of the Dutch. In the pursuit of his professional knowledge he was as diligent as ever, noting down in 'his solemn common-place book,' every matter of importance, and making a copious index of any valuable treatise in MS. which fell in his way. To preserve his knowledge of real property law, he was accustomed every Christmas to peruse Littleton's Tenures.

On the death of Sir John Vaughan, the chief justice of the common pleas, Sir Francis North was promoted to the vacant dignity. The leisure and ease which this change procured him compensated for the pecuniary loss which he sustained by it, his profits as attorney-general being about 7000*l.* per annum, while the office of chief justice produced only 4000*l*. One of the first acts of the new chief justice was to introduce the clause of ac etiam into the process of the common pleas, in accordance with the alteration lately made in the king's bench, by which the practice of the former court was considerably increased. Upon another matter of practice he had the misfortune to offend the bar of his court; an incident which is thus related by his biographer:—

'There was an incident that happened not long after his lordship came into the place of chief in that court, which, though in itself and in the end of it ridiculous, yet being an affront to the court, and in particular to the lord chief justice, and by the whole bar of serjeants, all in a lump together, ought to be related, as I shall do, really as it was acted by them. It had been the usage of the king's bench, at the side bar below in the hall, and of the common pleas, in the chamber within the treasury, to hear attorneys and young counsel that came to move there about matters of form and practice. His lordship had a younger brother (Hon. Roger North), who was of the profession of the law: he was newly called to the bar, and had little to do in the king's bench; but the attorneys of the common pleas often retained him to move for them in the treasury such matters as were proper there, and what they might have moved themselves. But, however agreeable this kind of practice was to a noviciate, it was not worthy the observation it had, for once or twice a week was the utmost calculate of these motions. But the serjeants thought that method was or might become, prejudicial to them, who had a monopoly of the bar, and would have no water go by their mill, and supposed it was high time to put a stop to such beginnings, for fear it might grow worse. But the doubt was, how they should signify their resentment so as to be effectually remedied. At length they agreed for one day to make no motions at all, and opportunity would fall for showing the reason how the court came to have no business. When the court (on this dumb day, as it was called) was sat, the chief justice gave the usual signal to the eldest serjeant to move. He bowed, and had nothing to move; so the next, and the next from end to end of the bar. The chief, seeing this, said, "Brothers, I think we must rise, here is no business." Then an attorney steps forward and called to a serjeant to make a motion, and after that turned to the court and said, that he had given the serjeant his fee and instructions over-night to move for him, and desired he might do so. The chief looked about, and asked what was the matter? An attorney that stood by, very modestly said, that he feared the serjeants took it ill that motions were made in the treasury. Then the chief scented the whole matter: and "brothers," said he, "I think a very great affront is offered to us, which we ought for the dignity of the court to resent. But that we may do nothing too suddenly, but take consideration at full leisure and maturely, let us now rise, and tomorrow morning give order as becomes us. And do you, attorneys, come all here tomorrow, and care shall be taken for your despatch; and rather than fail, we will hear you or your clients, or the barristers at law, or any person that thinks fit to appear in business, that the law may have its course;" and so the court rose. This was like thunder to the serjeants, and they fell to quarrelling one with another about being the cause of this great evil they had brought upon themselves; for none of them imagined it would have had such a turn as this was, that shaked what was the palladium of the coif, the sole practice there. In the afternoon they attended the chief and the other Judges of the court, and in great humility owned their fault, and begged pardon, and that no farther notice might be taken of it, and they would be careful not to give the like offence for the future. The chief told them that the affront was public and in the face of the court, and they must make their recognitions there next morning, and in such a manner as the greatness of their offence demanded, and then they should hear what the court would say to them. Accordingly they did; and the chief first and then the rest in order, gave them a formal chiding with acrimony enough; all which with dejected countenances they were bound to hear. When this discipline was over, the chief pointed to one to move, and which he did (as they said) more like one crying than speaking: and so ended the comedy as it was acted in Westminster hall called the Dumb Day.

The conduct of Sir Francis North while upon the bench was in many points worthy of great commendation. Like Sir Mathew Hale, he applied himself to the reformation of the abuses which existed in the law; his mode being to note down the point which appeared to require amendment; and afterwards, when at leisure, to reduce his observations into such a form that an act of parliament might be founded on them. It is supposed by his biographer, than the first idea of the statute of frauds proceeded from him; and he also asserts, that several other alterations, which afterwards passed into laws, arose from his suggestions. Another proposal of the chief justice was a general register for lands; a scheme upon which 'he worked sincerely.' He had proceeded so far in these proposed amendments as to prepare several draughts of bills, which, after his death were found among his papers. In presiding at the trial of causes the chief justice exerted himself to confine the counsel to the point in question, and to cut down that redundancy of speech, which, he used to observe, 'disturbed the order of his thoughts.' 'He was,' says his biographer, 'very good at waylaying the craft of counsel; for he, as they say, had been in the oven himself, and knew where to look for the pasty." Upon one difficult occasion his conduct on the bench was entitled to the highest commendation. 'At Taunton Dean,' says Roger North, 'he was forced to try an old man for a wizard; and for the curiosity of observing the state of a male witch or wizard, I attended in the court and sat near where the poor man stood. The evidence against him was, the having bewitched a girl of about thirteen years old: for she had strange and unaccountable fits, and used to cry out upon him and spit out of her mouth straight pins; and whenever the man was brought near her, she fell in her fits, and spit forth straight pins. His lordship wondered at the straight pins, which could not be so well couched in the mouth as crooked ones; for such only used to be spit out by people bewitched. He examined the witnesses very tenderly and carefully, and so as none could collect what his opinion was; for he was fearful of the jurymens' precipitancy, if he gave them any offence. When the poor man was told he must answer for himself, he entered upon a defence as orderly and well expressed as I ever heard spoke by any man, counsel or other; and if the attorney-general had been his advocate, I am sure he could not have done it more sensibly. The sum of it was malice, threatening, and circumstances of imposture in the girl; to which matters he called his witnesses, and they were heard. After this was done, the Judge was not satisfied to direct the jury before the imposture was fully declared; but studied and beat the bush while asking sometimes one and then another question as he thought proper. At length he turned to the justice of peace that committed the man and took the first examinations. "And, sir," said, he, "pray will you ingenuously declare your thoughts, if you have any, touching these straight pins which the girl spit; for you saw her in her fit?"—"Then, my lord," said he, "I did not know that I might concern myself in this evidence, having taken the examination and committed the man. But since your lordship demands it, I must needs say, I think the girl, doubling herself in her fits as being convulsed, bent her head down close to her stomacher, and with her mouth took pins out of the edge of that, and then, righting herself a little, spit them into some bystander's hands." This cast an universal satisfaction upon the minds of the whole audience, and the man was acquitted. As the Judge went down stairs out of the court, a hideous old woman cried, "God bless your lordship!"—What's the matter, good woman? said the judge.—"My lord," said she, "forty years ago, they would have hanged me for a witch, and they could not, and now they would have hanged my poor son!"'

On the trial of Colledge* for high treason, the conduct of North, who presided as one of the Judges, has been the subject of severe and just observation. Certain papers belonging to the prisoner, and containing the heads of his defence, and suggestions relative to the proceedings, furnished to him by his legal advisers, had been forcibly taken from him, previously to his coming into court. He applied with great earnestness for their restoration; but the court, having pursued them, denied the request, on the frivolous and ridiculous ground that they contained matter scandalous to the government. Colledge, therefore, was only permitted to have the use of such portions of the documents as the judges were pleased to consider unexceptionable. His assertions, that without the assistance of his instructions he should not be enabled to conduct his defence, were met by a pertinent answer from Sir Francis North—that the judges were his counsel. A maxim which is, indeed, admirably illustrated by the trial in question.

Upon the experiment, made under the auspices of Sir William Temple, of a Whig administration, Sir Francis North was constituted a member of the privy council. A government formed so entirely in opposition to the king's dearest prejudices had little chance of stability; nor was it probable that the chief justice would act cordially with Shaftesbury, and Essex, and Russell. But the time was now approaching when he was to assume a still higher station.

The health of the Lord Keeper Finch having given way, the business of the cabinet which usually came before him was for the most part performed by Sir Francis North, who thus, in case of Finch's death, seemed evidently pointed out as his successor. When that event took place, he received an intimation, as his biographer supposes, from Lord Rochester, the lord treasurer, that the seals were within his grasp. The object of this hint is supposed to have been to induce the chief justice to prefer a petition for the vacant woolsack, that so the seals might be offered to him with a better grace, without the addition of a pension. But Sir Francis was not easily misled. He clearly foresaw that the office must be tendered to him, and he fully resolved not to accept it without such a pension as should enable him to support the dignity in such a manner as he deemed suitable. Rochester and he now endeavored to outwit one another; but the chief justice was not 'a chicken that would peck at shadows;' and ultimately the king placed the seal in his hands, with this warning sentence:—'Here, my lord, take it; you will find it heavy!' To this appointment was added a passion of 2000*l.* a year. It is curious to observe what were the feelings of Sir Francis North after receiving the highest reward which his profession could confer.

* State Trials, vol viii. p. 549.

To be continued.

ENGLISH CASES.

HIGH COURT OF DELEGATES.

Before the whole Commission.

Fletcher vs. Le Breton—Appeal.

This was an appeal from the decision of Sir John Nicholl, Judge of the Prerogative Court, by which a will, constituting Hester and Lucy Le Breton residuary legatees, had been pronounced valid, and a previous will, giving the whole of her property to her husband, the present appellant, had been adjudged to be null and void.

The deceased, Mrs Fletcher, had reserved to herself, by a clause in her marriage settlement, the power of disposing of her personal and funded property in case she should die before her husband. In 1826, the deceased had commenced a will, which was subsequently completed in January, 1829, leaving her husband universal legatee. In two months afterwards, a few hours before her death, she sent for Sir Thomas Harvie Farquhar, and gave him instructions to prepare another will, in which, after bequests of jewels, &c, to the Hon. Mrs Talbot and Sir Charles Ogle, she gave the residue of her estate between the Misses Le Breton, share and share alike. The usual proceedings in contesting this will had been taken by the husband in the Court below, and an allegation had been asserted, in which it was endeavored to be proved that, at the time of making the latter will, the deceased was not of a testamentary capacity. The Judge, Sir John Nicholl, in giving his judgment, had stated that so much credibility was attached to the testimony of Sir Thomas Farquhar, that, added to the balance of proof in favor of the latter disposition of her property, he was bound to pronounce for the will of April, 1829.

Dr Haggard, on behalf of the appellant, proved the admission of an allegation of 10 articles, containing fresh matter, which he considered necessary to the establishment of the former will. The substance of the articles went to prove the improbable disposition of her property, and the evident incapacity of the testatrix at the time of executing the latter will. The Learned Civilian referred to many written authorities on the Civil and Canon Law to prove that the admission of such allegations was perfectly consistent with the forms of the Court, and that in an appeal against a definitive sentence it was competent for parties to plead what had not before been pleaded.

Dr Phillimore opposed this allegation, reminding the Court that the invariable practice had been to refuse parties to plead facts which had come to their knowledge previous to publication in the original suit. Not only on this ground, but on the merits of the facts contain in the allegation, he would contend for its inadmissibility, as the matter pleaded was unimportant, and could not materially alter the conclusion which must be arrived at from the strength of the previous evidence in favor of the latter will. It was clearly established that Mrs Fletcher had entertained an aversion for her husband, and had been heard to accuse him of great extravagance; also, that he treated her with unkindness during her illness, frequently leaving her without common necessaries. The evidence of Sir T. Farquhar was strong and unimpeachable, from the high character of that gentleman.

The Judges directed the Court to be cleared, and, after remaining in deliberation some time, ordered the Counsel to be readmitted, upon which the Registrar announced that their Lordships had decided against the admissibility of the allegation.

The Learned Civilian, Dr Phillimore, was then proceeding to reargue the suit upon the evidence adduced in the Court below, when Dr Haggard intimated that his party declined to offer further opposition.

The sentence of the Judge in the Prerogative Court was then affirmed, and the cause referred back, without any decree respecting costs.

JOINT STOCK.

Fox vs. Clifton.

The decision in the Court of Common Pleas, in the case of Fox v. Clifton, and others, has excited a good deal of discussion among those persons connected with joint stock concerns. The decision alluded to arose out of a motion for a new trial. The action was against eight defendants, alleged partners in the Imperial Distillery Company, and was brought to recover the amount of goods sold and delivered, for the use of this company, which was one of those joint stock affairs that rendered the year 1825 so notorious. The case was tried some time since, and a verdict was given for the plaintiff. A rule Nisi was obtained to set aside the verdict, on the ground that there was not sufficient proof to show that the defendants were partners in the company at the time the contract was made. Chief Justice Tyndal, in pronouncing judgment said that at the trial, three questions were left to the Jury—first, whether the defendants were partners in this joint stock company; secondly, if they had held themselves out as partners, or allowed themselves to be held out in that character; and thirdly, admitting them to be partners, whether, before the time of the contract any of them had ceased to be partners; and in the latter conviction, the Jury were bound to find for the defendants. His Lordship then commented at some length upon the facts of the case, as proved in evidence, and observed that, as the Court was of opinion that the defendants only offered to become partners, and that, on finding that the thing was abortive, they were determined to have nothing to do with it, the rule for a new trial must be made absolute. To enable the general reader to understand the merits of this case, it is necessary to state that the defendants were persons who had written for shares in this Company, and who had obtained letters promising that a certain number should be allotted to them; that shares were allotted them, and that all the defendants had paid the first instalment on them. With the exception of one, however, none of them had executed the Deed of Settlement. But it was proved, that their names had been put forth as partners to the company, and that on their credit the managers had been enabled to incur debts, &c. The Learned Judge, on the trial, contended that this was quite sufficient to constitute them partners, and the Jury pronounced a verdict accordingly. The effect of this verdict—whether it was a legal one or not, was no doubt, highly beneficial to the public, inasmuch as it was calculated to prevent men of property from lending their names to joint stock bubbles, as they would thereby render themselves liable to any obligations which such companies might incur. If however, the decision of the Court of Common Pleas be good in law, it would seem that any man may allow his name to be sent forth as a subscriber to, or partner in a company, and that, on the credit of his name, debts may be cortracted, without rendering himself liable for their payment. It is obvious that the decision gives great latitude to wealthy and unprincipled men to defraud the public, as there is nothing to prevent such persons from putting forth men of straw in responsible situations, while they may reap the profits of transactions incurred on their credit, without being at all liable for the consequences. It should also be recollected that shares in such concerns as the Imperial Distillery Company are saleable, and that even the letters, promising shares, are sold, and frequently bring large profits to the sellers—so that it would appear a man may traffic in the property of a concern, and reap large profits, without incurring the risk of being a partner. We do not mean, however, to impute any blame to the defendants in the case of Fox v. Clifton and others. On the contrary, we believe, that no blame is imputable to them. Nor do we intend to call in question the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas—the object of our remarks being simply to put the unwary on their guard, with respect to joint stock companies in general.

RECENT AMERICAN DECISIONS.

TRESPASS.

A constructive ouster by an heir claiming the whole estate under a supposed devise, will not sustain an action of trespass brought against him by the co-heir. Allen vs. Carter. 8 Pick. 175

A mortgagee of personal property mortgaged to secure a debt, may maintain trespass against a stranger, who takes it from the possession of the mortgager, although the trespass be committed before the debt becomes due. Woodruff vs. Halsey. 333

A mortgagee of a building standing, not on land of the mortgager, but on that of a third person may maintain trespass against a stranger who pulls down and carries away the building, the building being unoccupied at the time of the trespass, and the mortgagee not having taken actual possession. Ibid.

Trespass may be maintained against a person who carries away the materials of a building, which has been pulled down by a trespasser, though the person carrying them away was not engaged in the pulling down. Ibid.

The plaintiffs being owners of a close and a mill thereon, on the north side of a river, and their milldam being rightfully extended to land on the other side, which they did not own, the defendants crossed the river below the plaintiffs' land and destroyed a part of the dam on the south side, and having effected their object, they recrossed the river at the same place and went upon the plaintiff's close. It was held, that the destruction of the dam and the entry upon the close were distinct trespasses, so that a judgment in trespass quare cl. fr. for the latter would not not be a bar to a like action for the former. White vs. Moseley. 356

Held, also, that in a trespass quare cl. fr. for the destruction of the dam, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover consequential damages for the interruption of the use of their mill, this injury being set forth in the declaration. Ibid.

1. To excuse a trespass on the ground of accident, it must appear to have occurred without the least fault on the part of the defendant. Jennings vs. Fundeburg, 4 M'Cord, 161.

2. Thus, where the defendant, in an action of trespass was in pursuit of runaway negroes, who ran away from him, and he fired his gun towards them, intending to shoot over their heads, to induce them to stop, and one of the negroes was killed by a random shot, it was held that the owner was entitled to recover his value of the defendant. Ib.

3. Where a tract of land was sold by a sheriff under an execution against the defendant, in an action of trsspass to try title, by the purchaser against the defendant, the defendant will not be permitted to give evidence that the titles of the land was not in himself, but in another, whose tenant he was. O'Neal vs. Duncan, 4 M'Cord, 246.

---

SALE.

Where one purchases goods upon an examination of a specimen taken by him out of a small aperture in the case in which the article is contained, this is a sale by sample. Williams vs. Spafford. 8 Pick. 250

Where an article was purchased in that manner, as a seroon of indigo, but the greater part of the contents of the seroon proved to be a different substance, and the remainder to be indigo of a quality inferior to the specimen, it was held, that the seller was liable to the purchaser in assumpsit on a warranty, that the article sold was indigo of the same quality as the sample. Ibid.

In the case of a sale of chattels bonâ fide and for a valuable consideration, slight evidence of a delivery is sufficient; and if the vendee, with the consent of the vendor, obtain possession before any attachment or second sale, the transfer is complete, without a formal delivery. Shumway vs. Rutter. 443

Thus where furniture in a tavern was sold and the vendee took a lease of the house and went to live there and used the furniture in common with the vendor, who had occupied the house under a previous lease, and who continued to live there and keep the tavern, and afterwards the vendor removed to another house, carrying the furniture with him and using it as his own, and it was there attached as his property, it was held, that there was sufficient evidence of a delivery, to make the sale complete. Ibid.

The plaintiff contracted to make some pew panels for J, who was building a meetinghouse, to be paid for in cash on the delivery of the panels. The plaintiff made the panels and brought them to the meetinghouse, and deposited them there, but J was not there, being absent from town, but only some of the workmen. Held, that the panels were not delivered, but still remained the property of the plaintiff, and were not liable to attachment as the property of J. Woodbury vs. Long. 543

1. Where a tract of land is sold in gross by a public officer, and the number of acres mentioned merely as a part of the description, without any warranty, or misrepresentation, no deduction pro tanto will be allowed if there is a deficiency in the number of acres. Commissioners in equity vs. Thompson, 4 M'Cord, 434.

2. But if in such sale the deficiency is so great as to amount to a failure of consideration, or to defeat the object of the purchaser, or to furnish satisfactory evidence of a total mistake in the character of the land, the purchaser is entitled to relief. Ib.

3. Where a tract of land was sold by a commissioner in equity, and described as 'all that tract of land said to contain four hundred and fortynine acres, more or less, situate,'&c, it was held that the purchaser was not entitled to a deduction pro tanto from the purchase money for a deficiency of twentynine acres. Ib.

4. If a vendor of chattels continue in possession, he is regarded, as to creditors or subsequent purchaser, as the owner, against the most solemn unconditional deed to a bona fide purchaser not in possession. Hudnal vs. Wilder, 4 M'Cord, 294.

---

TRUSTEE PROCESS.

In a trustee process, no evidence can be admitted to charge the trustee, except what he discloses in his answers. Hawes vs. Langton & Tr. 8 Pick. 67.

In such a process the trustee is not obliged to disclose communications made to him by other persons, though it seems he may disclose them in his answers, if he is satisfied of their truth. Ibid.

Where a person summoned as trustee, disclosed an assignment to himself by the defendant, of property for the benefit of creditors, apparently valid; and the defendant made an affidavit of facts tending to show the assignment fraudulent, and the trustee refused to annex the affidavit to his answers, expressing his disbelief of the facts stated in the affidavit, the court refused to order the trustee to annex the affidavit to his answers. Ibid.

It seems, that where a debtor is summoned as trustee of his creditor, the court cannot compel him to disclose an assignment of the debt to a third person, where the trustee does not personally know the fact of the assignment. Ibid.

If the assignee should be injured by the trustee's refusing to state the assignment in his answers, it seems, that he would have a remedy by an action against the trustee. Ibid.

Where an assignee of the defendant's property for the benefit of creditors is summoned as trustee, the plaintiff is not, under St. 1817, c. 148, entitled to a trial by jury to try the validity of the assignment. Ibid.

One summoned and charged as trustee is not entitled to retain a part of the fund in his hands, for the payment of fees of his counsel. Adams vs. Cordis. 260

Where the property in the hands of the trustee is claimed by an assignee of the principal defendant, the trustee is not obliged to disclose the assignment and contest the right of the attaching creditor without an offer of indemnity against the expenses of the suit. Semble. Ibid.

H having in his hands goods of N for sale, on which H had made advances, N requested him to pay out of the proceeds of the goods a bill drawn by N which had been dishonored, and to inform S & Co., who had accepted the bill for the honor of an indorser, of this request. H accordingly informed S & Co. of this request, and promised them verbally to pay the amount of the bill as soon as he should be in funds from the proceeds of the property. H having been summoned in foreign attachment, as the trustee of N, it was held, that S & Co. had acquired a claim against H for the funds in his hands, and that he was therefore chargeable as trustee of N, only for the balance in his hands after deducting his advances and the amount of the bill. Curtis vs. Morris. 280

Choses in action assigned, are not, in the hands of the assignee, goods, effects or credits of the assignor, liable to the trustee process; even in case the assignee would be trustee after receiving money by means of the choses in action. Lupton vs. Cutler & Trs. 298

A debtor assigned goods and choses in action to assignees, for the benefit of such of his creditors as should become parties to the assignment. After some of the creditors had become parties, the assignees were summoned as trustees of the debtor; and it appeared from their answers, that when the writ was served on them, the goods were not sufficient to pay those creditors, though the proceeds of the whole funds, including the choses in action, would be more than sufficient. The court refused to direct the trustees to pay the creditors who had signed, out of the proceeds of the choses in action in the first place, and thus leave a part of the goods to be held by the trustee process, and discharged the trustees. Ibid.

A made an absolute deed of land to R, which was intended as a security for money to be advanced by R to and on account of A, and R, about a year after, gave A a bond to reconvey the land on payment of the money advanced in the mean time; R afterwards sold the land on a credit for an amount more than enough to pay all that was due to him from A; a part of the purchase money was secured by a mortgage of the land from the purchaser to R. R was afterwards summoned as trustee of A. At the time of the service the amount secured by mortgage had not been paid, and the remainder of the price for which R sold and which had been paid, did not amount to so much as was due from A to R. Held, that R was chargeable as trustee of A, for the difference between the price for which R sold the land, and the amount due to him from A. Richards vs. Allen & Tr. 405

Where a debt has been assigned by the creditor, and the debtor is afterward summoned as his trustee, in order to entitle the assignee to the benefit of his assignment, it is not necessary that he should give notice of it to the debtor before the service of the trustee writ on him; it is sufficient if the notice is given at any time before he has made his answer. Ammidown vs. Wheelock & Tr. 470

Where such an assignment is disclosed in the answer, and the assignee desires to become a party to the suit under St. 1817, c. 148, and the Court of Common Pleas refuses to let him become a party, he may bring the question before this Court by a bill of exceptions, and upon a reversal of the decision below, may have a jury trial before this Court. Ibid.

In order to entitle the assignee to become a party under the statute, it is not necessary that he should offer to the person summoned as trustee, any evidence of the assignment, beyond his own statement; it is sufficient if he gives the trustee, before his answer, notice of what appears to be a valid assignment. Ibid.

Where a note not negotiable is assigned, and the maker is subsequently summoned as trustee of the payee, in order to entitle the assignee to become a party to the suit, it is not necessary that he should exhibit the note to the trustee when he gives the trustee notice of the assignment. Ibid.

Neither choses in action nor land assigned, are, in the hands of the assignee, goods, effects, or credits of the assignor liable to the trustee process; even in case the assignee would be trustee after receiving money by means of the choses in action, or as the proceeds of the sale of the land. Gore vs. Clisby & Tr. 555

A debtor assigned goods, choses in action and land, to an assignee, for the benefit of creditors. After some of the creditors had become parties to the assignment, the assignee was summoned as trustee of the debtor, before money was collected on any of the choses in action, or the land was sold. The goods were not sufficient to pay the debts of those creditors who had become parties before the writ was served, but the proceeds of the whole funds, including the choses in action and the land would be more than sufficient. The court refused to direct the trustee to pay the creditors who had signed, out of the proceeds of the choses in action and the land in the first place, and thus leave a part of the goods to be held by the trustee process, and discharged the trustee. Ibid.

---

PLEADING.

In a writ of entry, a plea that in a former writ of entry the tenant recovered judgment for costs, without stating that such judgment was upon the merits, is insufficient. Wade vs. Howard. 8 Pick. 353

Repugnancy between a protestation and an averment in a replication, is not a ground of demurrer. Hapgood vs. Houghton. 451

An assumpsit against an executor, the defendant pleads that the testatrix devised land to the plaintiff in lieu and satisfaction of his demand, and that the plaintiff accepted the devise; the plaintiff protesting that the testatrix did not make the devise in leiu, &c, and that the will was not proved, replies that he did not accept the land devised, concluding to the country. Held, that the replication was good. Ibid.

The executor pleads, that the plaintiff was requested to make his election to take or refuse the devise, but that he refused to elect; the plaintiff replies that he did refuse to accept the devise, traversing the allegation that he refused to elect; the executor rejoins that the devise has not been waived by the plaintiff, concluding with a verification. Held, that the rejoinder is bad, as being a departure, and because it does not join the issue tendered by the traverse. Ibid.

The executor pleads that the plaintiff did not waive or refuse the devise; the plaintiff, protesting as before, replies that he did waive and refuse to accept any devise contained in the will; concluding to the country. Held, that the replication was good. Ibid.

1. In a replication it is necessary that the facts in the plea should be traversed, or new matter in avoidance of them set up. United States vs. Buford, 3 Pet. 13.

2. Pleading to the merits is an admission of the capacity of the plaintiffs to sue. The Society for the Propagation, &c, vs. Pawlet, 4 Pet. 480.

3. The defendant, by an instrument purporting to be articles of agreement between himself and the plaintiff, but signed and sealed by the defendant alone, obligated himself to build a house for the plaintiff by a certain day, and acknowledged payment, and on failure to build the house within the time mentioned, was to forfeit $1200 to the plaintiff. The plaintiff brought an action of debt for the penalty, without averring in the declaration, the defendant had not performed the work. The defendant demurred, and the demurrer was sustained. Salmon vs. Jenkins, 4 M'Cord, 288.

4. If a contract be in the disjunctive, the breach ought to be assigned, that the defendant did not do the one act or the other. Until there is breach of both alternatives, there is no cause of action. Ib.

5. Where the penalty professes to be a subsisting debt, and the condition is added by way of defeasance, the plaintiff may sue for the penalty, without noticing the condition; but it is otherwise, where there is no subsisting debt or duty, and the obligation depends upon the performance or non-performance of some particular act. Ib.

6. In a suit on an administration bond, the declaration was on the penalty only, without setting out breaches; the defendant craved oyer, set out the condition, and pleaded performance. The plaintiff replied, that the administrator had not truly administered, because he had not paid a certain debt. On demurrer the replication was held to be insufficient, on the ground that it did not allege, that the administrator had assets to pay the debt. Jones vs. Anderson, 4 M'Cord, 113.

7. The plea of nil debet to an action of debt on bond, is irregular, but is a substantial plea; and if the plaintiff choose to go to trial on such an issue, he is bound by the result. Belser vs. Irvine, 4 M'Cord, 380.

8. A replication must not depart from the allegations set out in the declaration, in any material matter. Lindsay vs. Jamison, 4 M'Cord, 93.

9. In assumpsit an administrator alleged in his declaration a promise to his intestate, and the defendant pleaded the statute of limitations, and and the plaintiff replied a subsequent promise to the intestate and also to the administrator since the death of the intestate, within four years. A demurrer to that part of the declaration which alleged a promise to the administrator, was sustained. But a new trial was granted, and the plaintiff was allowed to add a count to meet the justice of the case. Ib.

10. A motion for a nonsuit will prevail, if the case is proved as stated upon the record, though that is defective. Ib.

11. There can be no such thing as a release after a conntract is broken, except by deed, and it must be so pleaded. Corbett vs. Lucas, 4 M'Cord, 323.

12. Thus in an action on promissory note, the defendant pleaded a release, but omitted to state that the release was under seal. On demurrer the plea was held to be bad. Ib.

13. And where the liability of the defendant depends upon the happening of a contingency, the plaintiff must aver that it has happened. Salmon vs. Jenkins, 4 M'Cord, 288.

14. In order to determine whether causes of action are the same, it must be ascertained whether the same evidence will be necessary to support them. Crisp vs. Talvande, 4 M'Cord. 20.

15 It is the wrong done and not the character or quantum of the damages, which constitutes the identity of the causes of action. Ib.

16. When the cause of action is entire, or, in other words, when the act complained of is indivisible, a plaintiff cannot separate it, and bring one action for one part, and another for another part; the first will be a bar to the second. Ib.

17. If the plaintiff omit in his declaration to aver a fact essential to his recovery, and the defendant demur to the declaration, the plaintiff cannot introduce into his joinder in the demurrer, an averment of such fact. The proper course, is to ask leave to amend the declaration; which if the court grant they will at the same time permit the the defendant to withdraw or insist on his demurrer. Gibson vs. Todd, 1 Rawle, 452.

18. In an action of debt for rent reserved by indenture, the plaintiff may state in his declaration the substance of the demise, and is not bound to declare upon the deed; and, if to such a declaration the defendant pleads Nil habuit in tenementis; actio non accrevit infra sex annos, or any plea which is prima facie a good plea, no estoppel appearing on the record, the plaintiff may reply that the lease was by indenture, and such a replication will not be a departure. Davis vs. Shoemaker, 1 Rawle, 135.

---

BAR ANECDOTE.

In a case recently tried at Philadelphia, in which several days had been occupied with the examination of the testimony, after it was closed, it was agreed among the counsel, with the consent of the judge, that the case should be submitted to the jury without the usual discussion, and without a charge. The jury retired, deliberated about two hours, then came into court, and propounded a question on a point of law. The Judge informed them that he could not answer their inquiry without a full argument; that in order to spare them from listening to speeches for several days, it had been agreed to leave the case to them; that if they wished they could retire and make another effort to agree. After a little consultation, the jury answered, that there was no probability of their agreeing. The case then proceeded, and they were thus, at their own instance, addressed by four gentlemen of the bar, charged by the judge. They again went out, and returned in less than a quarter of an hour, and gave their verdict. It is too common to complain of the speeches of the counsel, which though sometimes tedious and uninteresting, almost uniformly direct attention to the points really important, and can rarely fail to communicate information, and to facilitate a just decision. We believe, that in nine cases out of ten, whatever may be said to the contrary, respectable juries would prefer hearing the remarks both of the lawyers and the judge. One such instance as this is abundant, in answer to the common place remarks and taunts, frequently made at the expense of the bar, such as, that the jury had made up their mind on the evidence; that they did not regard what the lawyers said. If so in any case, it involved a manifest dereliction of duty, for it is the right of every man that he shall not be judged unheard. No case can suffer from the commentaries of men well versed in the law, and there is no enlightened judge, who will not bear witness to the importance of legal arguments. It may be justly said that, with but few exceptions, the members of the bar in our community deserve the respect in which they are held; and that, there is no class in which greater confidence is reposed in the most delicate matters, and in which fewer have betrayed the trust.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1831.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENTS.

Continued from page 175.

'I shall ask for the abolition of death—until I have the infallibility of human judgment demonstrated to me. The punishment of death has always inspired me with feelings of horror.'—[Lafayette, on the proposition of M. De Tracy, in the Chamber of Deputies.

In continuation of the same debate Mr Macauley said—'that when he considered how strong was the feeling through the country upon this subject, and how strong testimony they had by petitions and other evidence in favor of the repeal of the severer punishment, and how great a number of the House, on a former night, were on the same side, he could not doubt that, if no Ministerial influence were exerted, and if the House voted freely and fairly, they would vote in support of the proposition of his Hon. and Learned Friend. His reliance, he confessed, was somewhat shaken by the vote on the last night, which this question was debated; but he hoped that Right Hon. Gentleman would vote more freely. If those who voted for his Hon. and Learned Friend's motion that night should be again beaten, he should doubt whether the Administration did not use some indirect influence. The only proof that was yet given that this was not made a Government question was—one which could be well spared—that the Honorable and Learned Gentleman (the Solicitor-General) condemned the mitigations which the Right Hon. Baronet, the Secretary of State admitted into his Bill. It was charged on those who called for the otal alteration of the punishment, that they were influenced by a compassionate sentimentality; but that compassionate sentimentality was as decorous in legislators as the severer sentimentality of his Hon. and Learned Friend, the Solicitor-General. His own reason for supporting the motion of his Right Hon. and Learned Friend (Sir James Macintosh) was, that if we were to punish the crime of forgery at all, we must adopt a mitigated punishment, for we could not prevent it with death; and if we had no other punishment than death, we could not punish it at all. It was true they could make a severer law; but it was equally true that they could not enforce it. They had heaps of Statutes of this sort, inflicting the severest punishment, but those Statutes were not effective for any purpose, except for the purpose of evil. The punishment they contained were so severe, and so disproportioned to the offence, in the public opinion, that the laws were seldom enforced. Legislators ought not to forget that the laws did not execute themselves. The heaps of petitions that were laid on their table, as well as the evidence taken before their Committees, proved most clearly the reluctance of the people to prosecute for this crime. But it was said, and stress was laid on that argument, that the bank of England, which was most concerned in this subject, always prosecuted. But on the supposition that that was true—for a corporation it was said had no soul—in so large a body each person composing it had but little share in the prosecution, considering that what was done by the whole body did not belong particularly to any individual. The Right Hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) said, in the discussion the other night, that the House might take the prosecutions of the Bank of England as a fair average of the prosecutions in cases of forgery. The staying back from prosecuting on the part of individuals, the Right Hon. Baronet said was to be attributed rather to a selfish feeling on the part of many individuals, who, to excuse their own sloth or selfishness, pretend that they kept back from conscientious scruples. That might be so with some, and then it was an evil; but if, with some who gave their conscientious scruples as an excuse, that excuse was false, it was yet true with others, and he had no doubt but the great majority were on the side of a true conscientious repugnance to prosecute, conceiving that the punishment was disproportioned to the offence. The repugnance of the Grand Juries was an evidence of this feeling, and he cited the fact of the London Grand Juries throwing out, in cases of forgery, bill after bill, till prosecutors said it was useless to present any. But supposing that the bill came down as a true bill from the Grand Jury, then it came from a reluctant Grand Jury to a still more reluctant Petty Jury, who had to hear the proofs and circumstances of the case, from equally reluctant witnesses and prosecutors.

By way of showing how much more effacacious a milder punishment would prove, he cited the number of trials which took place for nine years, from the year 1818, upon the capital charge and for the minor offence. In the nine years, 708 were committed on the capital charge, and of them 334 got off free, while in the same period 588 were committed on the minor offence of uttering only, and only seven of them got off—(hear, hear).—That was a proof of the superior efficacy of a milder punishment than that of death. Every one, except the Secretary of State, in his office as Secretary of State, was against this punishment. The Magistrates of the country were against it—the Juries, grand and small, were against it, and prosecutors and other witnesses were against it. Even of those who were convicted of the crime, only a few were executed. How then could an argument be drawn in favor of the severe punishment, from the terror it struck, since, of the many injured, few prosecuted, and since, out of those successfully prosecuted, so few were executed? They had far too few executions to deter persons from committing the crime; but they had enough to deter them from prosecuting—(hear, hear.) All that was accomplished by the rigor of the punishment was to gain impunity for 99 out of 100 guilty persons. He would name one of the worst cases—that of Mr Fauntleroy, who had not the excuse of ignorance or of distress, yet there were 8,000 persons of respectability in the city of London who petitioned for a commutation of the punishment in his case, so great was the public sympathy with him—an offender in the first degree, but still an offender in a way that the punishment of death was looked upon as too severe.

'He (Mr. Macauley) would not be considered to approve of the public feeling in this or the like cases. He would admit the public feeling to be sometimes wrong, but the question here was not how the people ought to feel, but what they actually did feel. Were they, by legislation, to compel men who were jurors—men of respectable and amiable feelings, to come forward, and, in spite of their inclinations, to convict offenders? The fact was that Parliament, it was notorious, neglected to legislate for the people and the juries took the laws into their own hands—(hear, hear). That was an evil; it was an evil that those persons, whose proper duty it was to consider as to the facts referred to them, should take upon themselves to consider, not those facts, but whether the punishment of the law was right or wrong. It was an evil to make the popular tribunals the arbiters of what ought to be law and what ought not, and to teach respectable Juries to practise a laxity in their oaths that they might not be cruel by their verdicts. The Hon. and Learned Gentleman referred to an event which happened at the Old Bailey a few days ago, and which would go to illustrate this case. It was a trial of a party charged with coining. The Counsel who had to prosecute thought necessary to begin by assuring the jury, that even though they should convict, the prisoner should not be hanged. He (the Counsel) told the jury so, that he might get them to convict, supposing that an acquittal would follow if the jury thought the punishment ordained by the law was carried into effect—(hear, hear). The fact was, that now it could not well happen that any twelve men could be found to convict for this offence: they might violate their oaths and reject the truth, but they were only responsible to their own consciences; and they thought by saving a man from a punishment far beyond his offence. was an atonement for what they did. Some desired the office of a public prosecutor; but a public prosecutor could not prosecute without witnesses and juries. If he desired to have the laws carried into execution by the aid of the public, we should make those agreeable to the public. Let them multiply their enactments as they would, but they should make them agreeable to the feelings of men. It was long the doctrine taught at the Treasury, that the heavier the tax the greater would be the revenue; it may also be the doctrine, that the greater the punishment the fewer the crimes; but time and experience had shown, and continued to show, that these doctrines were false. The fact was, that they (the Legislature) must yield, and the question was how much they must yield. They of that House were often towards the House of Lords what they were now to the people at large. The Lords had often sent back Bills to be amended or altered. All that he now asked the House to do for the people was what they so often did for the Lords. The people were growing as powerful as the House of Lords. They only sent back this Bill to be reconsidered by the House, and he implored the House in the name of the numbers of Bankers and merchants and traders of the country to put this law upon a proper system; the present mode of punishment, instead of deterring from crime, having become a matter of disgust to those who did well, but a alaughing stock to those who did evil.

SALARIES OF ENGLISH JUDGES.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Chief Justice. £10,000 a year.
Judges. £6,000 a year each.

COMMON PLEAS.

Chief Justice. £8,000 a year.
Judges. £6,000 a year each.

EXCHEQUER.

Lord Chief Baron. £7,000 a year.
Barons. £6,000 a year.

ADVERTISEMENT.

A gentleman in the city, who has been seven or eight years in practice, and can furnish the best recommendations, would be glad to connect himself with some person of advanced standing and full business in the profession, as a partner or otherwise, on reasonable terms.—Address to A. B., at this office, with real name.

Dec. 4, 1830.

WHITMAN'S LETTERS. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN, 141 Washington Street, 'Two Letters to Rev. Moses Stuart,' on Religious Liberty, occasioned by his Letter to Rev. Wm. E. Channing. By Bernard Whitman. Jan. 1.

SIXTY MAPS of the various countries of the Globe, from the Epitome of Universal Geography. For sale at GRAY & BOWEN'S, 141 Washington Street. Price 50 cents, bound. Jan. 1.

THIS DAY PUBLISHED, by GRAY & BOWEN, an APPENDIX to the American Almanac, for the year 1831, being the latter part of the fiftyfifth, and the beginning of the fiftysixth year of the Independence of the United States.

Extract from the Preliminary Observations on the Astronomical Department of the American Almanac.

The Appendix is intended to answer all the essential purposes of a Nautical Almanac, and the insertion therein of the distances of the Moon from the Planets, and of the proportional logarithm of the difference between the distances, it is hoped, will be found an improvement on any Almanac hitherto published. Jan. 1.

LIBRARY OF EDUCATION. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN,

The Library of Education, Vol. I. —Containing 'Some Thoughts concerning Education.' By John Locke, and a 'Treatise of Education,' by John Milton, with an Appendix, containing Locke's Memoranda on Study. Edited by Wm. Russell, late editor of the Journal of Education.

Extract from the Preface.

'The present volume is intended to form one of a series of standard treatises on the subject of Education. The work now commenced will, it is hoped, form a useful source of information to parents and teachers; furnishing to the latter a sort of professional library, to which individuals may resort for assistance in the labor of instruction, and offering to the former an aid to the formation of just and extensive views of the whole scope of education, as well as a preparation for cooperating with instruction, in their exertions for the mental advancement of the young.' Jan. 1.

PARLEY'S ASIA. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN, Peter Parley's Tales about Asia, with a Map and numerous Engravings. This is designed as a fourth volume in a series of Geographical and Historical Tales for Children. Tales of America, Europe, and Africa, have already been published. Tales of Islands in the Pacific Ocean, Tales of the Sea, and Tales of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, will complete the series. These three last are in a state of forwardness.

GRAY & BOWEN, have just published, TALES OF TRAVELS West of the Mississippi, with a Map and numerous Engravings, by Solomon Bell, late keeper of the Traveller's Library, Province House Court, Boston. This volume is the first of a series which is intended to supply to the Children of the United States, an entertaining abstract of the most popular books of Travels which have lately appeared.

G. & B. also have for sale—

Peter Parley's Tales about Africa.
Peter Parley's Tales about Europe.
Peter Parley's Tales about Animals, with three hundred Engravings.
Peter Parley's Juvenile Tales.
Peter Parley's Winter Evening Tales.
Peter Parley's Geography for Children. Jan. 1.

GIRL'S OWN BOOK. This day published by CARTER, HENDEE, & BABCOCK,

'The Girl's Own Book.' By Mrs Child, author of Hobomok, and Evenings in New England, and editor of the Juvenile Miscellany.

'I have no trinkets, cakes, or toys,
As gifts for little girls and boys,
But look within, and you will find
Both food and playthings for the mind.'

The Girl's Own Book is intended for those who are too old to read merely infantile books, yet somewhat too young for such costly presents as the Annuals. It embraces a great variety of subjects: All sorts of Games and Exercises suitable for Girls—Directions for Sewing and Knitting, Needlebooks, Pincushions, Purses, Boxes, and Bags of all sorts—Charades, Puzzles, &c.—Fables, Stories, and Maxims, Poetry, Gardening, Silk Worms, and Bees. Jan. 1.

AMERICAN ALMANAC, Second Edition. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN, The American Almanac and Repository of Useful Knowledge, Vol. II., for the year 1831. Jan. 1.

GRAY AND BOWEN, have just received, No. 1, of SURGICAL ANATOMY OF THE ARTERIES, with plates and illustrations. By Nathan R. Smith, M. D. Professor of Surgery in the University of Maryland. January 1.

WORKING MEN'S PARTY. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN, 141 Washington Street, A Lecture on the Working Men's Party, delivered before the Charlestown Lyceum, October 6, 1830. By Edward Everett.

MALTE-BRUN SCHOOL GEOGRAPHY.—This day published by CARTER, HENDEE, & BABCOCK, The Malte-Brun School Geography, illustrated by numerous original engravings, and an Atlas of 19 Maps, Charts, and Tables. By S. Griswold Goodrich. Jan. 1.

EVENTS IN PARIS, during the 26, 27, 28, and 29th of July, 1830. By several eye witnesses. Translated from the fourth Paris edition. This day published by CARTER, HENDEE, & BABCOCK.

GRAY & BOWEN, have in preparation, and will very shortly put to press,

A NEW DICTIONARY OF MEDICAL SCIENCE AND LITERATURE; which will contain a concise account of the various subjects in Anatomy, Physiology, Pathology, Therapeutics, Materia Medica, Surgery, Obstetrics, and Pharmacy, with the Etymology and Orthoepy of the terms of their Greek, Latin, French, and German synonymes;—a copious Bibliography appended to the different articles, and Biographical Notices of the most eminent Authors in the different departments of Medical Science, with a Catalogue of their principal works mentioned and an Epitome of the existing state of Medical Science and Literature. By Robley Dunglison, M. D. Professor of Medicine in the University of Virginia &c, &c.

While many of the nations of Continental Europe possess Dictionaries, which have kept pace with the advancing condition of Medical Science, Great Britain and America possess it may be said, but one of a concise character,—that of Hooper,—which independently of its want of attraction in many points, is incontestibly far behind the present state of Medical Science and Literature, and unfit for the purposes of the Medical Student. In proof of this, it will be sufficient to remark, that the New Dictionary will contain at least five thousand words more than are to be found in that publication,—while the circumstance of the Dictionary of Hooper being stereotyped in this country, renders it impracticable to make the necessary additions to it, were the ground work such as to render such a course advisable.

The work will not be a mere Dictionary of terms; it will comprise concise histories of diseases: a description and doses of various kinds of medicine, with formula for the different Pharmacentrical preparations, &c, &c.

The important publications daily appearing in France and Germany, have induced the author to add the French and German synonymes to the various terms; so that the work will really contain the substance of an English, French and German Dictionary, at a comparatively trifling expense.—The French Index will be found to include every word in the 'Dictionaire des Science Medicales,' which consists of sixty volumes, as well as in the smaller Dictionaries more recently published.

Great attention has been, moreover, paid to the Greek and Latin synonymes, so that the Dictionary will, it is trusted, form a safe and convenient guide to the study of ancient and modern authors on Medicine.

It will be comprised in one large volume, 8vo. Oct. 23.

PICKERING'S REPORTS, Vol. 8th. This day published and for sale by HILLIARD, GRAY & CO. Oct. 23.

BIGELOW'S DIGEST OF PICKERING'S REPORTS. This day published by HILLIARD, GRAY, & Co. By Lewis Bigelow, Counsellor at Law: being a continuation of the Digest of Massachusetts Reports; and also a continuation of Metcalf's Digest of the same work. Neatly bound in Sheep,3,50.—Calf, $4,00

GRAY AND BOWEN, No. 141, Washington Street, Boston, have recently published the following valuable works.

I. A DESCRIPTION OF TREMONT HOUSE; WITH ARCHITECTURAL ILLUSTRATIONS.—4to.

'Jam scires ab introitu primo—herculentum et amvenum videre et diversonium.' APULEIUS, M. A V.

This work is embellished with a copper-plate engraving, representing the front of the house, and thirty lithographic prints, exhibiting the details of the structure. Its object will be understood by the following extract from the preface.

'The present publication is intended to satisfy a curiosity, which frequent inquiries for a description of Tremont House were supposed to indicate.

'Its original plan was to furnish such particulars relative to this establishment as strangers might wish to possess, but it has been extended so as to comprehend many architectural details, which will probably be interesting to mechanics; as much of the ornamental work of Tremont House was copied or adopted from books, not commonly in their hands, and has not before been executed in this country.

II. AN EPITOME OF UNIVERSAL GEOGRAPHY; or, a Description of the various Countries of the Globe; with a view of their Political Condition at the present time. With sixty Maps. By NATHAN HALE.

III. A DICTIONARY OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE; or, an Explanation of Words and Things connected with all the Arts and Sciences. Illustrated with numerous Wood Cuts. By GEORGE CRABB, A. M., Author of 'English Synonymes,' 'Technological Dictionary,' and 'Historical Dictionary.'

IV. THE VESTAL—A TALE OF POMPEII. 1 Vol. 12mo.

'Oh Time, thou beautifier of the dead,
Adorner of the ruin.' CHILDE HAROLD.

V. AUTHORSHIP. A Tale. By a New Englander over Sea. 1 Vol. 12mo.

VI. AN ORATION; Delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, Cambridge, Mass. August 26th, 1830. By the Rev. ORVILLE DEWEY.

VII. THE DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Published under the Direction of the President of the United States, from the Original Manuscripts in the Department of State, conformably to a resolution of Congress, of March 27, 1818. Edited by JARED SPARKS.

This important Correspondence, now for the first time published, will form eleven volumes. Eight are already published and the remainder will appear very shortly.

VIII. JEFFERSON'S WORKS, In four Volumes. Accompanied with a Portrait on steel, and a fac-simile of the original draft of the Declaration of Independence. Second Edition.

IX. THE NEW TESTAMENT, conformed to Griesbach's Text. 1 Vol. 12mo.

THE TOKEN, a Christmas and New Year's Present, for 1831. Edited by S. G. Goodrich.

'Then take my flower, and let its leaves
Beside thy heart be cherished near,
While that confiding heart receives
The thought it whispers to thine ear.'

The engravings for the Token of this year are executed by Cheney, Ellis, Gallaudet, and others; among the contributors are Dewey, Greenwood, Miss Sedgwick, Mrs Sigourney, Hall, Peabody, Wetmore, author of a Year in Spain, author of Tales of the Northwest, Neal, Thatcher, Mrs Hale, and others of the first reputation.

The work is larger than heretofore, and is done up in splendid embossed morocco. The literary department is considered decidedly superior to the former years, and in all respects it has received the greatest care and attention. Oct 23.

LAW BOOKS.—HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. 134 Washington Street, have on hand a large Stock of American and English Law Books, comprising a complete assortment of the best editions of all works in general use. They also purchase and sell second hand Law Books—terms liberal.

H., G. & Co. supply any volumes that may be wanted of Massachusetts or Pickering's Reports.

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 8, 1831. NO. XXIV.

MERCANTILE LAW.

CONTRACT OF SALE.

Continued.

We have been thus particular in marking out the proper limits of a sale, because by the law of England, as we now proceed to show, it is attended with important consequences. It was the policy of the Roman law, that property in things moveable should not be separated from possession. 'Proprietas' and 'dominium' were therefore convertible terms; none being treated as the owner of goods, who had not the actual control and disposition of them. It followed that a commodity, though sold, continued nevertheless the property of the seller, until delivery.* To speak technically, the sale conveyed to the buyer jus ad rem, but not jus in re—a right to demand, which was personally binding on the seller, but no title or ownership derived from the thing itself. And this is still the rule in most of the European codes, which, as we have before remarked, are in general founded on the civil law.† But by the law of England the effect of the sale, when complete as a sale, is to transfer the property in the thing sold from the seller to the buyer, who is thenceforth entitled, for the most part, to deal with it as his own, and takes upon himself the liabilities as well as the rights which are incident to ownership. A distinction so material might be expected to have occasioned a total departure of the one code from the other in one of the most important subjects of jurisprudence; and it is by no means therefore an uninteresting fact, that the corresponding exigencies of society have, notwithstanding this original difference of principle, led to practical results almost exactly similar. The English rule, if unqualified, would certainly have been productive of some inconvenience. That the ownership of goods should be in one who had no visible token of the right, and conversely, that it should not be in him who had all the outward signs of property, together with the actual power of disposal, seems a clumsy if not a mischievous contrivance. But the truth is, that every precaution was adopted for securing that notoriety, which ought always to accompany a change of property. We have already mentioned the rule which forbade the transfer of things not in possession, and the direct encouragement which was given to sales in open market. Nay, so strict were our ancestors in this latter respect, that, according to the Mirrour, the sale of everything above the value of twenty pence, except in open market, was prohibited;* and every bargain was directed to be contracted in the presence of credible witnesses.† Indeed there was a law of William the Conqueror, that no one should buy either dead or live goods of the value of fourpence, without the testimony of four men either of the borough or vill; and if the thing was challenged and he had no such testimony, he should not be allowed to litigate the matter, but should restore the goods to the owner.* But another and a very wise precaution was this: no bargain unaccompanied by delivery was considered final, so as to bind the goods, unless either the whole or part of the price was paid, or at least some token passed between the parties by way of solemn assurance as well as evidence of the contract, and thence appropriately termed the earnest.† Not that this custom of giving earnest was by any means confined to England. On the contrary, it seems to have been a universal practice among all partly civilized nations,‡ and is indeed well suited to the simplicity of times when traffic is comparatively rare, and carried on for the most part in fairs and markets. Even at this day it is the usual mode of concluding bargains at such places among those who deal in cattle and such primitive articles of wholesale barter.

A moment's glance, however, at the vast and intricate transactions of modern commerce, in which bargains are made between parties separated from each other by half the sphere, will serve to show how little such a mode of assurance is adapted to present circumstances. If, indeed, what may well be doubted, the giving of earnest ever prevailed in what are now understood under the name of mercantile contracts, it soon necessarily fell into disuse; and the legislature was called upon to provide new methods, better adapted to the times, for securing that public evidence of a transfer, without which ownership ought not to be acquired, and for checking the frauds and perjuries resulting from private bargains, made, or alleged to have been made, by word of mouth only. For this purpose it was enacted, by the seventeenth section of the famous statute of frauds, (29 Chas. 2. c. 3.*) passed, as the preamble recites, 'for the prevention of many fraudulent practices, which are commonly endeavored to be upheld by perjury and subordination of perjury; that no contract for the sale of any goods, wares, and merchandizes for the price of 10*l.* or upwards, shall be good except the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold and actually receive the same; or give something in earnest to bind the bargain, or in part-payment; or that some note or memorandum in writing of the said bargain be made and signed by the parties to be charged by such contract, or their agents thereunto lawfully authorized.'

Some of the requisites of this clause have evidently been adopted from the ancient rule of law, which we have alluded to above. But there is this material difference—before the statute, the bargain bound the person from the first, though it did not bind the goods until earnest or part-payment or delivery; whereas, now, unless the requisites of the statute be complied with, the contract does not impose even a personal obligation, and may, in fact, be avoided altogether. It must be recollected, moreover, that a verbal sale although subsequently attested by a written memorandum, or rendered valid by compliance with the statute in some other respect, is not complete so as to transfer the property until that requisite has been performed; in which respect, though with some additions, it substantially follows the rule of the common law.

In analyzing the members of this important clause, the first question which presents itself is—what is meant by the words 'no contract for the sale of any goods,' &c? To which the obvious answer is, a contract whereby goods are sold. This definition, of course, excludes all those cases which have been mentioned above, in which the subject of the contract is not some specific thing existing at the time as the thing contracted for, and includes all sales which may be properly termed executory or conditional.† Simple, however as it seems, this interpretation was not settled without a struggle. To use the language of Chief Justice Pratt, the statute was for some time supposed to 'relate only to contracts for the actual sale of goods, where the buyer is immediately answerable, without time given him by a special agreement, and the seller is to deliver the goods immediately.'‡ How such a narrow construction could ever have been admitted, may well be thought strange: it seems, however, to have arisen from this circumstance, that the earlier cases were of bargains, which were not strictly sales at all, but rather orders for things to be done; but the Court in deciding them, having used expressions

---

* Traditionibus dominia rerum non nudis pactis transferuntur. Cod. de Pact. 1. 2. tit. 3. 1. 20. And see Bell's Comm. p. 166. et seq.

† Such was anciently the law of France, as appears by the following passage from Pothier, Traité du droit de propriété, tom. iv. p. 436. 'Les conventions seules et par elles mêmes ne produisent que des obligations: c'est leur nature; c'est pour cela qu'elles sont etablies. Ces obligations ne donnent a celui, envers qui elles ont été contractées, qu'un droit contre la personne qui les a contractées. Ce droit est bien un droit par rapport a la chose qu'on s'est obligé de nous donner; mais ce ne peutê tre un droit dans la chose; c'est encore moins le domain de la chose.' 'De ce principe que le domaine d'une chose ne peut ordinairement passer que par la tradition de la chose il suit que quelque convention que j'aie avé cune personne qui s'est obligée de me donner une certain chose, tant qu'elle ne m'en a pas fait la tradition réelle ou feinte, elle en demure toujours la proprietaire.' But the framers of the Code Napoleon have changed the law in this respect, and adopted the English rule. La propriété est acquise de droit à l'acheteur à l'égard du vendeur, des qu'on est convenu de la chose et du prix, quoique la chose n'ait pas encore été livrée ni le prix payé. Code Civile, 1583. In Scotland the rule of the civil law still prevails.

* Mirrour, cap. 1. s. 3. p. 14.

† Ll. Ethel. 10. 12. Ll. Edg. Wilk. 80, cited in Ross on Sales, ch. 3.

* Ll. Wm. the Conq. 43. Ibid.

† Perficitur autem emptio et venditio cum affectu [qu. effectu?] ex quo de pretio inter contrahentes convenerit, ita tamen quod secuta fuerit rei emptæ et venditæ traditio, vel quod pretium fuerit solutum, totum sive pars, vel saltem quod arrhæ inde fuerint datæ et receptæ. Glanvil, 1. 10. c. 14. Emptio vero et venditio contrahitur cum de pretio convenerit inter contrahentes, dum tamen a venditore arrarum nomine receptum fuerit, quia quod arrarum nomine datum est argumentum est emptionis et venditionis contractæ. Bracton, 1. 2. c. 27.

‡ So in the civil law, 'Quod sæpe arrhæ nomine pro emptione datur non eo pertinet, quasi sine arrha conventio nihil proficient, sed ut evidentius probari possit de pretio. Inst. 1. 35. sec. De Contr. Empt. And see 2 Bl. Com. 446.

* Supposed to have been framed by Sir Mathew Hale. North's Life of Guilford, 109. A statute, which, if it had been adhered to in its original simplicity, might have deserved the eulogy of Lord Ellenborough, who pronounced it 'one of the wisest laws in our Statute Book.' 1 East. 194.

† Alexander v. Comber, 1 H. Bl. 20.

‡ Towers v. Osborne, 1 Str. 506.

larger than were necessary, the dicta were caught up and converted into precedents. We are indebted to the strong sense of Lord Loughborough for restoring the statute to its efficacy. In Rondeau v. Wyatt,* the defendant, a miller, had entered into a verbal agreement to sell and deliver to the plaintiff 3000 sacks of flour, to be put into sacks which the plaintiff was to send to the mill, and to be shipped on board vessels for exportation. It was said that the contract was executory, and therefore not within the statute of frauds, but Lord Loughborough, in giving the judgment of the Court against that position observed, 'It is singular that an idea could ever prevail that this section of the statute was only applicable to cases where the bargain was immediate, for it seems plain from the words made use of, that it was meant to regulate executory as well as other contracts. And, indeed, it seems that this provision of the statute would not be of much use, unless it were to extend to executory contracts; for it is from bargains, to be completed at a future period, that the uncertainty and confusion will probably arise, which the statute was designed to prevent.' From that time the decision has been uniformly acquiesced in,† and consequently whatever is a contract of sale properly so called, falls within the provisions of the statute.‡

In this view, there would be little difficulty in determining à priori, that sales by auction were expressly included. Yet this also was long a matter of controversey. Lord Mansfield, regarding rather the supposed intention, than the plain words of the legislature, gave it as 'the inclination of his opinion,' that sales by auction were not contemplated, and therefore not included in the act.§ It was thought that 'the solemnity and publicity of that kind of sale precluded all perjury as to the act of sale itself;' but the fallacy as well as the danger of such reasoning was afterwards laid bare by Lord Ellenborough, whose manifest opinion it was, that there was no reason for the exception.‖ At length it became necessary that the point should be determined, and accordingly in Kenworthy v. Schofield,* the opinion of Lord Ellenborough was ratified by a decision of the Court.

To be continued.

* 2 Hen. Bl. 63.

† Cooper v. Elstone, 7 T. R. 15.

‡ Garbutt v. Watson, 5 B. & A. 613, which may be considered as having overruled Clayton v. Andrews: 4 Burr. 200 1.

§ In Simon v. Metivier, 1 Bl. Rep. 601. Mr Justice Wilmot strongly concurred in the reasoning of the Ch. Justice.

‖ In Hinde v. Whitehouse, 7 East, 568. There is so much excellent and masculine sense in the observations of the Chief Justice, that we shall do a favor by transcribing them. 'It has been said that sales by auction are not within the statute.' His Lordship then alludes to the opinions and reasoning of Lord Mansfield, and Mr Justice Wilmot, and continues thus: 'with all deference to these opinions, I do not at present feel any sufficient reason for dispensing with the express requisition of a memorandum in writing, in a statute applying to all sales of goods above the value of 10*l.* without exception, merely because the quantum of parol evidence, in case of auction, is likely to render the danger of perjury less considerable. That argument in a degree applies to all sales in market overt: and if we once get loose from the positive words of the statute, it will soon become a question only of the quantum and degree of perjury in each particular instance; which opens a door to an indefiniteness of construction, founded on all the varying circumstances of the time and frequency of the persons attending the place of sale, and the like; which would be destructive of all certainty of practice, and render the rule of the statute perhaps more mischievous than beneficial, to the trading world who are to be governed by it.' Reflections such as these ought ever to be present to the minds of those, whose calling it is to administer and expound the laws.

* 2 B. & C. 945, per Bayley and Holroyd, Js. The same construction had before been put upon the words 'agreement for sale,' in the 4th section of the same statute. 12 Ves. 466, 13 Ves. 25. 1 B. & P. 206. 2 Taunt. 38. 4 Taunt. 209. 15 Ves. 516. 3 V. & B. 57.

LORD KEEPER GUILFORD.

Continued from page 180.

'The evening that we went upon this errand to Whitehall,' says Roger North, 'some of us stayed in expectation of his coming home, which was not till near ten; little doubting the change that was to happen. At last he came with more splutter than ordinary, divers persons (for honor) waiting, and others attending to wish him joy, and a rabble of officers that belonged to the seal completing the crowd which filled his little house. His lordship, by despatching these incumbrances, got himself clear as fast as he could, and then I alone stayed with him. He took a turn or two in his diningroom and said nothing, by which I perceived his spirits were very much roiled; therefore I kept silence also, expecting what would follow. There was no need of asking what news when the purse with the great seal lay upon the table. At last his lordship's discourses and actions discovered that he was in a very great passion, such as may be termed agony, of which I never saw in him any like appearance since I first knew him. He had kept it in long, and after he was free it broke out with greater force, and, accordingly, he made use of me to ease his mind upon. That which so much troubled him, was the being thought so weak as to take ill usage from those about the king (meaning the Earl of Rochester), with whom he had lived well, and ought to have been better understood. And instead of common friendship, to be haggled withal about a pension, as at the purchase of a horse or an ox, and after he had declared positively not to accept without a pension, as if he were so frivolous to insist and desist all in a moment, and, as it were, to be wheedled and charmed by their insignificant tropes; and, what was worse than all, as he more than once repeated, "to think me worthy of so great a trust, and withal so little and mean as to endure such usage as was disobliging, inconsistent, and insufferable. What have I done," said he, "that may give them cause to think me of so poor a spirit as to be thus trifled with?" And so on with much more of like animosity, which I cannot undertake to remember. And, after these exhalations, I could perceive that by degrees his mind became more composed.'

Upon taking his seat in the court of chancery, the first object of the lord-keeper was to reform, so far as lay in his own power, the abuses of the court. 'The greatest pain he endured,' says his biographer, 'moved from a sense he had of the torment the suitors underwent by the excessive charges and delays of the court; for the easing of whom he was always in thought more or less, to contrive ways and means of expedition and retrenchment of charges.' The variety of opposing interests rendered this a difficult task; but the lord keeper proposed to accomplish it gradually, without alarming the officers of the court by the introduction of a sudden and violent reform. 'As occasion proffered, he declared his mind, and retrenched many superfluities, or rather nuisances, in the court.' One of his first measures was to put an end to the innumerable motions for speeding or delaying the hearing of causes. His next attempt was to reform the practice with regard to the masters' reports. 'His lordship also' says Roger North, 'set himself to stop the superfetation of orders: and they were a subject of his daily reprehension; for the causes often came to a hearing with a file of orders in the solicitor's bundle as big as the Common Prayer-Book, for commissions, injunctions, publications, speedings, delayings, and other interlocutories, all dear ware to the client in every respect. But in a few terms his lordship reduced the quantities, for he was strict to the observance of his rules; and for the most part refused to make orders nisi, &c, as commonly was prayed, when notice was not given of the motion.' Much delay was also prevented by refusing re-hearings and re-references except upon the most substantial cause. Lastly, the state of the register's office engaged his lordship's attention; but he found it very difficult 'to break the neck of those wicked delays used there.' It is not improbable, that if the lord keeper had held the seals a few years longer, he would have published a book of orders; which as his biographer observes 'would have gone a great way towards purging out the pecant humors of the court.' During his administration in the court of chancery, the lord keeper was not altogether free from suspicion of that corruption which was unfortunately not very rare at that period;* but there appears to be no sufficient foundation for such imputations.

At the period when the lord keeper ascended the woolsack, he found an administration with whose views, for the most part, he concurred. But on the accession of Sunderland and Godolphin, and more especially of the Lord Chief Justice Jefferies, to the cabinet, the position of the lord keeper became a very painful one. Being himself a resolute protestant, he ran counter to the designs of the other ministers; who, better acquainted than himself with the secret wishes of the king, were desirous of pushing the prerogative to its greatest extent, in defence of the persecuted papists. Accordingly, on a motion made by Jefferies to grant a general pardon to the imprisoned recusants, the lord keeper was the only member of the cabinet who opposed the design. 'That night,' says his biographer, 'his lordship came home full of melancholy; and it was some time before any person near him knew the occasion of it. But he would sometimes break out in exclamations, as—"What can be the meaning! Are they all stark mad?" and the like.' The policy observed by the lord keeper at court was that of the old English Tory; and he looked with great jealousy upon those intemperate advisers who would have persuaded the king to resort to measures of violence.

His mode of life at this period is thus described by his brother:—'His lordship's method of living, with respect to his great employment, was very commendable; for all his time was devoted to the business incumbent on him. He put but very little of it to his own use; and what passed in easy conversation, which was the chief of his pleasures, had still a regard to his employ, by inquiring, canvassing, and debating, with those of his society, such points as concerned the republic. He had no kind of vice or immorality within his walls; and of what sort his remissions were (for some are necessary to life) I shall give a fuller account afterwards. But it is decent here to name the chief, which was a solitary, or rather speculative, use of music, of which he commonly took a relish at his going to bed; for which end he had a harpischord at his bedchamber-door which a friend touched to his voice. But he cared not a set of masters to consort it with him. And, unless it were once under Purcell's conduct, I never knew him use such; for there was somewhat stiff in that way that was not easy. The mornings were for the most part devoted to the justice-seat of the chancery, either in the court at Westminster or in the cause-room at home, during the usual periods, and not seldom in attendances upon petitions, and despatching the perpetual emergencies of the seal. His house was kept in state and plenty, though not so polite as the court-mode was. The nobility and chief gentry coming to London were frequent at his table: and after a solemn service of tea in a withdrawing-room, the company usually left him, and then the cause-room claimed him, and held him in pain with causes and exceptions often till late. He had little time to himself, for he had this infirmity, that he could not bear to make any one wait; but if his servant told him of any person, great or small, that waited without, he could not apply to think of or do anything till he had despatched him. The interval between the business of the day and going to bed was his chief refreshment, for then his most familiar friends came to him, and the time passed merrily enough: and then it was that the court-spies found access to plumb his most free sentiments, but with small profit, he had the same face and profession in public as he had in private; they could discover only that he was an honest man: but more of this elsewhere. His attendances at Whitehall were chiefly at solemn times, as on Sunday morning to wait on the king to chapel. That was usually a grand assembly of the court, and the great men had opportunity to speak in discourse to the king as he gave them occasion, of which his majesty was no niggard; and very excellent things said there on the one side and on the other were a high regale to such as had the advantage to stand within hearing. On the week-days, those called the council-days always, and sometimes committees of council, required his lordship's attendance; and Thursday was always public; others for private business upon summons.'

* See the Lives of the Chancellors, vol. i, p. 178.

On the death of Charles II., the prospects of the lord keeper suffered a material change. 'With the death of this good master and sovereign all his lordship's hopes and joys perished; and the rest of his life, which lasted not long after, was but a slow dying.' Although on the accession of James there was no appearance of displacing him, yet it was obvious to an accurate observer, that he could not, for any long space of time, be allowed to retain both the seals and the principles which he had hitherto professed. His unfitness for the part which it was expected he should act soon became apparent. On the question as to the levying of the tonnage and poundage, which had only been granted to the crown during the life of Charles II., the Lord Chief Justice Jefferies advised the king to issue a proclamation, commanding the collection and payment of the tax as before. To this proposition, so clearly illegal, the lord keeper would not consent, but proposed a course which, though not strictly constitutional, yet bore some semblance of a regard for the laws. He advised that the proclamation should require the duties to be collected and paid into the exchequer, there to await the disposal of parliament. 'But it seems,' says Roger North, 'that this was too low and trimming for the state of the court at that time, and a positive proclamation issued.' Upon another occasion the lord keeper rendered himself still more obnoxious to the court. At the elections for the new parliament he employed not only his private interest, but that which his office gave him, in procuring the nomination of persons ill calculated to forward the views of the sovereign. 'His lordship's design was to have the parliament truly church of England protestants, and loyal to the crown: which character he thought aptest to establish the religion and laws of the kingdom, and to resist all attempts of altering any of our fundamentals in church and state.' The displeasure of the court at this line of conduct was manifested on the opening of parliament, when the lord keeper, contrary to usual custom, was not permitted to prepare the king's speech, nor was he even consulted on that which was delivered. The feelings of a king are speedily communicated to his courtiers, and the lord keeper soon found himself in general discredit. His decrees were questioned or, as his biographer expresses it, 'most brutishly and effrontuously arraigned:' while at court and at council 'nothing squared with his schemes;' and he was, 'by Sunderland, Jefferies, and their accomplices, little less than derided.'—Declining thus in favor at court, disturbed with the measures which he there beheld in contemplation, harassed with the thankless toils of office, the lord keeper, dispirited and depressed, was unable to contend with the adverse circumstances by which he was surrounded. He was attacked by a severe illness, which yielded at last, in some degree, to medicine and he resumed his duties for a short time. But the fever from which he was suffering appears never to have been thoroughly subdued; and the following is the melancholy picture given by his brother of his state at this period:—'His feverish disease growing upon him, his spirits, and all that should buoy a man up under oppression, not only failed, but other things of a malign complexion succeeded to bring him lower: which may be fully understood by this circumstance. He took a fancy that he looked out of countenance as he as he termed it; that is, as one a shamed, or as if he had done ill, and not with that face of authority as he used to bear; and for that reason, when he went into Westminster hall, in the summer term, he used to take nosegays of flowers to hold before his face, that people might not discern his dejection; and once in private having told me this fancy, he asked me if I did not perceive it. I answered him, not in the least, nor did I believe any one else did observe any such thing; but that he was not well in health as he used to be was plain enough. His lordship in this state took a resolution to quit the great seal, and went to my Lord Rochester to intercede with his majesty to accept it, which had been no hard matter to obtain. But that noble lord had no mind to part with such a screen, and at that time (as he told me himself) he diverted him. But his lordship persisted as will be made appear afterwards, by a letter. Whereupon the Lord Rochester obtained of the king, that his lordship might retire with the seal into the country; and that the officers with their concerns should attend him there, in hopes that by the use of the waters and fresh air he might recover his health against next winter, when it was hoped he would return perfectly recovered. This was indeed a royal condescension and singular favor to him.'

The hopes of a recovery were vain. The lord keeper retired to Wroxton, in Oxfordshire, where he lingered some time, suffering much in body and temper from the effects of his disease. The closing scene of his life is thus described by his brother:—

'It was the opinion of the people about him, and the doctor's desire (who was the most afflicted man in the world), that Doctor Radcliffe, then in the neighborhood, should be called, in which was done; not that his friends expected any benefit, but to satisfy some of the living, who would not be convinced. The doctor came; and by his lordship's bed-side he asked him I am sure no less than fifty questions, which were a fatigue and trouble to him, and all that were in the room. The doctor had his fee, but not the ingenuity to say what he knew, viz. that there were no hopes; but talked of the lungs being touched or not, which signified nothing. His lordship afterwards showed much discontent that he was not well attended; and if Sir Dudley North or I was absent, he called it slighting him; and we were, indeed, glad sometimes to escape for half an hour to breathe. This confirmed the approach of death, of which the not caring to be left alone is a constant symptom. He began to agonise and be convulsed; and by virtue of the doctor's cordials lived longer than was for his good. After some striving, he would lie down, and then get up again. He advised us not to mourn for him; yet commended an old maid-servant for her good will, that said, 'As long as there is life there is hope.' At length, having strove a little to rise, he said, 'It would not do;' and then with patience and resignation lay down for good and all and expired 5th Sept. 1685.'

On the following day the executors carried the great seal to the king at Windsor, who observed that 'he had heard his lordship was much mended;' and asking whether there was not a purse to contain the seal, dismissed them without further remark.

To be continued.

ENGLISH CASES.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH—JULY.

Sittings in London before Lord Tenterden and Common Juries.

Redden vs. Alexander.

This was an action by the plaintiff, a merchant, against the owners of the Thalia, an East Indiaman, to recover the value of a cargo of provisions which were lost by the Thalia running down 'the Providence,' the vessel which was carrying it at sea. It appeared that the Providence, burden 136 tons, had been freighted by the plaintiff to carry a cargo of provisions from Limerick to London. On the 17th May, 1822, the Providence, was on her voyage, and at about 12 at night, the watch saw a vessel which proved to be the Thalia, coming across her course, the latter vessel carrying about 700 tons, and bound for the East Indies. It was proved that in the situation in which the two vessels were placed with respect to each other, the Thalia ought to have kept her course, and the Providence ought to 'bear up.' The Providence did so in the expectation that the Thalia would keep her wind. The latter, however, bore up as well, and the consequence was that both vessels came in contact with great violence, and in a few minutes the Providence went to the bottom. The mate of the Providence escaped into the forechains of the Thalia, and the crew of the latter escaped with great difficulty by cutting away the jolly boat, and ultimately joined the Thalia. The mate of the Providence now deposed, that when the two vessels were entangled with each other, he desired the Captain of the Thalia to save the men, and he replied, 'Oh, boom her off and let them go to the devil.' In the concussion, one of the masts of the Providence broke and fell across the hatchway. One of the seamen who was below, stated in his cross examination by Sir J. Scarlett, that he had suffered much from the fright, as he was a fat man before the accident, and now he was a lean one.

It was contended for the defendant, that the mate of the Providence, who now deposed that he was at the helm, had admitted since the accident that he had gone below to look at the Captain's watch, and had left the care of the helm to a boy when the accident happened.

The Jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, the amount of damages to be settled out of Court.

---

ROLLS COURT—JULY.

Livesey vs. Harding.

Mr Agar stated the case for the plaintiff. This was a supplemental bill and bill of reviver, filed to establish the will of a person named Edmund Livesey, under the following circumstances. The testator, who died in the year 1816, had been a man addicted to drunkenness to an excess sufficient to reduce him to a state of almost constant derangement. In a lucid interval, he had made a singular sort of will, by which he devised his freehold property, after the death of his wife, to his eldest son in tail, with remainder to his daughters in tail, omitting, without any implied motive, his second and third sons. The original bill had been filed to establish this will, and the eldest son of the testator had not, in his answer, impugned it. He died, however, before the hearing or decree, and this bill had been filed to make the second son of the testator a defendant as heir at law. That person, finding himself ousted, by the will, of the freehold, determined to oppose its establishment on the ground of his father's derangement, or of improper influence exerted on him at the time of making it. He sought to obtain an issue of divisavit vel non, but, as the first heir at law had admitted the will, the Learned Counsel submitted that the Court would not permit his successor to retract that admission.

Mr Preston, on the same side, maintained that the object of the defendant was contrary to the decided practice of the Court, which at the most, would have allowed the first heir at law to retract his own admission.

Mr Duckworth, on the same side submitted that the defendant had acquiesced, during his brother's life time, in the provisions of the will, under which he, at least, had been entitled to 1,000*l.* and that the evidence of improper influence had endeavored to prove insanity had shown that on the day of signing the will the testator had been free from his usual visitation of inebriety.

Mr Treslove, for the defendant, said that this was a question of practice, and that, from the case of Sleeman v. Sleeman, in 2d Dickin's, 787, there could be no doubt that a second succeeding heir at law could retract the admission of a will's validity made by his predecessor. The circumstances of this case fully justified such a course. The testator had been reduced by habitual drunkenness to the lowest state of imbecility. Of this the strongest proof was that, in the year 1810, he had executed two deeds under the directions of some of the defendants in this case, the Messrs Harding of Liverpool—one a mortgage of his property to them for 3,000*l.* the other a deed by which he devised it to them in trust for his own maintenance during his life—thus leaving himself at their mercy, with other singular provisions which had given rise to the bill. He, in fact, from that time received only 60*l.* a year, and took up his abode at an alehouse.

Mr Ward followed on the same side.

His Honor said that, in this case, the heir at law had admitted that the will had been well executed; he had also admitted the sanity of the testator at the time of making it. Nothing had appeared in the case which would have induced the Court to have relieved him from the effects of his admission; all the statements had supposed him to have been aware of the chief circumstances which threw a doubt on the capacity of the testator to manage his affairs under ordinary circumstances—namely, the deed of 1810. If the heir at law could not have been relieved, how was it possible to suppose that the Court could relieve the defendant? He (the Master of the Rolls) could not assent to the case cited by Mr Treslove. Mr Dickens had not been a correct reporter. He should, therefore, refuse the relief sought by the defendant, and not allow the issue of devisavit vel non.

---

Greenwood vs. Taylor.

Mr Bickersteth stated that the bill in this case had been filed by the creditors of the late Duke of York against his executors, and came on, on exceptions to the Master's report. On the 3d of February, 1827, the decree of that Court had been made, directing an account of the estates and debts of his Royal Highness. Among other claimants who came forward in consequence of the decree was the exceptant, Charles Davis. It appeared that, in January, 1801, the Duke of York executed a bond, in favor of this individual, for a sum of 5,350*l.*, to secure a debt amounting to one half this penalty. This remained in the hands of Davis till his death, which took place in 1822, when his executors instituted an action on it against his Royal Highness, and judgment was obtained on default, in Hilary, 1823. After the decree in this Court had been obtained, the executors of Davis carried his claim before the Master, who after some difficulty, and the confirmation of one affidavit, allowed the judgment. This not having satisfied the executors of his Royal Highness, a warrant to review the Master's decision was taken out, when a young gentleman, named Finmore, who from his age, could have known nothing personally of the matter, took upon himself to assert that the bond had been given to Davis for money lost at play, and consequently, the debt should not be allowed. It was thought extraordinary that the information of such a person should have been taken at all. The Master, however, thought there was sufficient ground to require evidence respecting his allegation; accordingly evidence was taken, and witnesses were examined, on interrogatories, without notice having been given to the parties chiefly interested, and the claim was finally disallowed. It was objected to the Master that the evidence was exparte, and could not be used. He maintained, however, that it could be taken as affidavits, and could be replied to by counter affidavits. The witnesses for the claimant were, however, voluntary, and he could not compel them to make affidavits. Besides this objection, the claimant submitted that the Master could not come justly to the conclusion against him, for it did not appear that any of the witnesses had a knowledge of the bond, the debt, or the transactions connected with it. The attesting witness to the bond had been Mr Greenwood, one of the plaintiffs; he only had been present at its execution—the other parties knew nothing of the matter. They deposed generally that Davis had been in the habit of attending the Tennis Court, St James street, kept by a man named Mucklow; that they had known the the Duke of York to frequent the same place in the year 1788, and 10 years subsequently; that the Duke used to bet with Davis and had no doubt given him the bond in question as security for his losses. Unfortunately for these surmises, the bond was dated in the year 1801, three years after the time alluded to by these witnesses. Unfortunately for them, also, they deposed that the Duke had not been in the habit of paying off his losses with money, but that Mucklow kept an account which he handed over to Mr Adams, the Duke's agent, who gave bonds in security to the claimants. In fact, many of those bonds, attested by Mucklow and Adams, were forthcoming; but the bond of the claimants in the present case had been attested by an agent of the Duke for matters very different from those in which Mr Adams appeared—by Mr Greenwood, of the firm of Greenwood, Cox, and Co.

His Honor—Was Mr Greenwood examined?

Mr Bickersteth—No, Sir, he is one of the plaintiffs to the bill. The Learned Counsel then read the evidence of John Mucklow, David Moor, W. Ellis, W. Clark, the Right Hon. the Earl of Cavan, and one or two others, which described Davis as a gambler, a haunter of cockpits, tennis courts and races, but which was vague in respect to the question at issue. This was the only evidence on which the Master had adopted his decision, and had thought proper to disallow this claim of Davis, or rather of his personal representatives, as that individual was dead. For all that had appeared before the Master the bond was perfectly unexceptionable. It stood thus on inquiry. The bond had been given in 1801; in 1823 the action had been brought on it, judgment had gone by default. His Royal Highness had made no defence, and had not paid, probably for reasons which every body could understand.

His Honor—I think, Mr Bickersteth, this is entirely a case of presumption, and for a Jury to decide. I think I shall direct an action.

Mr Bickersteth—If your Honor has any doubt.

His Honor—I am afraid, if I should indulge in conclusions I should have no doubt. Mr Greenwood should be examined. Probably he is the only person who can give an account of the transaction.

After some conversation between Mr Bickersteth and Mr Stewart, who appeared to support the Master's report, it was agreed, with the sanction of his Honor, that the question should be decided by a Jury in an action, without prejudice to the judgment of 1823.

Mr Wigram, who appeared for the executors of the late Duke of York, said he desired it to be expressly understood, that in this matter the executors had been quiescent. The creditors were the active opponents of the claimant.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Sittings at Westminster, before Chief Justice TINDAL and a Common Jury.

Baker vs. Napper and Another.

Mr Miller opened the pleadings. The plaintiff sought to recover compensation in damages for certain defamatory words uttered by the defendant.

Mr Sergeant Wilde stated the case. This action was brought against the defendant in consequence of his wife having used certain words, imputing to the plaintiff that he had murdered his wife. Mr Baker and the defendant were lightermen, and lived at Old Brentford. The plaintiff was a man advanced in years, and some time since, had the misfortune to lose his wife. Shortly after some dispute arose between the present parties, during which Mrs Napper accused the plaintiff of having murdered his wife. This having been said in the presence of several neighbors, and likely to injure the plaintiff's character, he insisted on Mrs Napper's retracting the charge; but she refused to do so; and, as the accusation was made in such a place as Brentford, it soon became scattered about, and was calculated to do the plaintiff a great deal of injury. The plaintiff, not being able to obtain a contradiction of the defamatory statement was under the necessity of bringing this action in order to clear his character; and he hoped the verdict of a Jury would have that effect.

Several witnesses stated that they were present at the dispute in question. It was a quarrel between the plaintiff and the defendant. While Mr Baker had hold of the defendant's hand Mrs Napper came up, and said to her husband—'Come away, my dear, or he (the plaintiff) will kill you as he did his wife;' and she added, addressing herself to the plaintiff—'Oh, you good-for-nothing gallant old dog, you know you murdered your wife!'—(laughter.)

A letter from the plaintiff's attorney to the defendant was read. It was written to request the defendant to retract the injurious expressions which had been used, but no answer was received by the plaintiff.

Mr Serjeant Taddy (with whom was Mr Comyn) in addressing the Jury for the defendant, observed that the last part of the plaintiff's case—namely, putting in the attorney's letter—was a mere flourish on the part of his Learned Friend, and showed the real object for bringing this action. If proceedings were to be commenced for all the vulgar words used in the creeks and narrow alleys of Old Brentford, this Court would have plenty to do to settle the various disputes between the waterman and their fair partners. The plaintiff did not complain of anything done to him by the defendant, but of what was said by his wife, and the question was whether she had received provocation for the language imputed to her. What was the fact? Mrs Napper, acting the part of a tender spouse, wished to prevent her husband from fighting; and when she went to separate him from the plaintiff, the latter addressed to her this complimentary salutation—'Go home, Mrs Crabshaw'—(a laugh). He did not know what was insinuated by Mrs Crabshaw, but he was told it meant Mrs Abershaw—(laughter). There was a great mistake about the meaning of the words used by Mrs Napper, for she never meant to charge the plaintiff with having murdered his wife in the felonious sense of the word, but probably insinuated, as the expression 'Gallant old dog' seemed to imitate, that the plaintiff's wife died of grief at her husband's gallantry with some of the fair ladies of Old Brentford—(a laugh).

Mr Sergeant Wilde—Then Mrs Napper meant that the plaintiff was to kill her husband in the same way, for she said, 'He'll kill you as he did his wife.'—(Much laughter.)

Mr Sergeant Taddy said it was not fair for his Learned Friend to interrupt him in that way, as it was now his turn to sit down and remain quiet. He was, however, certain that the Jury would see that this was a case from Old Brentford, where people were abusing each other from morning till night, and that they would not give the plaintiff more than a farthing damages.

The Learned Judge left the case to the Jury without any comment.

After a few moments' consideration the Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, One Shilling.

Both parties will have to pay their costs, the verdict not being to the amount of 40s.

---

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

Bradley vs. Heath.

The question for the decision of the Court in this case was, whether the executors of a party deceased were liable for the payment of a certain rate of interest upon a debt due from the testator to the plaintiff, under these circumstances:—The plaintiff in the life-time of the testator, had done a considerable quantity of work, in his capacity as a blacksmith for the deceased's farm, and after the death of the testator, he also did some further work for the said farm. Having demanded from the executors of the deceased the payment of the balance of his account, they, not finding it convenient to pay him, agreed to pay him five per cent interest on his debt, until it should be paid off, and they signed a memorandum of an agreement to that effect. The question now was, whether that interest which they agreed to pay, and which was not an interest properly arising on the debt, should be paid out of the assets of the testator's estate; or whether the executors had not rendered themselves liable, personally, to the payment of it, by the memorandum which they had signed?

The Vice-Chancellor was of opinion that as the executors had in this case done that which, as executors, they could not have been compelled to do, the signing of the agreement must be taken as a contract by them to pay the interest, and they should be therefore considered as having made themselves personally responsible for the interest on the balance agreed upon.

---

RECENT AMERICAN DECISIONS.

SERVITUDES.

1. Every privilege in derogation of the rights of the owner of land is viewed with jealousy by the law, and is confined to the limits and objects prescribed by the grant. Taylor vs. Hampton, 4 M'Cord, 96.

2. Thus when a person claims the right of keeping up a pond of water, which overflows the land of another; the pond must be kept within its prescribed limits, that is, the height to which it was kept at the time of the purchase, and the use must be limited to the specific object to which it was then applied. Ib.

3. By the extinguishment of a servitude, is meant its annihilation, and not its suspension only. Ib.

4. A right to overflow the land of another is an incorporeal hereditament, and if extinguished for a moment, cannot be revived. Ib.

5. Servitudes may be extinguished, either by the act of God, operation of law, or the act of the party. If the act which prevents the servitude is the act of the party, it will effect an extinguishment of the right. But if it is prevented by the act of God, or by the operation of law, this will only cause a suspension of it; for the act of a party will be construed most strongly against himself, but he shall not be injured by an act of God, or the law. Ib.

6. A servitude is extinguished by any obstruction of a permanent nature by the party himself to whom the service is due, or by his consent, or by the voluntary acquisition or acceptance of any other right or privilege incompatible with the exercise of it. Ib.

---

SET-OFF.

1. A debt barred by the statute of limitations cannot be set-off if objected to. Trumbull vs. Strohecker, 4 M'Cord, 210.

2. The assignee of the assignee of a bond, takes it subject to all the equities existing at the time of the assignment, between the obligor and the first assignee, notwithstanding such equities may have arisen before the bond came into the hands of the first assignee. Metzgar vs. Metzgar, 1 Rawle, 227.

3. An agent of a corporation, who has received money for its use, cannot, in an action for money had and received, brought against him by the corporation, prove, by way of set-off, that he has paid the debts of the corporation, without showing a special authority for that purpose. And it is not enough to prove, that the defendant acted for the treasurer, without showing some resolution of the board, giving the treasurer a right to delegate his power to the defendant. Middletown and Harrisburgh Turnpike Road Co. vs. Watson, 1 Rawle, 330.

---

SHERIFF.

1. Where a debtor is in jail under a ca. sa. and escapes, the creditor has two remedies against the sheriff: 1. An action of debt, wherein he will be entitled to recover the whole amount of his judgment against the prisoner. 2. An action on the case for the damages sustained by reason of the escape, in which the jury may assess damages according to circumstances. Boyce vs. Barksdale, 4 M'Cord, 141.

2. In an action on the case against a sheriff for the escape of a debtor confined under a ca. sa., evidence is admissible on the part of the sheriff to show the insolvency of the debtor, in mitigation of damages. Ib.

3. In an action by a creditor against the sheriff for an escape of the debtor from the jail bounds, the creditor is not bound to prove the insolvency of the sureties on the bond given by the debtor to keep within the bounds. Yates vs. Yeader, 4 M'Cord, 18.

4. The sheriff alone can sue on the bond; and the court, at its discretion, may stay the proceedings against the sheriff, until he can recover on the bond. Ib.

5. The sheriff can retake the prisoner, and put him into close confinement. Ib.

6. In an action against a sheriff for the escape of a debtor in custody on mesne process, evidence that the plaintiff, in the original suit, after the escape, suffered a nonsuit, is not conclusive evidence that he has sustained no injury. Baker vs. Deliesseline, 4 M'Cord, 372.

7. After an escape the plaintiff may proceed against the sheriff immediately, without further prosecuting his suit against the original defendant. Ib.

8. Although the sheriff may, in an action on the case against him for an escape, prove the insolvency of the debtor, to reduce the damages, yet he must also show some other circumstance in excuse or mitigation, or the jury must give damages to the amount of the whole debt. Jones vs. Blair, 4 M'Cord, 281.

9. Where a defendant is in custody on mesne process, and the plaintiff is nonsuited, the sheriff may discharge the defendant. Baker vs. Deliesseline, 4 M'Cord, 372.

10. If the sheriff misapply money that comes into his hands, by paying one execution, with the proceeds of property sold under another the party who receives the money is not bound, provided he has acted fairly, to refund it, either to the sheriff or to the party whose money has been improperly paid away. It is not necessary, on receiving a payment from the sheriff, to inquire out of what fund it is made. Diechman vs. The Northhampton Bank, 1 Rawle, 54.

11. A sheriff is answerable for the conduct of his deputy in taking goods of another person than the defendant, in execution. Wilbur vs. Strickland, 458.

---

TRUST.

A purchaser from a trustee without notice, will hold the property discharged from the trust. Hudnal vs. Wilder, 4 M'Cord, 294.

---

SLAVE.

Where a person who hires a slave, sends for a physician to attend him while sick, the person so employing the physician, and not the owner of the slave, is liable to the physician. Wells vs. Kinnerly, 4 M'Cord, 123.

---

SLAVE TRADE.

1. The offence against the law of the United States under the seventh section of the act of Congress of 2d of March, 1807, is, not that of importing or bringing into the United States persons of color with intent to hold or sell such persons as slaves, but that of hovering on the coast with such intent, and no further provision is made as to the disposition of the colored persons found on board, than to require the officers of the capturing vessel, to keep them safely to be delivered to the Governor of the state or the persons appointed by him to receive them. United States vs. Preston, 3 Pet. 57.

2. By the tenth section of the act of April, 1818, the six first sections of the act of 1807 were repealed, but no alteration is made in the disposition of the colored persons found on board of a vessel condemned under the seventh section. Ib.

3. The Josefa Segunda was on the eleventh of February, 1818, found hovering on the coast of the United States, and was seized and brought into New Orleans, and the vessel and persons on board libelled in the district court of Louisiana, under the act of 1807, and condemned, and an appeal claimed to the Supreme Court. After the decree of condemnation below, but pending the appeal, the sheriff of New Orleans sold, with the consent of all parties to the proceeding, the persons of color as slaves, and deposited the proceeds of the sale in the registry of the court, to await the final disposal of the law; the final condemnation of the Josefa Segunda in the Supreme Court took place on the 13th March, 1820; previous to which, Congress had passed the act of 3d March, 1819, which provided that persons of color, brought in under any of the acts prohibiting traffic in slaves, should be delivered to the President of the United States to be sent to Africa, and repealed all other acts repugnant thereto. It was held, that the persons of color found on board the Josefa Segunda, if they had been specifically before the court at the date of the final condemnation, must have been delivered up to the President of the United States, and that therefore the state of Louisiana had no claim to the proceeds of the sale of them; such sale having been unlawful. Ib.

---

STATUTE.

1. In the construction of the statute of a state, the Supreme Court adopts the construction given to such statute by the highest court of such state. United States vs. Morrison, 4 Pet. 124.

2. Where there is a provision in an act of incorporation, that it should be a public act; such provision must be regarded in courts of justice, and the enactments noticed, without being especially pleaded. Beaty vs. Knowler, 4 Pet. 152.

---

STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

If goods are shipped on credit, in a foreign port, on board the consignee's own ship, the master of which signs a bill of lading, by which they are to be delivered to his owner, the transitus is at an end by delivery to the master; and the consignor cannot afterwards stop the goods, in case of the insolvency of the consignee before their arrival. Bolin vs. Huffnagle, 1 Rawle, 9.

---

SURETY.

1. A surety is not discharged by the mere circumstance that time was given to the principal by the creditor, unless the creditor has, by some agreement, with the principal, precluded himself from suing him. Treasurers vs. Johnson, 3 M'Cord, 458.

2. If a surety require the creditor to sue his principal, and the creditor neglects so to do, and the principal afterwards becomes insolvent, the surety is discharged. Ib.

---

TENDER.

1. A tender of money in behalf of an infant, made by his uncle, the father being dead, but the mother living; held to be good, although the uncle had not then been appointed guardian. Brown vs. Dysinger, 1 Rawle, 408.

2. A tender, partly in silver coin, and partly in bank notes, offered to be converted into silver, but the opposite party refusing to accept any money, held to be good. Ib.

---

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 8, 1831.

NEW ENGLAND SHERIFF.

We think Mr Goodwin has performed a very acceptable service to the community generally, and to sheriffs and the profession particularly, in the 'Digest of the duties of civil officers,' which he has just published. A work of the kind was much wanted, and so far as we have had opportunity of examining it, we think his satisfactorily executed. It contains a compendium of the laws of Massachusetts, with references to those of other States upon the subjects embraced in it, together with a collection of cases from our own Reports and other sources, and the addition of convenient and useful forms.

The object and plan of the undertaking cannot be better expressed than in the words of the author's preface.

'No branch of the law presents subjects, calling for prompt and correct decision, more frequently than that relating to the various duties of civil officers. Questions involving the rights of persons and property, oftentimes must be determined by the ministers of the law, without an opportunity for deliberate inquiry, or for that patient investigation which is generally permitted in other departments of jurisprudence. Nor, is it the executive officer alone, that is called upon for a hasty determination. Inquiries are daily presented to members of the profession, upon this part of legal science, an answer to which cannot long be delayed, without jeopardizing valuable interests. To arrive to a satisfactory result, the statutes and adjudged cases of his own State, at least, comprised in more than a score of volumes, and those of no diminative size, must be consulted, and critically collated. The exigencies of the community, seemed therefore, to require a compendium of this branch of the law, systematically arranged, which would at once serve as a convenient manual for officers; and by furnishing an index to the statute books and reports, be not wholly useless to the more learned professional practitioner. But few are constituted with that happy temperament of mind and vigor of intellect, as not sometimes to feel the truth of the remark of the lugubrious lexicographer, 'That which is obvious is not always known, and what is known is not always present; and the student shall often in vain trace his memory at the moment of need, for that which yesterday he knew with intuitive readiness, and which will come, uncalled, into his thoughts tomorrow.'

'Gentlemen of the profession, in different parts of the commonwealth, have long felt the want of a work to supply this deficiency. The peculiar character of our attachment and jail laws—of the office of sheriff, and the novel relation in which he stands to his deputies, and those to each other—the frequency of legislative interposition, and of judicial interpretation, have rendered English books upon this subject, comparatively of little value. The learned work of Mr Backus, shows the impossibility of embodying the disjointed codes of this branch of American law, into a single treatise of any practical utility. The histories of the twentyfour States, composing the confederacy, show the impossibility of ever establishing an uniformity upon this subject.

'Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Maine, having adopted nearly the same system; it was supposed a treatise embracing the statutes, and adjudged cases of each jurisdiction, with particular reference to those of the parent government, might be of practical value in each of those States.—Such was the task the compiler of this work assigned to himself; how far the execution answers the design, is submitted to the judgment of his peers. He is already aware, that notwithstanding his endeavors, many defects will be discoverable, not only from the omission of valuable information, that has escaped his researches, but likewise from an imperfect use of such as have been retained. But it is confidently hoped, when the candid and judicious reader considers the great variety of topics introduced, and the multiplied sources from whence the materials were drawn, that a charitable allowance will be made for those inaccuracies, against which, the most unremitted vigilance cannot effectually guard.

'Similar compilations have been contemplated by gentlemen of the profession, but the inadequacy of the reward, when compared with the great expense of time and labor expended in collecting, arranging and condensing the various statutes and cases, it is believed, has heretofore deterred any one from the undertaking. A few years since, the task was commenced by a learned friend and neighbor, who made some progress in collecting materials for a similar compilation; but the pressure of less vexatious, and certainly not less profitable avocations, by which he is so honorably acquiring a high professional reputation, induced him to abandon the work, and with a generosity characteristic of his profession, he liberally bestowed upon the present editor, his manuscripts, the result of much labor, and great research.

'From this source, and from many others, the recollection of which will be cherished with gratitude, but of which our limits will not permit an enumeration, the compiler now presents this work, a humble offering to the great cause of public justice; hoping it may subserve in some small degree, to illustrate the science to which his life has been devoted, and lessen the labors of that meritorious class of his fellow citizens, without whose exertions, statutes would be but parchment, and civil security would resolve into anarchy.'

BANKING SYSTEM OF MASSACHUSETTS.

We have examined a pamphlet with the above title lately published by Messrs Stimpson and Clap of this City. The object of the author of the pamphlet is to suggest the elements of a new system of banking to be established in this Commonwealth, which shall effectually secure the interests of the community against depreciated currencies and bank failures. He suggests the following as the principles of his system and enforces their application with much ability.

1. The only proper basis of bank circulation is a large monied capital, exclusively appropriated to the business of banking.

2. Public security requires, that the issues of a bank should bear a small proportion to its capital.

3. Bank notes, to constitute a sound medium of general circulation, must be payable in the central points of trade, the large commercial cities.

4. The profits derivable from the circulation of bank notes, are a legitimate source of revenue to the State; but,

5. A State tax upon capital employed in the ordinary business of banking, is both unjust and impolitic, good policy requiring that capital should be allowed to flow into that channel with perfect freedom.

The constitutionality of the present tax upon Banks is discussed at considerable length and the writer maintains that the only proper subjects of taxation is the circulation of Bank notes and not the capital employed in Banking. This whole subject is one with regard to which the community in general is in most decided ignorance. The revolutions and changes and fluctuations in the money market are looked upon with amazement and alarm without any comprehension of the causes which are bringing them about. Men who are extensively and constantly engaged in the operations of the trading community, often find all their efforts and calculations paralysed in a day, and stand by and see their gains and estates going down the current of disastrous circumstances and events, without the ability to impose the slightest check against it.

Every effort to call the attention of the public to this subject and to explain it, deserves approbation. The writer of this pamphlet appears to be well acquainted with his subject and discusses it in a plain and forcible manner.

MASSACHUSETTS REGISTER FOR 1831.

We are among the unlucky subscribers to this catch-penny publication and have thereby lost a modicum of the circulating medium, which might have been more usefully appropriated. Our last year's Register, with a new paper binding, would have well enough supplied the place of the new edition; and, in truth, somewhat better than the new one itself, since we had made that tolerably accurate by a year's corrections, erasures and additions, with pen and pencil. Are Almanacs and Registers stereotyped? There is a wonderful resemblance in the matter and manner, and, but for the change of names and dress, we should certainly suppose we had many times and oft before seen the same 'useful calender'—which on the first of January was introduced to us, by the gentleman in drab, as a new acquaintance.

WEBSTER'S SPEECHES, &c.

We would call the attention of our readers to the Speeches, &c, of Mr Webster, just published and for sale by Gray & Bowen, in Washington Street, and at the other Bookstores in the City. The volume is an octavo of between 5 and 600 pages, very closely printed, and executed in a very handsome style and is sold at a moderate price. A very good and finely engraved Portrait of Mr Webster, accompanies the work. All his published Speeches upon topics of permanent interest and importance are introduced, together with some hitherto unpublished addresses and writings which give an additional value to the book. We think every Professional man, in the country, will regard the addition of such a work to his library as an acquisition well worth the cost.

CONTENTS of the Law Magazine, or Quarterly Review of Jurisprudence, No. X., for October, 1830.

Registration.—Copy of the Second Report made to His Majesty by the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Law of England respecting Real property. Presented pursuant to an Address, dated 10th June, 1830. Ordered by the House of Commons to be printed, 29th June, 1830.

The Life of Lord Mansfield.

Mercantile Law.—No VIII. Contract of Sale—continued.

On the interest necessary in a Life Insurance.

On the Duties to which the Estates of Testators and Intestates are liable.

Rights of the Peerage.—A Disquisition on the Right of Jurisdiction in Peerage Successions, particularly the Peerage of Scotland.

Sugden's Acts.—The Acts relating to the Administration of the Law in Courts of Equity, passed in the Session 11, Geo. 4. and 1 W. 4., with an Introduction and Notes. By Thomas William Jemmet, Esq. of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister at Law. 1830.

The Practice relating to Retainers.

Digest of Cases.

Common Law.

Equity.

List of Cases.

Abstract of Public General Statutes.

The New Police.

Indian Appeals.

Letter to the Editor.

An Example of an Index to a Registered Title.

Events of the Quarter, &c.

Notices to Correspondents.

New Publications.

'American legislation is as bad as our own; a congress loses as much time as a parliament. When Captain Hall said so, he was not believed; we pin our faith upon less disputable authority: 'One short act respecting drawbacks is the only general law worth naming passed during the last session. If what the economists call let-us-alone policy, were the consummation of political science, we are in a fair way of surpassing all nations in the negative wisdom of our inconsequential doings.' (The American Jurist and Law Magazine, No 4,—a very talented work.) We cite this, in sober earnestness, as adding tenfold to the difficulties of our position; by showing that the favorite nostrum, a more popular representation, is not the political heal-all.'—Law Magazine.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

We extract the following remarks upon this subject from the Mayor's Speech delivered on Monday last on the occasion of the organization of the City Government. The topic is one of increasing interest and will no doubt receive, as it justly de mands, the earlyattention of our Legislature.

'The County jail is not under the immediate jurisdiction of the City Government, but from the reports and information derived through the County officers, no doubt is entertained that its prudentials are managed with a just regard to the security and comfort of the prisoners. It is most consolatory to discover, that while imprisonment for dept is still allowable by law, public opinion, and (as may be inferred) the feelings and habits of creditors as a class, have exceedingly diminished the practical evils and calamities incident to its rigorous execution. By a return made to me on the 27th of last month, it appears, the whole number of persons imprisoned for debt on mesne process and execution, in this city is eighteen, and no more. These are all males. The time has been when the number has averaged fourteen hundred, annually, and sometimes including two hundred females. Should the habit of resorting to this made of attempting to compel payment of debts have fallen into disuse in the same degree in other parts of the State, it would indicate that the time had come for the abolition of the laws authorizing imprisonment for debt, except in cases of fraud.'

WHITMAN'S LETTERS. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN, 141 Washington Street, 'Two Letters to Rev. Moses Stuart,' on Religious Liberty, occasioned by his Letter to Rev. Wm. E. Channing. By Bernard Whitman. Jan. 1.

SIXTY MAPS of the various countries of the Globe, from the Epitome of Universal Geography. For sale at GRAY & BOWEN's, 141 Washington Street. Price 50 cents, bound. Jan. 1.

THIS DAY PUBLISHED, by GRAY & BOWEN, an APPENDIX to the American Almanac, for the year 1831, being the latter part of the fiftyfifth, and the beginning of the fiftysixth year of the Independence of the United States.

Extract from the Preliminary Observations on the Astronomical Department of the American Almanac.

The Appendix is intended to answer all the essential purposes of a Nautical Almanac, and the insertion therein of the distances of the Moon from the Planets, and of the proportional logarithm of the difference between the distances, it is hoped, will be found an improvement on any Almanac hitherto published. Jan. 1.

LIBRARY OF EDUCATION. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN,

The Library of Education, Vol. I. —Containing 'Some Thoughts concerning Education.' By John Locke, and a 'Treatise of Education,' by John Milton, with an Appendix; containing Locke's Memoranda on Study. Edited by Wm. Russell, late editor of the Journal of Education.

Extract from the Preface.

'The present volume is intended to form one of a series of standard treatises on the subject of Education. The work now commenced will, it is hoped, form a useful source of information to parents and teachers; furnishing to the latter a sort of professional library, to which individuals may resort for assistance in the labor of instruction, and offering to the former an aid to the formation of just and extensive views of the whole scope of education, as well as a preparation for cooperating with instruction, in their exertions for the mental advancement of the young.' Jan. 1.

PARLEY'S ASIA. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN, Peter Parley's Tales about Asia, with a Map and numerous Engravings. This is designed as a fourth volume in a series of Geographical and Historical Tales for Children. Tales of America, Europe, and Africa, have already been published. Tales of Islands in the Pacific Ocean, Tales of the Sea, and Tales of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, will complete the series. These three last are in a state of forwardness.

GRAY & BOWEN, have just published, TALES OF TRAVELS West of the Mississippi, with a Map and numerous Engravings, by Solomon Bell, late keeper of the Traveller's Library, Province House Court, Boston. This volume is the first of a series which is intended to supply to the Children of the United States, an entertaining abstract of the most popular books of Travels which have lately appeared.

G. & B. also have for sale—

Peter Parley's Tales about Africa.
Peter Parley's Tales about Europe.
Peter Parley's Tales about Animals, with three hundred Engravings.
Peter Parley's Juvenile Tales.
Peter Parley's Winter Evening Tales.
Peter Parley's Geography for Children. Jan. 1.

GIRL'S OWN BOOK. This day published by CARTER, HENDEE, & BABCOCK,

'The Girl's Own Book.' By Mrs Child, author of Hobomok, and Evenings in New England, and editor of the Juvenile Miscellany.

'I have no trinkets, cakes, or toys,
As gifts for little girls and boys,
But look within, and you will find
Both food and playthings for the mind.'

The Girl's Own Book is intended for those who are too old to read merely infantile books, yet somewhat too young for such costly presents as the Annuals. It embraces a great variety of subjects: All sorts of Games and Exercises suitable for Girls—Directions for Sewing and Knitting, Needlebooks, Pincushions, Purses, Boxes, and Bags of all sorts—Charades, Puzzles, &c.—Fables, Stories, and Maxims, Poetry, Gardening, Silk Worms, and Bees. Jan. 1.

AMERICAN ALMANAC, Second Edition. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN, The American Almanac and Repository of Useful Knowledge, Vol. II., for the year 1831. Jan. 1.

GRAY AND BOWEN, have just received, No. 1, of SURGICAL ANATOMY OF THE ARTERIES, with plates and illustrations. By Nathan R. Smith, M. D. Professor of Surgery in the University of Maryland. January 1.

WORKING MEN'S PARTY. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN, 141 Washington Street, A Lecture on the Working Men's Party, delivered before the Charlestown Lyceum, October 6, 1830. By Edward Everett.

MALTE-BRUN SCHOOL GEOGRAPHY.—This day published by CARTER, HENDEE, & BABCOCK, The Malte-Brun School Geography, illustrated by numerous original engravings, and an Atlas of 19 Maps, Charts, and Tables. By S. Griswold Goodrich. Jan. 1.

EVENTS IN PARIS, during the 26, 27, 28, and 29th of July, 1830. By several eye witnesses. Translated from the fourth Paris edition. This day published by CARTER, HENDEE, & BABCOCK.

GRAY & BOWEN, have in preparation, and will very shortly put to press,

A NEW DICTIONARY OF MEDICAL SCIENCE AND LITERATURE; which will contain a concise account of the various subjects in Anatomy, Physiology, Pathology, Therapeutics, Materia Medica, Surgery, Obstetrics, and Pharmacy, with the Etymology and Orthoepy of the terms of their Greek, Latin, French, and German synonymes;—a copious Bibliography appended to the different articles, and Biographical Notices of the most eminent Authors in the different departments of Medical Science, with a Catalogue of their principal works mentioned and an Epitome of the existing state of Medical Science and Literature. By Robley Dunglison, M. D. Professor of Medicine in the University of Virginia &c, &c.

While many of the nations of Continental Europe possess Dictionaries, which have kept pace with the advancing condition of Medical Science, Great Britain and America possess it may be said, but one of a concise character,—that of Hooper,—which independently of its want of accuracy on many points, is incontestibly far behind the present state of Medical Science and Literature, and unfit for the purposes of the Medical Student. In proof of this, it will be sufficient to remark, that the New Dictionary will contain at least five thousand words more than are to be found in that publication,—while the circumstance of the Dictionary of Hooper being stereotyped in this country, renders it impracticable to make the necessary additions to it, were the ground work such as to render such a course advisable.

The work will not be a mere Dictionary of terms; it will comprise concise histories of diseases: a description and doses of various kinds of medicine, with formula for the different Pharmacentrical preparations, &c, &c.

The important publications daily appearing in France and Germany, have induced the author to add the French and German synonymes to the various terms; so that the work will really contain the substance of an English, French and German Dictionary, at a comparatively trifling expense.—The French Index will be found to include every word in the 'Dictionaire des Science Medicales,' which consists of sixty volumes, as well as in the smaller Dictionaries more recently published.

Great attention has been, moreover, paid to the Greek and Latin synonymes, so that the Dictionary will, it is trusted, form a safe and convenient guide to the study of ancient and modern authors on Medicine.

It will be comprised in one large volume, 8vo. Oct. 23.

WEBSTER'S WRITINGS. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN, No. 141, Washington-street—Speeches and Forensic Arguments by Daniel Webster, with a highly finished portrait drawn from life, and engraved on steel, by J. B. Longacre.

'We offer this volume of Mr Webster's Speeches to our Countrymen in full confidence that they will sustain the high reputation they have already acquired for Political Wisdom, and true Eloquence.'—Editor's Preface. Jan. 8.

GRAY AND BOWEN, No. 141, Washington Street, Boston, have recently published the following valuable works.

I. A DESCRIPTION OF TREMONT HOUSE; WITH ARCHITECTURAL ILLUSTRATIONS.—4to.

'Jam scires ab introitu primo—herculentum et amvenum videre et diversonium.' APULEIUS, M. A V.

This work is embellished with a copper-plate engraving, representing the front of the house, and thirty lithographic prints, exhibiting the details of the structure. Its object will be understood by the following extract from the preface.

'The present publication is intended to satisfy a curiosity, which frequent inquiries for a description of Tremont House were supposed to indicate.

'Its original plan was to furnish such particulars relative to this establishment as strangers might wish to possess, but it has been extended so as to comprehend many architectural details, which will probably be interesting to mechanics; as much of the ornamental work of Tremont House was copied or adopted from books, not commonly in their hands, and has not before been executed in this country.

II. AN EPITOME OF UNIVERSAL GEOGRAPHY; or, a Description of the various Countries of the Globe; with a view of their Political Condition at the present time. With sixty Maps. By NATHAN HALE.

III. A DICTIONARY OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE; or, an Explanation of Words and Things connected with all the Arts and Sciences. Illustrated with numerous Wood Cuts. By GEORGE CRABB, A. M., Author of 'English Synonymes,' 'Technological Dictionary,' and 'Historical Dictionary.'

IV. THE VESTAL—A TALE OF POMPEII. 1 Vol. 12mo.

'Oh Time, thou beautifier of the dead,
Adorner of the ruin.' CHILDE HAROLD.

V. AUTHORSHIP. A Tale. By a New Englander over Sea. 1 Vol. 12mo.

VI. AN ORATION; Delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, Cambridge, Mass. August 26th, 1830. By the Rev. ORVILLE DEWEY.

VII. THE DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Published under the Direction of the President of the United States, from the Original Manuscripts in the Department of State, conformably to a resolution of Congress, of March 27, 1818. Edited by JARED SPARKS.

This important Correspondence, now for the first time published, will form eleven volumes. Eight are already published and the remainder will appear very shortly.

VIII. JEFFERSON'S WORKS, In four Volumes. Accompanied with a Portrait on steel, and a fac-simile of the original draft of the Declaration of Independence. Second Edition.

IX. THE NEW TESTAMENT, conformed to Griesbach's Text. 1 Vol. 12mo.

THE TOKEN, a Christmas and New Year's Present, for 1831. Edited by S. G. Goodrich.

'Then take my flower, and let its leaves
Beside thy heart be cherished near,
While that confiding heart receives
The thought it whispers to thine ear.'

The engravings for the Token of this year are executed by Cheney, Ellis, Gallaudet, and others; among the contributors are Dewey, Greenwood, Miss Sedgwick, Mrs Sigourney, Hall, Peabody, Wetmore, author of a Year in Spain, author of Tales of the Northwest, Neal, Thatcher, Mrs Hale, and others of the first reputation.

The work is larger than heretofore, and is done up in splendid embossed morocco. The literary department is considered decidedly superior to the former years, and in all respects it has received the greatest care and attention. Oct 23.

LAW BOOKS.—HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. 134 Washington Street, have on hand a large Stock of American and English Law Books, comprising a complete assortment of the best editions of all works in general use. They also purchase and sell second hand Law Books—terms liberal.

H., G. & Co. supply any volumes that may be wanted of Massachusetts or Pickering's Reports.

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 15, 1831. NO. XXV.

MERCANTILE LAW.

CONTRACT OF SALE.

Continued.

We are now led by the order of the sentence to inquire what is a sufficient acceptance to satisfy that alternative of the statute. The words are 'except the buyer shall accept part of the goods, and actually receive the same'—words, which seem carefully selected for the purpose of excluding everything short of a literal taking into the buyer's own custody and possession. Much ingenuity, however, has been exercised by the court in refining upon this plain expression; and the doctrine of constructive transfer of possession has been carried to a point, which it is become alike difficult to maintain or to recede from. Acceptance, of course, implies delivery; a subject which it will be more convenient to treat of hereafter. For the present, therefore, we shall merely observe as to partial acceptance, that where at the time of the sale a sample is delivered to and taken by the purchaser or his agent, this will be such an acceptance as to satisfy the statute, if it were distinctly understood in the bargain that the sample so taken should form part of the whole commodity purchased:* if otherwise, not.†

Of earnest, something has been said already. It is remarkable that but one case has occurred since the framing of this act, in which this subject has been drawn into discussion. The question there was, whether a purchaser could be considered as having 'given something in earnest,' who had gone through the ceremony of drawing a shilling over the hand of the seller, and then returning it into his own pocket—a ceremony which, it seems, is practised in some parts of the north of England, and considered as concluding the bargain. This question, the court, as may be anticipated, decided in the negative.‡ The civil law recognised two kinds of earnest—the one a gage, by way of assurance, the other a deposit, as part payment;§ but in our law it is the former only which is properly denominated earnest.‖ The statute, therefore, expressly distinguishes it from part-payment, which is the alternative next in order, and the meaning of which is too plain to need either comment or illustration.

But the last requisite of the statute 'or that some note or memorandum in writing of the said bargain be made and signed by the parties to be charged by such contract, or their agents lawfully authorized,' cannot be dismissed so easily. And, first, it is clear, that by the words, 'note or memorandum of the bargain,' the legislature did not intend a formal instrument of contract, on the face of which a mutual obligation should appear: it is enough of it show that a bargain has been made, which the party sought to be charged has recognised by his signature.* But it is essential that a bargain should be shown—the names, therefore, of both buyer and seller,† the commodity and the price,‡ must all distinctly appear. If any of these ingredients are wanting, it is impossible to say that the note or memorandum is evidence of a bargain. The bought and sold notes of a broker will, in general, as will presently be seen, satisfy the requisites of the statute; but then they must agree in their terms, for how can that be a bargain, the particulars of which are differently understood by the parties? Thus, where the note delivered to the buyer described the commodity by mistake as 'Riga Rhine hemp,' while that delivered to the seller, stated it to be 'St Petersburgh clean hemp,' it was considered insufficient, as evidence of the bargain.§

But, secondly, the note or memorandum must be signed by the party to be charged, or by his lawful agent. Now it is unnecessary here to enter into the general question who is an agent recognised by the law: because, for the purposes of this clause, any one will be an agent, who may fairly be considered as acting for the party in the particular transaction.‖ Thus it has been frequently determined, with a just regard to the convenience of trade, that a broker in negotiating a sale, is to be looked upon as agent¶ both of the buyer and of the seller. So also an auctioneer.* The agent must, however, be a third person. One of the contracting parties cannot constitute himself agent for the other, even with his consent and approbation.† Nor can a broker, expressly employed to sell certain goods, delegate, without the assent of his principal, that authority to another.‡ A signature by one of several partners will of course be sufficient, and even among part-owners only of the particular commodity, a subsequent parol adoption of the rest will render the signature of one the act of all.§

The note or memorandum must be signed: but in the interpretation of that word 'signed' considerable laxity has been admitted by the courts. Thus, not only has it been held sufficient that the name of the party to be charged should appear on the memorandum in the hand-writing of himself or his agent, without any formal signature at the foot;‖ but the requisite has even been considered as complied with, where the printed name has appeared: at all events, if the party has authenticated it by his own hand-writing on some other part of the instrument. This departure from the statute (for so, with all our respect, we must take the liberty of calling it) is attributable to Lord Eldon, when presiding in the Common Pleas. An action¶ was brought for the non-delivery of a quantity of gin. At the time of the order a bill of parcels was delivered to the plaintiff (the buyer) partly printed and partly written, 'London,—Bought of Jackson and Hankin, distillers, No. 8, Oxford Street,' was printed; then followed in writing '1000 gallons of gin, &c, 350*l.*' There was no signature. 'The question' said his lordship, 'is whether if a man be in the habit of printing instead of writing his name, he may not be said to sign by his printed as well as his written name.' It has been decided that if a man draw up an agreement in his own hand-writing, 'I, A.B. agree,' and leave a space for signature at the bottom, but never sign it, it may be considered as a note or memorandum in writing within the statute. Now that is a stronger case than the present. This, however, ought not to be considered as an express decision on the point, because there were in that case, as we shall shortly have occasion to remark, other circumstances sufficient

---

* Hinde v. Whitehouse, 7 East, 558. Kilnitz v. Surry, 5 Esp. 267. Tolser v. West, Holt, 178.

† Cooper v. Elston, 7 T. R. 14.

‡ Blenkinsop v. Clayton, 7 Taunt. 597.

§ Datur autem arrha vel simpliciter, ut sit argumentum duntaxat et probatio emptionis contractæ vel ut si annulus detur; vel ut simul postea cedat in partem pretii, data certa pecunia. Cum arrha tantum ut symbolum data est, impleta emptione, i. e. re tradita et pretio numerato, restituenda est emptori; cum in certa pecunia, cedit in defalcationem pretii, nihilque repetitur sed reliqua pecunia, re tradita, exsolvenda est. Vinnius Commen, in Inst. 1. 3. tit 24. And the giving of earnest had this effect—Is qui recusat adimplere contractum, si uidem est emptor, perdit quod dedit: si vero venditor, duplum restituere compellitur; licet super arrhis nihil est expressum. Inst. de Empt. et Vend. Which is still the rule of the French law. Si la promesse de vendre a été faite avec des arrhes, chacun des contractans est maitre de s'en departir—celui qui les a données, en les perdant; et celui qui les a recues, en restituent le double. Code Civile, 1590.

‖ If given for any other purpose than as a token of ratification, it is not properly earnest, 5 Co. Rep. 117; and the purpose should be declared at the time of giving it. 2 Vern. 606.

* Egerton v. Mathews, 6 East, 307. The note was in this form—'We agree to give Mr Egerton 19*d.* per pound for thirty bales of Sumatra cotton, customary allowances, cash 3 per cent, as soon as our certificate is complete. MATTHEWS & TURNBULL.'

It was objected, that as the contract was executory, and the action, therefore, founded upon mutual promises, the note should have shown some undertaking on the part of Egerton (the plaintiff.) sufficient to bind him in law; else no consideration appeared for the promise of Matthews & Turnbull (the defendants,) and consequently no bargain; but the Court at once decided against the objection. And see Seton v. Slade, 7 Ves. 265.

† Champion v. Plummer, 1 N. R. 254. That was a memorandum signed by the seller only, and containing no mention of the name of the purchaser. Held, therefore, insufficient.

‡ Elmore v. Kingscote, 5 B. & C. 583.

§ Thornton v. Kempster, 5 Taunt. 786. And the same point has been determined in Cumming v. Roebuck, Holt, 172; and in Grant v. Fletcher, 5 B. & C. 436.

‖ The authority, therefore, need not be in writing, 1 Esp. 106. 1 Sch. Lef. 22. And it may of course be revoked at any time before the note is actually signed, even though the bargain may have been concluded. 2 Campb. 339. n. 3 Campb. 127, 1 M'Clel. 25.

¶ 1 Esp. 105. 15 East, 107. 2 Campb. 337. 6 B. & C. 117. 1 Stark. 128.

* 3 Burr. 1921. 7 East, 567. 1 Campb. 513. 2 Taunt. 38. 4 Taunt. 209.

† And, therefore, in Wright v. Dannah, 2 Campb. 203, where the seller wrote the note by the direction and dictation of the buyer, it was held, nevertheless, insufficient to charge him. And in Farebrother v. Simmons, 5 B. & A. 33, an auctioneer who had made an entry of the purchase was not considered as an agent for the purchaser, where the action was brought in his own name. And see Rayner v. Linthorn, 1 R. & M. 325. Cooper v. Smith, 15 East, 103.

‡ Henderson v. Barnwall, 1 Y. & J. 387.

§ Soames v. Spencer, 1 D. & R. 32. It seems almost unnecessary to state, that an entry of the contract in his sale-book, made by the broker, and signed by him, is a sufficient memorandum. 2 Campb. 337. And that although the original entry be unsigned, yet if the bought and sold notes copied therefrom be signed, the statute will be satisfied. 6 B. & C. 117.

‖ Knight v. Cuckford, 1 Esp. N. P. C. 190.

¶ Saunderson v. Jackson, 2 B. & P. 238.

 Knight v. Cuckford, ante.

to cure the defect of signature, if it existed. But the dictum subsequently received a qualified ratification in the case of Schneider v. Morris.* That was also an action against the sellers for non-delivery. The bill of parcels (which was the memorandum relied upon) was in these words 'London, 24th October, 1812.—Messrs John Schneider and Co. bought of Thomas Morris and Co. Agents,' &c. 'Cotton,' &c, all printed except the names of the buyers, which was in the hand-writing of one of the defendants. The court held that there was a sufficient signature, on the ground that the defendants had recognised the printed name as their signature by writing, on the same paper and as connected with the same transaction, the names of the buyers. Lord Ellenborough at the same time took occasion to add, 'If indeed this case had rested merely on the printed name, unrecognised by, and not brought home to, the party as having been printed by him or by his authority, so that the printed name had been unappropriated to that particular contract, it might have afforded some doubt, whether it would not be intrenching upon the statute to have admitted it.'

We have said, that by the words 'note or memorandum,' the statute could not have intended a formal instrument; and there may therefore be nothing unreasonable in considering a bill of parcels, an invoice, or even a printed catalogue at an auction (provided it contain all the conditions of sale) as included under the term. Still, it might have been supposed that some one entire document was contemplated, in which all the requisites above mentioned should be found. But the courts, looking to the supposed intention, conceived that the purpose of the legislature would be answered, if there existed sufficient evidence in writing of the transaction, although not found in any single document, but to be collected from several. This will be best illustrated by the following instances. In the before mentioned case of Saunderson v. Jackson,† there was, in addition to the printed invoice, the following letter sent from the sellers to the buyer. 'Sir, we wish to know at what time we shall send you a part of your order, and shall be obliged for a little time in delivery of the remainder.' (signed) 'Jackson and Hunkin:' and it was held, that this letter might be connected so as to supply any defect of signature on the invoice. In Allen v. Bennett,‡ which was likewise an action against the sellers, the order had been signed in the book of the buyer by an agent of the seller, but the name of the buyer did not appear in the entry: it was held, however, that this defect was cured by a letter subsequently written by the buyer, referring to the order, and requesting that it might be executed. And in another case, a letter from the buyer to the seller, (complaining of the quality of the goods) and the answer of the latter, were considered as together constituting a sufficient memorandum of the bargain.§ It is manifest, however, that before this use can be made of them, the papers must appear to be so connected as to relate to, and form parts of one entire transaction; and that, either from the internal evidence of which the jury are to judge,‖ or from actual annexation at the time of the contract. In Hinde v. Whitehouse,¶ which was a sale by auction of warehoused sugars, the auctioneer had before him at the sale, a printed catalogue containing the lots, marks, and number of hogsheads, and the pass weight of the sugars, and also another written paper containing the conditions of sale, which latter he read to the bidders, as the terms on which the sugars mentioned in the catalogue were to be sold; but the two papers were neither externally annexed, nor contained any internal reference to each other. As each lot was knocked down, the auctioneer wrote on the catalogue the name of the purchaser: and the question being, whether this was a sufficient memorandum of the bargain, the court held that it was not so, because the bargain (which was on certain conditions) could not be collected from the catalogue alone, and the conditions could not be called in aid, as not being connectible with the catalogue without parol testimony.*

One other condition is imposed on this connexion of separate documents, viz. that the later ones contain nothing at variance with or in disaffirmance of the supposed contract. A memorandum was insufficient, for want of the signature of the party to be charged; and it was attempted to supply the defect by a letter from him, in which he recognised the order, but insisted that the goods had not been delivered in the time stipulated, and therefore, that he was not bound to receive them; this attempt, however, the court refused to sanction.†

The section of the statute, which we have been thus minutely dissecting, applies, it will be recollected to those sales only, where the value of the goods bought at any one time exceeds 10*l*. Sales of a less amount remain as they were at common law, with one exception, which is this: The fourth section of the same statute enacts, 'that no action shall be brought whereby to charge any person upon any agreement that is not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof, unless the agreement, upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised.' On this clause it will be sufficient for our purpose to remark that, the word 'performed' has been construed to signify the completion of the agreement; and consequently, unless the parties at the time of making the bargain, contemplated the possibility of a complete and not merely a partial performance within the year, the requisites of the statute must be complied with.‡

We have now considered all that is necessary for rendering a sale valid and complete, both at common law, and as respects the statute of frauds. We have also seen that the effect of the sale, when thus complete, is to transfer the property in the goods from the seller to the buyer. It follows, that we proceed to inquire what are the consequences of that transfer, as attaching upon the goods, while they yet remain in the hands of the seller. And the first and most obvious consequence is this: that from thenceforth, if any loss or damage happen to them, without fault on the seller's part, it will fall on the buyer, whose property they are. In technical language, they are said to be from the time of the sale, at the risk of the vendee, a result in which the civil law agrees with our own, although it arrives at it by a different and more circuitous process.* And here perhaps it may be convenient to pause; lest the narrow limits which are assigned us, should render it necessary to cramp a subject sufficiently important to justify a detailed investigation.

*2 M. & S. 286.
† 2 B. & P. 238.
‡ 3 Taunt. 169.
§ Jackson v. Lowe, 1 Bing. 9. And see Phillimore v. Barry, 1 Campb, 513.
‖ Jackson v. Lowe.
¶ 7 East, 568.

*The same point was determined in Kenworthy v. Schofield, 2 B. & C. 945.
† Cooper v. Smith, 15 East, 103. And the principle has been since recognised in Elmore v. Kingscote, 5 B. & C. 583; and Richardson v. Foster, 6 B. & C. 487.
‡ Boydell v. Drummond, 11 East, 142. And see 1 Salk. 280; Skin. 353; 1 Lord Raymond, 316; 3 Burr. 353; and 1 B. & A. 722.

* According to the civil law, by the sale a reciprocal obligation is contracted, binding the seller to deliver—the buyer to pay. Where performance on one side is rendered impossible, without any fault in the party, he is released from his obligations, while that of the other party remains good. If, therefore, goods sold, and remaining in the possession of the seller, are accidentally destroyed, he cannot be called upon to deliver them; but the buyer remains, nevertheless, under the obligation to pay. Our own rule is certainly more simple and direct than this, whatever other disadvantages there may be in considering property to be changed without delivery.

LORD KEEPER GUILFORD.

Concluded from page 187.

The following is the character of the lord keeper given by his brother and biographer, upon which it will be necessary to make a few comments.

'He was descended of a noble family, virtuously educated: an early student in the law, signalised in his first performances, preferred for his abilities; passed gradually from the meanest initiation of practice through every degree of business and preferment in the law; court-keeper, practiser in the king's bench, chief in his circuit, king's counsel, solicitor-general, attorney-general, chief justice of the common pleas, lord keeper of the great seal and created a baron; and in all this walk, trod upon no man's heels, for he entered only by vacancies, and never by ungrateful removes, and was helpful and a friend to those whom he succeeded, especially the Lord Nottingham, who almost owned him for his successor. While he was chief justice he was taken into the privy-council, and then into the cabinet. He travelled most parts of the kingdom as judge in the several circuits; and gained the friendship, I had almost (and I might have) said the love, of the chief gentry of England, who afterwards stood by him, against divers attempts to remove or dishonor him. And notwithstanding his continual employments in church and state, many thought his room, or rather his places, worth crowding for; and however in nice matters it is more than human not sometimes to err, yet he stood against all as a rock immoveable; and nothing was ever found, even by the most discerning of a popular faction, that would or (in truth) could impeach his fame, probity, or honor. He served the crown steadily and according to law; and ever gave cogent reasons in public for what he did. No impression of fear, flattery, or interest, did ever taint or divert his justice. In his person he was modest to extremity; and yet in doing his duty enough assured. He was a declared enemy to pomp and vain glory. He was not an orator as commonly understood, that is a flourisher, but all his speech was fluent, easy, and familiar: and he never used a word for ornament, but for intelligence merely; and those who heard him speak, though, in ordinary conversation, had scarce room left to ask any explication or enlargement. He was a lawyer (modestly speaking) not inferior to any of his time; and knowing in records and histories, not only of England, but in general. He was master of the European languages, as French, Italian, and Spanish, and had entered into those of High and Low Germany. He was adept in natural philosophy and mechanics, and no stranger to the mathematics. A musician in perfection, both practical and speculative, being a performer, composer, and (in print) a philosopher, as to the most recondite secrets of that art. He was covetous of nothing more than the society of the virtuosos of his time, as Lely, Moreland, May, Moore, Flamstead, and others of that tribe, who all courted him, and embraced his conversation, and many owned to profit by his encouragement and protection. He was civil and affable to all; and conversed, even with his enemies, without offence, and hated to be waited upon when he might give despatch. His course of life was unexceptionable; no manner of vice encouraged, nor by him known within his walls. His diet plain, and meals hospitable and profitable. His most intense study was to amend whatever he found amiss and amendable, where his employment gave him means and a latitude to do it. His zeal was to do all the good he could to his country; and that he thought best done by supporting the church and crown of England in all due and legal prerogatives, and thereunto he adhered during all his life, and no motive whatsoever made him swerve. Whatever he did in public was legal and effectual, without any affected lustre or handles to fame, if he could avoid them. No wonder he is so soon forgot. He never had, nor asked for profit, any boons of his majesty; and at the end, left but a moderate estate to his children, which one would think should have been by common profits much more; but thereby he demonstrated that corruption had no share in what he left. In short, he had a virtuous disposition, orderly and regular course of life, void of all pride and affectation; the utmost regard for truth and right; a vast extent of skill in the law and national constitution, and knowledge of men and the world; the love and esteem of the best; impartiality in his justice and dexterity in the forms and administration of it; sense of his duty, public and private, with industry and affection duly to perform it; he was patient in hearing, modest in determining, compassionate in severities, othodox and exemplary in the established church, and averse to all its enemies; for all which he had a visible temporal reward; and that is, dying as he lived, without stain or diminution of his honor, authority, or greatness, in the height of which he left the world. This character which I have here given, is not out of opinion, rumor or any means of fame whatever; but the result of my own personal knowledge and proof, and at the hour of death I can veritably swear to every article of it.'

In attempting to form a more just and accurate, opinion of the lord keeper's character than is to be derived from the foregoing partial sketch, it is proper to regard him in connexion with the times in which he lived, and with the state of feeling and scale of principle which then prevailed. If in his public character Lord Guilford never rose above the prejudices and feelings of the age, he did not, like many of his cotemporaries, sink without shame into those corrupt practices with which the higher ranks of society were infected. He was unstained by that loose prostitution in politics, and by that abandoned corruption which darkened the character of Sunderland and Jefferies.

Honest in his opinions, and in the expression of them, he refused upon more than one occasion to sacrifice them to his interests. But his character was altogether destitute of elevation. Possessing none of the elements of greatness, seldom in mind and never in feeling did he rise above mediocrity. He was thus led into meannesses, and sometimes into compliances, which men of loftier principles would have despised. Though not altogether free from the imputation of corruption in his judicial station, the accusation rests upon no substantial foundation, and his general character renders the justice of it improbable. Perhaps the most valuable quality which the lord keeper possessed, was that discretion which in all the transactions of life is so sure a guide, and which enables a man of moderate powers to accomplish what the highest genius and talent, if misdirected, must fail to attain. As a lawyer, the name of the Lord Keeper Guilford has always maintained a respectable station; but it does not occupy the foremost rank. To his efforts to effect a reform both in the common pleas and in the court of chancery, the greatest credit is due. In private life, his character was certainly excellent. Under all the toils of office, and amid the distractions of political life, he sedulously maintained that affectionate intercourse with his own family, the loss of which is ill supplied by all that the most successful ambition can offer. The fervent attachment, the regard, approaching to reverence, which were felt for him by his brothers, and which are so quaintly but beautifully expressed by his biographer, bear a striking testimony to the worth and goodness of his heart.

Some anecdotes of the lord keeper have been preserved by his brother, which are transcribed not only on account of the amusement they cannot fail to afford, but also as showing that he wanted that strength of character which prevents others from even attempting to render the possessor of it ridiculous.

Lord Sunderland, whose designs were generally opposed by the lord keeper, exerted all his wit to render him ridiculous. 'All the artillery of foul mouths,' says Roger North, 'were pointed at him; and the Earl of Sunderland marched at the head of them, who commonly gave out the signal.

'His lordship's virtuous course of life was a vile obstacle, and slanders on that head would not stick. But I shall show some snares laid to catch him: in the mean time, vilifications plenty: those were at their tongues' end. He was neither courtier nor lawyer, which his lordship hearing, he smiled, saying, 'that they might well make him a whoremaster, when they had dislawyered him.' And to show their intent of fixing some scandal and contempt on him, I shall allege a ridiculous instance or two. His lordship's brother-in-law, more than once named in these papers, came to him seriously with advice; which was, that he should keep a whore, and that if he did not, he would lose all his interest at court, for he understood from very great men (the Earl of Sunderland and his gamesters, I suppose,) that he was ill-looked upon for want of his doing so, because he seemed continually to reprehend them for practising the like, as almost every one did, and, if his lordship pleased, he would help him to one. His lordship was in his mind full of scorn at this proffer, which the messenger did not penetrate; and it was enough to decline the counsel, and not accept of his assistance. And with his nearest friends he made wonderful merry with this state policy, especially the procuring part, and said, 'That if he were to entertain a madam, it should be one of his own choosing, and not one of their state trumpery.' But his lordship had deeper reflections: that, besides the sullying his character, if he had such a snake in his bed, they would find a way to come, by her, into his most retired intentions: for the courtiers knew the use, that, in politics, might be made of the fair ladies, whom they could charm better than his lordship: and no spy like a female.

'To show that his lordship's court enemies, the Earl of Sunderland in particular, were hard put to it to find or invent something to report tending to the diminution of his character, I shall give an account of the most impudent buffoon-lie raised upon him, and with brazen affirmations of truth to it dispersed from the court one morning, that ever came into fools' heads; and Satan himself would not have owned it for his legtimate issue. It fell out thus: A merchant of Sir Dudley North's acquaintance had brought over an enormous rhinoceros, to be sold to showmen for profit. It is a noble beast, wonderfully armed by nature for offence, but more for defence, being covered with impenetrable shields, which no weapon could make any impression upon; and a rarity so great that few men in our country have in their whole lives opportunity to see so singular an animal. This merchant told Sir Dudley North, that if he with a friend or two had a mind to see it, they might take the opportunity at his house before it was sold. Hereupon Sir Dudley North proposed to his brother, the lord keeper, to go with him upon this expedition, which he did, and came away exceedingly satisfied with the curiosity he had seen. But whether he was dogged, to find out where he and his brother housed in the city, or flying fame carried an account of the voyage to court, I know not; but it is certain that the very next morning a bruit went from thence all over the town, and (as factious reports used to run) in a very short time, viz. that his lordship rode upon the rhinoceros; than which a more infantine exploit could not have been fastened upon him. And most people were struck with amazement at it, and divers ran here and there to find out whether it was true or not; and soon after dinner some lords and others came to his lordship to know the truth from himself, for the setters of the lie affirmed it positively, as of their own knowledge. That did not give his lordship much disturbance, for he expeeted no better from his adversaries. But that his friends, intelligent persons, who must know him to be far from guilty of any childish levity, should believe it, was what roiled him extremely: and much more when they had the face to come to him to know if it were true. I never saw him in such a rage, and to lay about him with affronts (which he keenly bestowed upon the minor courtiers that came on that errand) as then; for he sent them away with fleas in their ear. And he was seriously angry with his own brother, Sir Dudley North, because he did not contradict the lie in sudden and direct terms, but laughed, as taking the question put to him for a banter, till by iterations he was brought to it. For some lords came, and because they seemed to attribute somewhat to the avowed positiveness of the reporters, he rather chose to send for his brother to attest, than to confirm his bare denial. And so it passed; and the noble earl, with Jefferies and others of that crew, made merry and never blushed at the lie of ther own making, but valued themselves upon it as a very good jest.'

ENGLISH CASES.

ROLLS COURT—JULY.

Marriot vs. Kynnersly.

Mr Pemberton and Mr Beames for the plaintiff.—This was a bill filed against Mr Kynnersly and the personal representatives of a gentleman named Medison, for a breach of trust, in order to render them liable for certain funds which had been embezzled by their cotrustee, Mr Caye, a solicitor. The following were the circumstances of the case. In the year 1815, Charles Kynnersly, of Montague place, died, leaving the defendant, Kynnersly, his executor. Among his papers was found a package containing East India Bonds, accompanied with a direction that they were to be given to a lady named Marriot. Mr Caye had been confidential solicitor to the deceased, and he represented to Mr Kynnersly that it would not be proper to hand over this fund to that lady without having some settlement made in favor of her infant child, the natural son of the deceased. An arrangement of this description was approved of by all parties. A deed of trust was proposed, to which Mr Kynnersly refused on several occasions to be a party. It was, however, drawn up, and his name was included in it, as one of the trustees. By this instrument, the amount of the India Bonds, 3,620*l.* invested in Consols, was settled on the son of Mrs Marriot (the present plaintiff), to be paid over to him at the age of 21 years, besides a policy of insurance for 2,000*l.* on her life, the annual premium on the latter as well as the expenses of his education were directed to be defrayed out of the interest of the former. Mr Caye, Mr Medison, and Mr Kynnersly were the trustees to this deed, and in their names the Consols were vested. Mr Medison assented to the trust through confidence in Mr Caye; Mr Kynnersly, however, never assented, and never signed the deed. From the year 1815 to 1810, Mr Caye managed the receipts and expenditures with integrity; at that time, however, becoming embarrassed in his circumstances, he resolved, if possible, to appropriate the trust fund to himself. He accordingly persuaded Mr Medison, under a specious representation, to empower him, by a letter of attorney, to sell out the Consols. He then wrote to Mr Kynnersly, who was in the country, informed him that there was a necessity to make sale of a portion of the Consuls, requested his letter of attorney for that purpose, and telling him that by such a proceeding he would at once disembarrass himself of that trusteeship in which he had been involved. Mr Kynnersly, anxious to rid himself of a responsibility so unwillingly and unwittingly incurred, executed and despatched the required document. Thus empowered, Mr Caye made himself master of the 3,620*l.* and in 1822 absconded, leaving the premiums on the policy of insurance in the Equitable Office from 1819 unpaid, which consequently was rendered null. The plaintiff, having come of age in 1827, filed this bill. Mr Medison had died, but his representatives were made liable, and had admitted assets. With regard to them, the Learned Counsel submitted that they were answerable to the plaintiff, and that Mr Kynnersly's case, however hard, was equally clear. A person made trustee against his will could not escape from that office except with the concurrence of those who had appointed him, or by transferring his functions to some other person, under the direction of that Court. His only security consisted in a determination to act. The defendant, in this case, had not availed himself of that mode of proceeding, and continued therefore responsible. The bill prayed the restoration of the 3,620*l.* with its dividends, and a remuneration equivalent to the value which the policy of insurance would have borne had its premium been paid up to the present day.

Mr Tinney, for the defendant, said that if the Court should feel itself bound to decide against his client, it would be called upon to perform an act of the severest justice that could ever fall within the exercise of its functions.

Mr Tinney proceeded, and stated that Mr Clement Kynnersly, the father of the plaintiff, had, long previous to his death, left and directed the India Bonds, which had supplied the lost fund, to be given to Mrs Marriot. He had, however, subsequently made a will, and by that will alone had, in the eye of the law, rendered the gift nugatory. The defendant, who nevertheless was his executor, with the greatest honor and good feeling, had not taken advantage, as he could have done, of this circumstance, but had handed over the Bonds according to their original destination. He had constantly refused to concur in his appointment as trustee; he had not signed the deed, and, in the act upon which it was sought to render him responsible, he had been guided by the confidential solicitor of his deceased relative. He (Mr Tinney) hoped, however, that his Honor would not consider that there had been in his client's conduct any of that wilful negligence or default which influenced the decision of the Court in cases of breach of trust. The Learned Counsel also submitted that it appeared on the plaintiff's bill that Mrs Marriot had previous to her marriage (an event which took place since the occurrence of those transactions) absolved Mr Caye from all liability; that she had the power to do so, as the deed had been voluntary (see Walwyn v. Cook; 3 Merrivale, 707); and that the defendants were also thereby, and a fortiori, absolved.

Mr Tinney's Learned Junior argued very ingeniously on the same side, and, in conclusion, remarked that the plaintiff, by this bill, made a sad return to the defendant, Mr Kynnersly, for his generous conduct, in handing over to his mother that very bond which he sought to compel him to pay again out of his own pocket in consequence of, at most, an inadvertence.

Mr Bickersteth, for the other defendants, confessed that he feared the case was as clear as it was unfortunate against his clients. He hoped, however, that the heavier liability would be thrown upon Mr Kynnersly. Mr Medison had merely acted for the accommodation of the parties interested in the deed. He had placed confidence in Mr Caye; and it was only when he was informed that Mr Kynnersly had assented to the power of attorney that he also had concurred. While all the culpability rested with Mr Caye, the liability lay with Mr Kynnersly.

Mr Swanstead, on the same side, submitted that there ought to be an inquiry into the existence of the deed referred to by the plaintiff's bill; also as to the point whether the plaintiff had ever assented to the proceedings of the trustees, previous to the filing of the bill.

His Honor said that those matters were not referred to in the bill or answer, and could not be suggested by Counsel at the bar. He could not pay attention to, or draw any inference from, such statements. He should look alone to the record. This was a case of great hardship to Medison, but of much greater hardship to Mr Kynnersly. Mr Medison had chosen to place confidence in Caye, and it had been betrayed. By the principles of equity, and that Court was guided in its decision by equity, if he thought proper to commit his trust to the confidence of another, and that other neglected his duty, he (Medison) should suffer for it. Mr Kynnersly's was a different case—a case of greater severity. He (the Master of the Rolls) did admit that scarcely a man out of the profession of the law, and not many in it, would have acted otherwise than Mr Kynnersly had done. But that was no defence. The question was, whether Mr Kynnersly, being unwilling to act, had thrown the trust in hands by which it was liable to be misapplied? Had he been desirous to avoid the responsibility of the trust, he should have refused to concur in its exercise. He (the Master of the Rolls) did not therefore charge Mr Kynnersly with a breach of trust, but with having placed it in hands where it was liable to be misapplied, and was misapplied. But as that gentleman had not committed himself until he had written the letter of attorney, consequently he should be irresponsible for all deficiencies prior to that act—consequently he should not be liable for the failure of the policy of insurance. As Mr Medison had voluntarily accepted the trust, his representatives should be liable for the breach of that confidence which he had thought proper to repose in Caye.

His Honor then directed that there should be an account taken of the moneys which, prior to 1819, had been expended bona fide by Caye, and said he should not give costs against Mr Kynnersly.

Mr Pemberton requested that the fund might be restored as soon as possible, as his client was a young Clergyman, just come from Oxford, about to enter upon his duties, and in want of money.

His Honor directed the money to be paid into Court as soon as possible. He did not suppose there could be any difficulty on the part of Mr Kynnersly, as he supposed he was the gentleman of that name of Staffordshire.

Mr Tinney asked would the Court require the Consols to be replaced now to the same nominal amount as they had been in 1819, as that would be an additional hardship?

His Honor—Yes, I can't stop short. The principle of the Court is indemnity.

Mr Egar, for the plaintiff, said that as the bill had been dismissed with costs, as against the defendant, Davies, who had purchased a part of the estate, upon notice, the other defendants ought to be held responsible for those costs to the plaintiff, they having been incurred through their conduct.

The Counsel for the defendants, Drayton and Wilde, opposed this application, on the ground that the plaintiff could have dismissed the defendant Davies from the suit at its commencement, if she had liked, knowing as she did, how the defendant Davies had become possessed of his portion of the estate; instead of that, they had dragged him through this long suit.

The Vice Chancellor decided that the defendants should repay those costs to the plaintiff, as well as their own costs.

Here the case ended. From the number of Counsel engaged in this case, and the confused manner in which the discussion of the minutes was carried on, no less than five or six Counsel speaking at the same time, we found it an impossibility to give anything like a detailed report of the proceedings as they occurred, and we are therefore obliged to content ourselves with the above imperfect sketch of what passed.

EXTRACTS FROM THE GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

AUCTION DUTIES.

My attention has been drawn to a decision of the Supreme Judicial Court of the Commonwealth, at the last term in Suffolk, in an action of debt brought by the Treasurer, on an Auctioneer's Bond, for the recovery of a sum of money supposed to have accrued to the Government, under the Statute of 1822, Ch. 87, imposing duties upon Sale by Auction. The act provides that all Real and Personal Estate, with certain exceptions not affecting the case, which shall at any time be exposed to sale at public auction or vendue, shall be subject to certain specified duties. In the case before the Court, the transaction was an offer at auction to lease certain tenements for five years to the highest bidder of an annual rent for their occupation, for that time. The contract was struck off at a bid of $1950 annually and a Lease, by Deed of Indenture, thereupon executed between the owners in fee, and the Purchaser. It was held by the Court, that this was not a sale of Real or Personal Estate under the Statute, there being no Estate sold, but a mere contract to create an Estate for years. 'All that was offered to be sold and was sold, (say the Court,) was an engagement or contract to lease the Estate for five years. It was only in fact to ascertain the Annual Rent in the form of a Sale.'

This construction, although unquestionably sound, and required by the language used in the Statute, was different from that which had been practically adopted at the Treasury, and, in its application, it is apprehended may seriously affect the revenue from sales by Auction. It certainly indicates a defect in the law, through which, by a little management, its provisions may, in many cases, be evaded. Contracts, by auction, to lease real estate are of frequent occurrence. They are made for all periods of time, from a single quarter, to a length of continuance short only of an absolute fee. In principle there can be no difference between a contract for a Lease for five years, and one for ninetynine years, a limitation not unfrequent in the transfer of Real Property. If the law is to attach to no contract of sale by auction, but where the property itself, in its pre-existing state is the subject of the sale, a class of cases will escape the tax, which are clearly within the reason of the Enactment. Most transfers may be effected by such executory engagements. Any less estate, carved out of a greater, is as truly a new created interest, as a term for years out of a tenancy in fee. It is intimated in the opinion of the Court, that the sale of an actually existing lease may be within the liability to the duty. But it is manifest that the duty here would be evaded, by a contract to assign a property, less in amount or duration, or in any respect other than the lease itself, with the whole interest held under it. The rule of construction given to the law, may, possibly, also be made to apply to personal property.

For Merchandize itself, a contract in form, to deliver merchandize may, in some instances, conveniently enough be substituted; and in lieu of a sale of goods, there may be only an engagement with the highest bidder, for supplies of goods. For aught I can perceive, all the raw materials for manufacturing establishments or for other objects might, through the intervention of auctions, thus be provided, and their products, in return, disposed of. Instead of a hundred bales of Cotton, for instance, an offer to contract for furnishing this article, in any quantity and for any time, might be the subject of sale to the highest bidder. In this, no property would be sold, but an engagement only to furnish property, and the bid, as in the case of the lease, would but ascertain the price. If, therefore, the Legislature intend, that sales of this description shall hereafter pay a duty, the law requires amendment. The case decided by the Court may be of a class intentionally omitted, but the construction which the law has received will present questions of more important bearing. The subject is worthy of regard, and I recommend the expediency of revising the Statute, to your consideration. Should this be done, it may be necessary to prescribe a mode, by which, when the sale is for a contingent sum, or upon an annual rent, the amount of duty shall be determined.

LAW OF PRINCIPAL AND ACCESSORY.

The Judicial investigation of an appalling outrage upon the inviolability of Habitation and Person, in a neighboring County, during the last year, has induced to a more thorough discussion, and certain understanding of the Law in relation to Principals and Accessories in Felonies. It is now solemnly settled, by the highest legal tribunal, that the Rule of the Common Law, which requires that the principal Felon must be convicted before a supposed Accessory can be put upon Trial, unless by his own consent, is directory to the administration of Justice in this Commonwealth. The Court, indeed, while feeling constrained to yield to the authority, express great disapprobation of this distinction. The late learned and lamented Chief Justice, whose last act, in a life of eminent virtue, true greatness, and public service, was a profound researcher into the foundation and support of the doctrine of the Common Law, in its application to our system of jurisprudence, that he might find wherewithal to overrule it, pronounced the difference which existed, in regard, to the form and manner of Trial of Principals, Accessories before the fact, 'a relic of the unwise refinement of ancient times,' and suggested 'that the Legislature would probably afford a remedy for future cases.' The unsoundness of a rule, which, however plausibly it may be sustained by reasoning in the abstract, that there can be no Accessory without a Principal, and that there is no Principal until conviction, yet practically has a bearing only towards impunity for crime, cannot be apparent. Its effect may be, and often has been, to discharge one guilty man, because another eludes Justice. Successful concealment or escape, or death by the visitation of Providence, or an act of self-violence, may prevent a conviction of him who might be the weak and tempted instrument of another in the commission of crime, and the consequence is entire immunity to the profligate and abandoned contriver and instigator of the wickedness.

Nor is the rule itself well supported by the only reason on which it rests. Innocence is not thereby better guarded from peril. There may be even less safety to the accused from this very course of proceeding. When deeds of rare and dreadful atrocity are perpetrated, and public mind becomes greatly excited, the Trial of a supposed Principal may be precipitated or unconsciously prejudiced, in an honest zeal to reach the more guilty Accessory. But to the Accessory there can be no increase of danger from his previous trial to that of the Principal. He cannot be convicted without proof of the guilt of both, and doubt as to the participation of either in the imputed offence, will sufficiently avail to his security. So satisfactory, in recent times, were the objections to the law, in that country whence we derived it, that an Act of Parliament was passed in the last reign, for its alteration; and now, in England, by the 7th George 4th, he who hires or procures a felony to be committed, 'may be indicted and convicted, either as an accessory before the fact to the principal felony, together with the principal Felon, or after the conviction of the principal Felon; or may be indicted and convicted of a substantive the felony, whether the principal Felon shall or shall not have been previously convicted, or shall or shall not be amenable to justice.' The well known circumstances of the transaction to which I have alluded will furnish to your minds the best illustration of the reason for passing a similar Statute here. I submit it to you, respectfully, that it should not be the reproach of an enlightened Commonwealth, in a liberal age, that it became the last repository of the 'relic' of a barbarous jurisprudence.

---

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JAN. 7.

Mr Gray, from Boston, in offering an order for inquiry into the expediency of altering the limitation laws, said—

He was unwilling to offer orders as matters of course upon trifling subjects; but this was one deserving consideration. It is well known that it is the policy of every government to limit the period within which actions may be commenced. A person by our own laws holding real estate in quiet possession for forty years, gains an exclusive title thereto; and another person having legal claims to that estate cannot enforce them,—he has lost his title by his own neglect in not enforcing it sooner. There is a limit to the bringing of personal actions beyond a period of 6 years. These laws seem to need amendment in several points, and he would state his reasons for it then, because the house would not probably have any more leisure opportunity for listening to them. There are two points in which the law should be amended—one relates to subsequent promises—the other to merchants' accounts.

It is well known that promises, subsequent to the expiration of 6 years from the contract, take any case out of the statute. It was formerly held that not merely a promise to pay, but any admission of the debt was sufficient; and it came to be a proverb that a man could not open his mouth without annulling the limitation. But lately the courts have taken a stronger stand, and have held, that it must be a substantial promise, sufficient to create an obligation denovo. A few years since, the late Chief Justice, then a member of this House, brought in a bill, providing that such subsequent promise should be made in writing—it passed the House and was not acted upon in the Senate, therefore the subject remains open for consideration, and seems to demand some careful attention.

The other objection relates to personal accounts—it is provided that the law shall not apply to merchants' accounts. It was held in England, that one item charged within 6 years should draw the whole account after it; but in our State it is decided that there need be no item within 6 years, and that it is in effect deciding that there is no limitation. There has been a case recently decided in which the latest item of the account took place more than 24 years before the action was brought—a case between father and son, brought after the death of the father, who might have been able, if living, to refute the claim; but it was case had not passed beyond his control, at the time of the service of the writ, to consider whether he will obey the writ of the Supreme Court of the United States or not. On this question he must act on his own responsibility, and not upon the authority of the resolutions of the Legislature. We are not sufficiently conversant with the forms of judicial proceedings, in cases of this sort, to judge how far it could be in the power of the Judge to suspend the execution of the sentence, after the service of the writ of error, if he were so disposed.—Boston Daily Adv.

George W. Buchanan has been appointed United States Attorney for the Western District of Penn., in place of Alexander Brackenridge, Esq.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 15, 1831.

SUPREME COURT.

SUFFOLK COUNTY.—NOV. TERM.

Opinions were delivered by Judge Putnam, in the following cases on Monday, the 10th inst.

Harvard College vs. Francis Amory, Trustee.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Probate Court upon the petition of Amory to be discharged as Trustee, under the will of the late Mr McLean, by which the income of a certain amount of property, or funds to be selected from the Testator's Estate by the Trustees, was given, in remainder, to Harvard College and the McLean Hospital. The funds were not specifically designated by the Testator—the amount only being fixed, and the power of selection given to Amory and others, Trustees named in the will.

The selection was made out of certain Manufacturing Stock belonging to the Estate. The Trustees were also Executors of the will. The Petition of Amory to be discharged was resisted on the ground that the funds were not such as the Trustees should have selected; that the investment was injudicious and illegal. And as the stock had fallen in value, they were bound to make up the deficiency. The Court held that the trustees, having the power of selection, were required to exercise a sound discretion in regard to the investment, and, having done so, were not to be charged with any loss. That they were bound to make up any deficiency only in case of fault on their part or a breach of their trust. That it was not necessary that the investment should be made in Government Stock. The Stock of private companies was, in many cases, preferable; such as Bank or Manufacturing Stock. There was risk in all. That risk should not fall on honest Trustees. They were considered favorably, and if they acted with good motive, and with discretion, would be protected. They should be so; otherwise no man would take the hazard of such offices.

Besides, the Court regarded the settlement of the Executors' account in the Probate Court, some years since, with notice to all concerned, from which settlement there had been no appeal, as conclusive upon the subject matter of this action. The Stock had then been selected and appropriated according to the will, and that appropriation was there considered and made the subject of adjudication.

The decree of the Probate Court was affirmed with costs.

QUESTION OF TOTAL LOSS.

Henry Hall and others vs. the Franklin Ins. Co.

The Court, in deciding this case, remarked that it did not intend to extend the power of the master to sell beyond the principles laid down in Gordon vs. Mass. Fire and Marine Insurance Co.—2 Pickering, 249.—[In that case Parker, Ch. J., says, 'that a master of a vessel, as such, has has no authority to sell the vessel, unless in a case of extreme necessity, and where he acts with the most perfect good faith for the interests of those who are concerned in the property.' 'All the Judges, who have adverted to this subject, except Lord Mansfield, have put the authority of the master to sell, upon the ground of extreme necessity.']

This power was to be confined to cases of extreme, cogent necessity; a necessity which prescribes the law for itself, and compels the master to act. It must be an absolute, positive necessity, arising from the facts and circumstances at the time. The duty of the master was to hold the property in safety, as long as possible, for the interest of all concerned.

As to the abandonment, which was set up in the case, the court remarked, that being made while the vessel was sailing and in safety, it could not aid the plaintiffs. The facts and circumstances at the time of abandonment are to govern the case.

As to the repairs, the costs were to be estimated where they were actually made, and not at the place of disaster.

There was no such doctrine as that imminent danger of a total loss will justify an abandonment. Such a doctrine would lead to great uncertainty and litigation. The contract was to insure against loss sustained, not against danger of loss.

Judgment of Court, that plaintiffs were not entitled to recover as for a total loss.

[In the case of Peele et al. vs. The Merchants' Insurance Company—Mason's Reports, 3 v., 27—where this subject is considered, Justice Story remarks, 'if the facts then present a case of extreme hazard, and of probable expenses, exceeding half the value of the ship, the party may abandon, although in the event, it turn out that the ship is gotten off at a less expense.' 11. Johns R. 293. 2 Starkie, 571. Maule and Selw. 240—248. 'An absolute total loss is not necessary to justify an abandonment. It is sufficient, if at the time it be in the highest degree probable, to sound judgments acting upon all the facts. If there be any general principle, that pervades and governs them (the cases on this subject,) it seems to be this, that the right to abandon exists, whenever, from the circumstances of the case, the ship, for all the useful purposes of a ship for the voyage, is, for the present, gone from the control of the owner, and the time when she will be restored to him in a state to resume the voyage is uncertain or unreasonably distant, or the risk and expense are disproportioned to the expected benefit and objects of the voyage. In such a case the law deems the ship, though having physical existence, as ceasing to exist for purposes of utility, and therefore subjects her to be treated as lost.' 4 Cranch 41, 207. Vide Wood vs. Lincoln and Kennebec Insurance Company.—Mass. R. 6, 479.]

Sproul vs. Hemmenway.

Motion to set aside the verdict as being against the weight of evidence.

Verdict set aside and new Trial granted.

The Legislature of Ohio has elected Eben. Lane, Esq. a judge of the Supreme Court.

Judge Emmot, in the full vigor of his usefulness, has retired, to the great regret of the Bar. Being more than sixty years of age, by a strange provision lately introduced into our Constitution, he is excluded ftom sitting upon the bench of this State. —N. Y. Gazette.

Francis Jeffrey has been appointed King's advocate for Scotland, and Henry Cockburn, Solicitor.

Justice Bayley of the King's Bench resigned his appointment Nov. 13th.

Mr Justice Bayley is to be removed to the Exchequer, in consequence of the opening of that Court inducing the expectation that it will be the means of relieving the King's Bench of some of the business. Mr Taunton will be a Judge of the Common Pleas.

It is understood that Mr Alderson is appointed one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, and Mr Gurney one of the Judges of the Court of King's Bench; and it is said that Mr Justice Bayley will receive an appointment in the Court of Exchequer, for the trial of Nisi Prius causes in that Court.

It ought to be generally known, that any attorney of the Court of King's Bench, or Common Pleas, may now be admitted an attorney of the Court of Exchequer, on payment of a fee of one shilling; and that, being so admitted, he may practice in the Court of Exchequer, without the intervention of a clerk in Court.

Mr Brougham is appointed Lord Chancellor of England—Lord Althorp Chancellor of the Exchequer; Mr Denman, Attorney General, and Mr Bickersteth, Solicitor General; Mr Robert Grant, Judge Advocate.

Sir James Burrough, late one of the Judges of the Common Pleas, having in his judicial capacity, on the Western Circuit, excited the resentment of some loose characters, an attempt on his life was, it is said, contemplated by some of the Hampshire and Wiltshire rioters a few days since, whose nefarious plans were, however, frustated by Sir James and his family setting off for London in the dead of the night.

Mr Brougham, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill for establishing Local Jurisdictions in England and Wales, took occasion to complain of the conduct which the attorneys had adopted towards him. He represented them as having entered into a conspiracy against him, with the view of ruining him in his profession, solely because he wished to make the law accessible to the poor as well as to the rich. He declared, however, that all their threats should not have the slightest effect in deterring him from the discharge of his duty.

LAW REFORM.—November.—Mr Campbell gave notice that it was his intention shortly after the recess to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law with respect to property and succession, containing, among other provisions, a clause entitling parents to succeed as heirs to their children: also a Bill to amend the laws relating to dower; and a Bill to abolish fines and recoveries, and to substitute other assurances. Those Bills would make important changes in the laws of England, but he wished to observe at the same time that they came recommended by the unanimous sanction of the Law Commission.

WHITMAN'S LETTERS. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN, 141 Washington Street, 'Two Letters to Rev. Moses Stuart,' on Religious Liberty, occasioned by his Letter to Rev. Wm. E. Channing. By Bernard Whitman. Jan. 1.

SIXTY MAPS of the various countries of the Globe, from the Epitome of Universal Geography. For sale at GRAY & BOWEN'S, 141 Washington Street. Price 50 cents, bound. Jan. 1.

THIS DAY PUBLISHED, by GRAY & BOWEN, an APPENDIX to the American Almanac, for the year 1831, being the latter part of the fiftyfifth, and the beginning of the fiftysixth year of the Independence of the United States.

Extract from the Preliminary Observations on the Astronomical Department of the American Almanac.

The Appendix is intended to answer all the essential purposes of a Nautical Almanac, and the insertion therein of the distances of the Moon from the Planets, and of the proportional logarithm of the difference between the distances, it is hoped, will be found an improvement on any Almanac hitherto published. Jan. 1.

LIBRARY OF EDUCATION. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN,

The Library of Education, Vol. I. —Containing 'Some Thoughts concerning Education.' By John Locke, and a 'Treatise of Education,' by John Milton, with an Appendix, containing Locke's Memoranda on Study. Edited by Wm. Russell, late editor of the Journal of Education.

Extract from the Preface.

'The present volume is intended to form one of a series of standard treatises on the subject of Education. The work now commenced will, it is hoped, form a useful source of information to parents and teachers; furnishing to the latter a sort of professional library, to which individuals may resort for assistance in the labor of instruction, and offering to the former an aid to the formation of just and extensive views of the whole scope of education, as well as a preparation for cooperating with instruction, in their exertions for the mental advancement of the young.' Jan. 1.

PARLEY'S ASIA. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN, Peter Parley's Tales about Asia, with a Map and numerous Engravings. This is designed as a fourth volume in a series of Geographical and Historical Tales for Children. Tales of America, Europe, and Africa, have already been published. Tales of Islands in the Pacific Ocean, Tales of the Sea, and Tales of the Sun, Moon, and Stars, will complete the series. These three last are in a state of forwardness.

GRAY & BOWEN, have just published, TALES OF TRAVELS West of the Mississippi, with a Map and numerous Engravings, by Solomon Bell, late keeper of the Traveller's Library, Province House Court, Boston. This volume is the first of a series which is intended to supply to the Children of the United States, an entertaining abstract of the most popular books of Travels which have lately appeared.

G. & B. also have for sale—
Peter Parley's Tales about Africa.
Peter Parley's Tales about Europe.
Peter Parley's Tales about Animals, with three hundred Engravings.
Peter Parley's Juvenile Tales.
Peter Parley's Winter Evening Tales.
Peter Parley's Geography for Children. Jan. 1.

GIRL'S OWN BOOK. This day published by CARTER, HENDEE, & BABCOCK,

'The Girl's Own Book.' By Mrs Child, author of Hobomok, and Evenings in New England, and editor of the Juvenile Miscellany.

'I have no trinkets, cakes, or toys,
As gifts for little girls and boys,
But look within, and you will find
Both food and playthings for the mind.'

The Girl's Own Book is intended for those who are too old to read merely infantile books, yet somewhat too young for such costly presents as the Annuals. It embraces a great variety of subjects: All sorts of Games and Exercises suitable for Girls—Directions for Sewing and Knitting, Needlebooks, Pincushions, Purses, Boxes, and Bags of all sorts—Charades, Puzzles, &c.—Fables, Stories, and Maxims, Poetry, Gardening, Silk Worms, and Bees. Jan. 1.

AMERICAN ALMANAC, Second Edition. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN, The American Almanac and Repository of Useful Knowledge, Vol. II., for the year 1831. Jan. 1.

GRAY AND BOWEN, have just received, No. 1, of SURGICAL ANATOMY OF THE ARTERIES, with plates and illustrations. By Nathan R. Smith, M. D. Professor of Surgery in the University of Maryland. January 1.

WORKING MEN'S PARTY. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN, 141 Washington Street, A Lecture on the Working Men's Party, delivered before the Charlestown Lyceum, October 6, 1830. By Edward Everett.

MALTE-BRUN SCHOOL GEOGRAPHY.—This day published by CARTER, HENDEE, & BABCOCK, The Malte-Brun School Geography, illustrated by numerous original engravings, and an Atlas of 19 Maps, Charts, and Tables. By S. Griswold Goodrich. Jan. 1.

EVENTS IN PARIS, during the 26, 27, 28, and 29th of July, 1830. By several eye witnesses. Translated from the fourth Paris edition. This day published by CARTER, HENDEE, & BABCOCK.

GRAY & BOWEN, have in preparation, and will very shortly put to press,

A NEW DICTIONARY OF MEDICAL SCIENCE AND LITERATURE; which will contain a concise account of the various subjects in Anatomy, Physiology, Pathology, Therapeutics, Materia Medica, Surgery, Obstetrics, and Pharmacy, with the Etymology and Orthoepy of the terms of their Greek, Latin, French, and German synonymes;—a copious Bibliography appended to the different articles, and Biographical Notices of the most eminent Authors in the different departments of Medical Science, with a Catalogue of their principal works mentioned and an Epitome of the existing state of Medical Science and Literature. By Robley Dunglison, M. D. Professor of Medicine in the University of Virginia &c, &c.

While many of the nations of Continental Europe possess Dictionaries, which have kept pace with the advancing condition of Medical Science, Great Britain and America possess it may be said, but one of a concise character,—that of Hooper,—which independently of its want of accuracy on many points, is incontestibly far behind the present state of Medical Science and Literature, and unfit for the purposes of the Medical Student. In proof of this, it will be sufficient to remark, that the New Dictionary will contain at least five thousand words more than are to be found in that publication,—while the circumstance of the Dictionary of Hooper being stereotyped in this country, renders it impracticable to make the necessary additions to it, were the ground work such as to render such a course advisable.

The work will not be a mere Dictionary of terms; it will comprise concise histories of diseases: a description and doses of various kinds of medicine, with formula for the different Pharmacentrical preparations, &c, &c.

The important publications daily appearing in France and Germany, have induced the author to add the French and German synonymes to the various terms; so that the work will really contain the substance of an English, French and German Dictionary, at a comparatively trifling expense.—The French Index will be found to include every word in the 'Dictionaire des Science Medicales,' which consists of sixty volumes, as well as in the smaller Dictionaries more recently published.

Great attention has been, moreover, paid to the Greek and Latin synonymes, so that the Dictionary will, it is trusted, form a safe and convenient guide to the study of ancient and modern authors on Medicine.

It will be comprised in one large volume, 8vo. Oct. 23.

WEBSTER'S WRITINGS. This day published by GRAY & BOWEN, No. 141, Washington-street—Speeches and Forensic Arguments by Daniel Webster, with a highly finished portrait drawn from life, and engraved on steel, by J. B. Longacre.

'We offer this volume of Mr Webster's Speeches to our Countrymen in full confidence that they will sustain the high reputation they have already acquired for Political Wisdom, and true Eloquence.'—Editor's Preface. Jan. 8.

GRAY AND BOWEN, No. 141, Washington Street, Boston, have recently published the following valuable works.

I. A DESCRIPTION OF TREMONT HOUSE; WITH ARCHITECTURAL ILLUSTRATIONS.—4to.

'Jam scires ab introitu primo—herculentum et amvenum videre et diversonium.' APULEIUS, M. A V.

This work is embellished with a copper-plate engraving, representing the front of the house, and thirty lithographic prints, exhibiting the details of the structure. Its object will be understood by the following extract from the preface.

'The present publication is intended to satisfy a curiosity, which frequent inquiries for a description of Tremont House were supposed to indicate.

'Its original plan was to furnish such particulars relative to this establishment as strangers might wish to possess, but it has been extended so as to comprehend many architectural details, which will probably be interesting to mechanics; as much of the ornamental work of Tremont House was copied or adopted from books, not commonly in their hands, and has not before been executed in this country.

II. AN EPITOME OF UNIVERSAL GEOGRAPHY; or, a Description of the various Countries of the Globe; with a view of their Political Condition at the present time. With sixty Maps. By NATHAN HALE.

III. A DICTIONARY OF GENERAL KNOWLEDGE; or, an Explanation of Words and Things connected with all the Arts and Sciences. Illustrated with numerous Wood Cuts. By GEORGE CRABB, A. M., Author of 'English Synonymes,' 'Technological Dictionary,' and 'Historical Dictionary.'

IV. THE VESTAL—A TALE OF POMPEII. 1 Vol. 12mo.

'Oh Time, thou beautifier of the dead,
Adorner of the ruin.' CHILDE HAROLD.

V. AUTHORSHIP. A Tale. By a New Englander over Sea. 1 Vol. 12mo.

VI. AN ORATION; Delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, Cambridge, Mass. August 26th, 1830. By the Rev. ORVILLE DEWEY.

VII. THE DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Published under the Direction of the President of the United States, from the Original Manuscripts in the Department of State, conformably to a resolution of Congress, of March 27, 1818. Edited by JARED SPARKS.

This important Correspondence, now for the first time published, will form eleven volumes. Eight are already published and the remainder will appear very shortly.

VIII. JEFFERSON'S WORKS, In four Volumes. Accompanied with a Portrait on steel, and a fac-simile of the original draft of the Declaration of Independence. Second Edition.

IX. THE NEW TESTAMENT, conformed to Griesbach's Text. 1 Vol. 12mo.

THE TOKEN, a Christmas and New Year's Present, for 1831. Edited by S. G. Goodrich.

'Then take my flower, and let its leaves
Beside thy heart be cherished near.
While that confiding heart receives
The thought it whispers to thine ear.'

The engravings for the Token of this year are executed by Cheney, Ellis, Gallaudet, and others; among the contributors are Dewey, Greenwood, Miss Sedgwick, Mrs Sigourney, Hall, Peabody, Wetmore, author of a Year in Spain, author of Tales of the Northwest, Neal, Thatcher, Mrs Hale, and others of the first reputation.

The work is larger than heretofore, and is done up in splendid embossed morocco. The literary department is considered decidedly superior to the former years, and in all respects it has received the greatest care and attention. Oct 23.

LAW BOOKS.—HILLIARD, GRAY & Co. 134 Washington Street, have on hand a large Stock of American and English Law Books, comprising a complete assortment of the best editions of all works in general use. They also purchase and sell second hand Law Books—terms liberal.

H., G. & Co. supply any volumes that may be wanted of Massachusetts or Pickering's Reports.

THE JURISPRUDENT

IS PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY EVENING, AT THREE DOLLARS A YEAR.

BY GRAY AND BOWEN.

Printed by Isaac R. Butts, No. 25 School Street.

THE JURISPRUDENT.

PUBLISHED BY GRAY AND BOWEN, 141 WASHINGTON STREET.

VOL. I. BOSTON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 22, 1831. NO. XXVI.

DEBATE ON CHANCERY REFORM,

IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, JUNE, 1830.

REMARKS OF MR BROUGHAM.

Mr Brougham rose, and began by observing that the motion brought forward by the Hon. and Learned Gentleman (Sir C. Wetherel) put to the test, all those persons who hitherto professed themselves anxious for a reform in the Court of Chancery. It ought to be borne in mind that, since the time when the Commissioners were appointed, in 1811 and 1824, new circumstances had arisen, and new facts had been elicited, while a state of things appeared differing altogether from that which had existed before. In 1827, the present Lord Chancellor shortly after his accession to office, pledged himself to effect reform, and seemed only anxious to obtain time for the purpose. 'Give me,' said he, 'but a little time—but one season, and I pledge my reputation—I pledge myself on the faith of Parliament, on the faith of the Court of Chancery, and of the practitioners in that Court, that I will mature a plan for securing the discharge of all the business faithfully and accurately.' Such was the pledge of the Lord Chancellor. Well, they gave him not one year, but three, and in the lapse of that time no change was thought of; no reform agitated by him; no bending of the understanding of a man young in years but still younger in office —(cheers). No alteration whatever was made in the Master's office, except that payment was to be made by salaries, and not by fees. This was all that was done towards reforming an office which was now a sink of delay, and a storehouse of vexatious abuses—(cheers). What did this state of things imply? What argument was to be drawn from it? Nothing more than this—the Lord Chancellor would seem to say, 'Give me that system which shall enable me to hold the Great Seal without discharging any of the duties of my office.' This was the reform to which that Noble and Learned person appeared to have pledged himself. He (Mr Brougham) had likewise pledged himself upon the question of Chancery reform, and here he must say that he thought he might have trusted to the habits of industry and exertion for which the Lord Chancellor was well known, as a security that his Lordship would not sanction unnecessary delay by making the Woolsack a place of slumber in the midst of power, instead of a place of duty and of judgment—(cheers). He thought he might have safely relied that the business of the suitors would alone be attended to; but as he now found that the office of Lord Chancellor was to be a place of perfect repose, he, for one, could not think of voting away the money of the people of England, in order that that noble person might lead a more quiet and less active life. Here he must further say that he was now ready to accept the challenge which had been held out to him by the Right Hon. Gentleman opposite, and to show that all that was said as to the necessity of this appointment, was a mere vision, a Midsummer Night's Dream, and quite as baseless. With respect to the statement about five hundred cases being in arrear, he considered that of no import whatever. So small an amount could not be regarded as any arrear at all. But what could he say of the Court of Exchequer? It appeared they were now discussing the merits of that Court, at an hour when the House was fast going into the night's tomorrow—(hear, hear). That Court, in which business there was none, and of which it was said that parties might think themselves lucky if they caught the Judges sitting, as they were like pheasants in November, no sooner down than up again—(a laugh). What could he say of Learned Judges, who knew of no change, except that they wore scarlet robes at one period of the year, and doublets without fur at another? Yet, could the fact be for a moment imagined, though it was nevertheless true? In the Court of Exchequer there were fifteen cases in arrear within a single fortnight. The business in that Court was continually going down till it reached Zero, and at last arrived at a point which meant nothing, or, rather, at a negative quantity, which was worse than nothing. He was not a little surprised at the course taken this evening by his Hon. and Learned Friend, whom he might now call his successor for Winchelsea (Mr J. Williams), and whose celerity in running after and detecting former abuses was only equalled by the speed with which he seemed anxious to run away from new ones. His Hon. and Learned Friend, who, from long experience, perfectly understood both sides of the question, told the House that they ought not to tax judicial officers any more than other individuals to a degree beyond their powers. This course of argument was very new to his Hon. Friend, who now, for the first time, discovered that the Chancery Judges were worked too severely—(hear, hear). But what, he would ask, were the exertions of the Master of the Rolls? Why, he sat after breakfast, instead of after dinner; he sat for six hours, instead of four; and he devoted one or two holidays to hear arrears instead of otherwise disposing himself—(a laugh). He (Mr Brougham) was inclined to allow the Judges all reasonable indulgence and relaxation; and if it was necessary that they should be composed of persons of profound learning, enlarged views, and great enlightenment, they ought not to be treated like galley slaves. But then it was quite absurd to suppose that the present Judges of the Court of Chancery had too great a weight of business imposed upon him. The Vice-Chancellor would laugh to scorn any man who should presume to commiserate him as too highly worked. Then as to the Master of the Rolls, he would ask if that Learned person was a slave, except in the manner of those parties in the West Indies, who exerted themselves during the day and amused themselves, in the evening? The Vice-Chancellor followed this rule; he exerted himself during the day, and amused himself in the evening. To found the necessity of a new appointment upon the principle of the Judges being overworked, was most preposterous—it was a baseless vision, idle as the tale of Robin Goodfellow and Puck. The Honorable and Learned Gentleman, in the course of some further observations, maintained that to countenance the proposed appointment of an additional Judge was like purchasing an additional horse to drag a coach to the top of a hill, when one might be hired for the purpose. Upon the principle now before the House, there was to be no successor to the purchased horse; but his proposition was, that there was no necessity whatever for the purchase. The carriage had already gained the top of the hill, drawn by those two excellent horses, the Vice-Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls. Where, then, was the occasion for any auxiliary?—(a laugh). But his objections to this motion were still higher than those he had yet stated. If there was any one object which was more desirable than another to be attained in judicial administration, it was, that everything connected with the Court of Chancery should be pure and unsullied. But even though that Court should be made the purest tribunal in the world—even if the Courts of Common Law should, as was suggested by his Hon. and Learned Friend (Mr J. Williams), draw back from it a large portion of its business, an event which he (Mr Brougham) would call a restoration, still it would be necessary to look to its constitution in every respect; for so long as infants and guardians were found in the country, and so long as various complex matters of judicial administration remained to be decided, a Court of Chancery could never cease to exist. Such a Court must always be a tribunal of the highest importance in the country, and it was therefore the more necessary, that all persons presiding over it should be fully qualified to discharge the great responsible duties which devolved upon them. But he would ask, was it possible that, after a proposition like this should have been once carried into a law, a proposition which went to make the Chancellor's situation a judicial sinecure, that any such persons could be found as candidates for the seals? In such a case the Lord Chancellor would be a mere Judge of Appeal —nothing more. He would cease to be a man looked up to as the first lawyer in the country, and filling the first judicial office in the country—an office of which he ought at all times to be the ornament—(hear). In such a case the House of Lords would lose all its authority, and the first tribunal of the land it just influence. His Hon. and Learned Friend, the Solicitor General, among others, had used the argument that in 1811, Sir Samuel Romilly, Sir John Leach, Mr Canning, and others, used the same language, and indulged in similar anticipations as to the effects of the measure that was then contemplated; and those Gentlemen now came in all the confidence of triumph, and said, 'Look at the result;' and, mingling a little pity for the illustrious dead with their feeling for the living, in whose behalf this argument was used, they said, 'See how the wisest of us all, when we overstep the bounds assigned by Providence to the human faculties, are deceived, and how our predictions are set at nought!' It was asked whether anything like what those distinguished persons foretold had since occurred—whether anything like a tendency to make the Great Seal a sinecure had happened? If he were to look to any one thing in the life of that illustrious, learned, wise, and virtuous person whose name had been just mentioned—Sir Samuel Romilly—upon which to found an indisputable claim to the respect and veneration of his posterity, he knew of no incident to which he would more readily appeal, for the vindication of his fame, than this particular one. Sir Samuel Romilly said, 'You will get less able men to fill the office of Lord Chancellor than while there has been only the Master of the Rolls. Hitherto, while this has been the case, the Government would not dare to give the Great Seal to any man whose ability for the discharge of his high functions was not conspicuous and acknowledged, and in whom the profession and the public had not a high confidence.' He (Mr Brougham) had a very high respect for the present Lord Chancellor. That eminent personage had disappointed him in some respects, although not in others. He wished to say nothing in the slightest degree partaking of harshness towards him; but, in the discharge of a duty which was rendered additionally painful by his personal respect for the Lord Chancellor, he thought, and he would therefore fearlessly say, that, latterly, the words of Sir Samuel Romilly had been verified, where he said that the contemplated measure would facilitate the giving the Great Seal to persons who, if there had not been a Vice-Chancellor, would probably never have held it. He did not know that his ears had served him rightly when he fancied he had heard it asked whether the appeals had increased. Why, he would ask in return, what did the Chancellor do except to hear appeals? And on this point he would rest the fame of Sir Samuel Romilly. Had any Chancellor ever heard fewer causes, had any Chancellor done so little Equity business as the present?—(hear, hear). But this was not necessary to his argument, for the Chancellor had now the assistance of the Vice-Chancellor. The records of the Court would show that, in the years which followed the appointment of the Vice-Chancellor, the Chancellor heard only one fourth of the number of causes that he had done before, but he probably heard ten times the number of appeals. The Lord Chancellor indeed heard a great number of bankrupt petitions, to which large fees were attached, and which were the most profitable business that a Chancellor or any other man could do—(hear, hear.) No complaints were made to that House of arrears or delay in disposing of bankruptcy business—(hear, hear);—at least certainly not of late years. He was not disposed to say anything invidiously of any individual discharging these important functions. God forbid that he should say anything of Lord Eldon in his absence, and when he was out of office, which he would not have advanced when he was in power. He had already, when that was the case, spoken of Lord Eldon's defects, as well as of his many and exalted merits and great legal accomplishments; but he had said, and he would repeat, that his manner of disposing of bankruptcy business formed a great contrast to the diligence which he exercised in administering the other business of his office. No man who knew Westminster Hall would doubt that the Court of Chancery was now become merely a Court of Appeal, and the effect of this Bill would be to preclude the necessity of the Lord Chancellor ever sitting to adjudicate an Equity cause in the first instance, from the beginning of January to the end of December. If he were asked whether on all occasions, and inflexibly, he would resist the appointment of an additional Judge, he would answer, 'show me the necessity, and I will yield.' But you are now beginning at the wrong end. First show me the reforms which you propose to make in the administration of the the business—(hear, hear). First smooth the avenues of the Court—make them more accessible to the public, and more easily and safely approached, by preventing the delays which beset the suitor from his first entrance into Court, down to that very remote date—if, indeed, such a period ever arrived—when his grandson, or some very distant successor, should be liberated by a decree of the Court.' He desired to see the plan for the diminution of the expenses which the Chancellor had promised to bring forward after due deliberation; but, notwithstanding which promise, he had done nothing, but now came and called for additional help over and above the journeyman whose aid he already enjoyed, and by the aid of which helpmate the arrears were now so much reduced. Why, he asked, should they now give relief to the Chancellor, when they ought to begin by giving relief to the suitor?—(hear, hear.) Let the Chancellor at least go pari passu with the unhappy victims of his jurisdiction. Let them share in the relief which he called for on his own account. It might be very fit that his services should be purchased at so large a price as was paid for them, but he put it to the House and the country, and he put it to those Honorable Members who, before many years passed over their heads, expected to meet their constituents—to them he put it, as he might safely do to their constituents themselves, that it would be decorous, before granting the prayer of the Lord Chancellor's petition for the relief and relaxation which he sought—or if not before, at least, at the same time—that he should be prepared with some plan by which some slight share of that relief and relaxation might be extended to the suitors in his Court. This, surely, was an humble or modest, and, he would say, a reasonable demand. As to the substitution of salaries for fees, he would observe that fees for the performance of judicial duties, if they were proportionate to the prolixity of the proceeding, were an abomination. They were a defeat of justice, a bribe to delay. That was the worst possible way of paying a Judge: but if those fees were not commensurate with the length of the proceedings—if one fee was paid by the suitor, once for all—that would be attended with no possible mischief; and if the Judge received a salary in that way for discharging those functions, which would be open and exposed to the eye of the world, it would be the safest possible way in which he could be remunerated; because he would not dare to take his salary and not discharge his duty. But the case was different with the Master in Chancery. He sat in silence and in the dark. He saw no one but the suitors who appeared before him. He had no public to watch him—no newspaper to report his proceedings. The only problem he would consider was, not how he could expedite justice to the suitor, but how he could get his own salary—(hear). This was a problem which all men studied, and which, when operating in the dark, they solved with an ingenuity which would do honor to any Senior Wrangler. What then would be his (Mr Brougham's) remedy for the evils of the Master's Office? He said 'Let in the light, open the doors, admit the public. Let the master be Judge in name, as he is in fact. He exercises the authority of a Judge. He has all the characteristics of a Judge, except his responsibility.' Place the Master under this check, and then they might pay him by salaries or by fees, whichever they pleased. There would be no mischief and no risk—(hear, from the Solicitor-General).

His Honorable and Learned Friend cheered him, and chid him by that cheer. It was meant to signify 'You need not now, at hal past one o'clock in the morning, occupy ou time in enlarging upon points upon which we ar all agreed.' His Honorable and Learned Frien would have him rest contented with the expectatio that hereafter some measures might be introduce to correct the evils of the Master's office. Bu how was he to know this? He must look at th Bill. What light did this Bill let in? The onl light he saw was the pleasant fee which dawne upon the dark office in Southampton-building whether much business was done or little busines was done, or no business at all was done. H was told that the Government was bent upon re form. As regarded some Members of the Govern ment, he entirely concurred in that belief. A Honorable Gentleman, judging of the Solicito General's feeling in this way, upon that judgmen grounded his support of the present measure; bu feelings were not always safe to be relied upo If he (Mr Brougham) were to trust his own feeling he should say that this was winter, whereas th Calendar told him it was midsummer. If h were to judge of the intentions of the Right Hon Secretary of State, he should believe him to b disposed for reform, not from his professions, bu from his actions—(hear, hear); because he ha been the protector of reformers—because he ha been a mighty shield and a tower of strength t the reformers, by cutting down that clamor whic had, heretofore, impeded all their efforts. H (Mr Brougham) had never felt the slightest jea ousy, even for those now no more, who had begu the great career in which the Right Hon. Gentl man had now so honorably begun; because h saw that, under circumstances which others migh for their own purposes, have used to stifle refor the Right Hon. Secretary had disinterestedly an wisely, for his own fame as well for the honor the country, been the friend of reformation. Bu if he were to judge of the Solicitor-General and the Lord Chancellor (and the only way in whic he could judge of them was by their actions; an by this measure, among the rest,) he would sa that all the Lord Chancellor had done was t recommend the payment of the Masters by sala and not by fees, which, under the accompanyin circumstances, might be the reverse of a reform tion; and as to his Hon. and Learned Friend, th only ground for reliance upon him was, that h said 'Pass this Bill; for aught you know, ne year some other Bill will be introduced to me other evils of which you complain.' Softly the he (Mr Brougham) said, with this Bill. Sufficie for the day is the good thereof. It was no refor to begin at the wrong instead of the right en He implored the House to recollect that, since th volume had been laid on the table, which had t night been held up in order to laugh at the arg ments used against this measure, times we changed—circumstances were changed—the Cou of Chancery was changed. The Master of t Rolls now sat so much longer, that he ought do 50 per cent more business than former Under all the circumstances, he would say to t House that the only safe course towards their co stituents, who were the people—the best answ they could make to the Chancellor's proposit would be, 'Redeem your pledge—let us s the facts, and then we will judge of the nec sity, and when, how, and as new help shall necessary to you, that new help you shall ha and not sooner, and no otherwise.'—(The H and Learned Gentleman sat down amid l cheers.)

NEW YORK SUPREME COURT.

FIRE POLICIES.

Mapes, Davis & Brooks vs. The Washington Ins. Co.

This was a feigned issue from the Court of Chancery. It was tried before Judge Edwards during Monday and Tuesday of the last week: and the jury gave in a sealed verdict on Wednesday. The following is a summary of the case: Amos Coffin, grocer, was indebted in 1828 to Mr Mapes. The former died about the 1st of April, 1828, leaving a will; and under which, Wm. Coffin acted as executor. Process was issued after Amos Coffin's death, to recover Mr Mapes' demand; and finally, on the 15th August, 1828, execution was taken out for $1585,35, and a levy made upon the stock of groceries left by Amos, and which were in the hands of his said executor. These groceries were in a store at the northeast corner of Maiden lane and Front street in this city. In order to give the executor time to try and satisfy the execution, a sale was not immediately insisted on; but while the levy was upon them, and before a sale, and on the 5th Sept. 1828, a fire took place, which caused a serious injury to the stock so levied upon, although the fire itself did not burn many of the articles. Now, Amos Coffin had from time to time, renewed a policy of Insurance upon his stock of groceries for $3500 with the Washington Insurance Company; and the last renewal was not out at the time of the fire. Mr Mapes found if necessary to file a bill in Chancery; and he got an injunction restraining the Company from paying, and the executor from receiving so much of the amount due under the policy as was his claim under the execution. About nine months afterwards, Messrs Davis & Brooks, having a debt which had been incurred by Amos Coffin, and having obtained a judgment, also filed an injunction bill, for the purpose of being paid out of the avails of the policy and trying to open Mr Mapes' claim. After pleadings had occurred and proofs gone into, both the suits were referred for decision to Esek Cowen, Esq. the intelligent Vice Chancellor of the fourth circuit. At his July term, 1830, in Ballston, the matters were argued.

Mr Charles Edwards, appeared as counsel for Jas. J. Mapes.

Mr W. T. McCoun, represented The Washington Insurance Company.

And Mr J. Blunt appeared as counsel for Davis & Brooks.

The principal points upon which the Company attempted to defend themselves from any liability were the following: That they ought not have been made defendants in the bills filed in Chancery, and therefore the same must be dismissed as against them: That the policy died with Amos Coffin. That the execution by Mapes divested the property: That the goods were not burnt: That the executor could not carry on trade: And that the executor ought to have had the policy endorsed to him: And for all these reasons the Company insisted they were not liable for any loss. Mr Edwards combatted the positions taken by the counsel for the Company; and also argued against Mr J. Blunt who objected to the priority of Mr Mapes' claim.

The Vice Chancellor gave a luminous opinion, and we here present such parts of it as may be found of service:

OPINION.

The insurance upon the goods was against all loss or damage which they might sustain by fire The answer denies all direct injury by fire, but admits theg oods may have been injured in consequence of removal at the commencement of the fire. There is proof that not many of the goods were burned, but they were very much injured, and many of them entirely destroyed in consequence of their being removed to prevent the communication of the fire, (6. Pick. 182 ,186; 2. Marsh. Rep. 132. Sol. Gen, arguendo,) so that the remnant sold at auction for only about $200. The question, as to the furnishing of the preliminary proof and the loss, with its extent, may, however, be better settled by a master, (4. Cowen. 645, 666;) or, more properly perhaps, by a feigned issue. I think the right under the policy continued to the executors. The clause that it should cease to operate on the transfer or termination of the testator's interest, by sale, or otherwise, or upon assignment of the policy, without consent in writing, does not apply. The interest of the assured did not terminate at his death: it continued in his executors. The assignment or transfer to them is by operation of law. The assignment or transfer intended by the policy is conventional. This distinction is a familiar one in the case of leases for a term, (Jackson vs. Corlis, 7. John R. 531, 534; Doe vs. Carter, 8; J. R. 57.) A covenant by the lessee not to assign is not violated by judgment, execution and sale. This is an act of law, a fortiori, where the property passes to an executor, by operation of law founded on the act of God, the death of the party. The English authorities, (Lynch vs. Dalzell. 4. Br. P. C. 431,) relied on against this doctrine, clearly go on the terms of the policy. The loss is there confined to the contracting persons only: and there is an express provision that the policy shall be continual to the personal representatives by an endorsement on the policy, (4 Br. P. C. 432; 2 Condy's Marsh, 800.) This practice distinctly appears in the report of Lynch. vs. Dalzell. The case is shown in other books, but the terms of the policy are not shown as the ground of the difficulty. It is of the nature of every promise to pass to the promisee's executor, who is an assignee in law, (Plow. Com. 288; 11, Vin. 158, pl. 10; Off. Ex. 100.) I agree that the consequence may be avoided by express stipulation. The landlord in his lease for a term may avoid an assignment even by operation of law. This will be seen by several cases put in Doe vs. Carter; but a covenant or condition not to assign or transfer generally, will not have that effect. Even the power to assign a policy conventionally, must be restrained expressly, for, in equity, it is assignable in its nature the same as any other chose in action, (per Ashurst J. in Delancey vs. Stoddart, 1, T. R. 26; 2, Condy's Marsh. 800; Phil. on Ins. 11.) Alhough this policy is payable to the insured or his assigns, and stops there; yet the law inserts the words executors or administrators, and to restrain or conquer this legal effect, the English clauses should have been inserted. The clause here is that the assignment or transfer shall not be made without the company's consent; clearly implying that some act of the insurer is intended; otherwise, there could be no consent. The policy could not mean consent to an act of Providence.

'Then the complainant caused his execution to be levied on these goods in the hands of the insured's executors: and it is insisted that the levy changed the property and terminated the interest of the assured. But this is clearly not the legal effect of the levy. The Sheriff acquired a lien on the goods, but nothing more. The general property remained in the executors (12 John. 407; 8, Id. 520.)

'Again, it is said the levy on sufficient goods, per se satisfied the execution; that the judgment is therefore gone, and the complainant has nothing to stand upon. I hardly think this would be holden, after the destruction of the goods by fire. Clearly it would not, if the Sheriff had been deprived of the goods by the act of the defendants. (Ontario Bank vs. Hallet, 8, Cowen, 192.) So, I apprehend, in case of an eviction, (12, John. 407;) and even after an actual sale of the wrong property and a satisfaction acknowledged, there should be relief. But if the legal consequence contended for be the true one, it only argues more strongly the necessity of interfering here to guard against the injury otherwise arising from this accident.

'It is argued that the Company are not liable to the complainant because they did not insure him. True they only insured the executors in respect to the goods levied upon. These goods were destroyed; and I agree that the complainant's bill, if it lie at all, must rest on the ground that the insurance money due shall come in the place of the goods; and that in the eye of a Court of Equity, to prevent the effect of the accident, the complainant should be made good out of money thus representing the goods. This strikes me as the difficult point in the cause; for I do not feel warranted, since the case of Donovan vs. Finn, (1 Hopk. 59,) to factorize this debt of the Company, and to make them liable as the debtors of the complainant's debtor, against whom his execution has failed. The insurance debt, as between the parties to the policy, is emphatically of legal cognizance, and is therefore directly within the case cited. The case in the Court of Errors of Hadden vs. Spader, (20, J. R. 254,) with which, it is supposed, Donovan vs. Finn interfered, was regarded by Chancellor Sanford, after much consideration, as going no farther than to warrant the conversion of equitable claims to the satisfaction of judgments. He said that all beyond was a mere dictum, which he would disregard. And the Revised Statutes (2. R. S. 173, 4§. 38.) which have since carried the doctrine out according to the resolution of the Court of Errors, were not in operation when this bill was filed. Although I have known Donovan vs. Finn to have been unfavorably received by several members of the Court of Errors on different occasions, yet it has never been overruled; and I shall not take it upon me to question the clear, deliberate and unreserved doctrine of the head of this Court. I the more readily avoid doing so in this case, because there is high and recent evidence that Chancellor Sanford went to the farthest verge of English Chancery jurisdiction. (Ottey vs. Lines, 7 Price, 274.)

'Indeed the complainant does not appear to found his claim on the cases authorizing a judgment creditor as it were to levy through a Court of Chancery on the chose in action of his debtor. To make out such a case it is necessary that he should show his fi: fa: to have been returned unsatisfied; or, at least, that there was in fact nothing which existed as the subject of a legal levy; a matter which should, I imagine, appear by the bill and which might form the subject of a distinct issue. I suppose he rather goes on the ground that he has obtained a judgment against these executors, which of itself gives a preference upon the assets; that he has made that preference still more distinct and specific by a levy on the insured goods. These are snatched from him by the accidental fire; whereupon, immediately, in respect to these identical goods, the debt due from the Insurance Company takes their place as assets in the hands of the same defendants, and is therefore, in equity, subjected to the same lien which bound the goods. And why should not this be so? True, the Company are not liable to the complainant as the insured; but he claims a right, under the circumstances, that they should pay to him directly what they must pay to the executors, and what he would have a right to claim of the executors after payment. He claims that the fruits of his legal diligence shall be preserved to him. His rights under the levy are gone at law; the subject upon which he reposed is destroyed; he claims that which must come in its place. Relief against the legal effect of accidents is a familiar head of equitable jurisdiction. An executor who paid on the faith of assets afterwards accidentally destroyed by fire, was relieved in Ex'rs. of Lady Crofft vs. Lindsey, (2 Freem. 1.) So, where executors became bound by recognizance to pay legacies on the faith of assets which were partly lost and partly destroyed by fire, the condition was relieved against (Holt vs. Holt, 1. Cas. Ch. 190.) These and the like decisions are on the broad principle that rights perfect at law shall be kept so, notwithstanding any accidental change, as far as a Court of Equity can relieve, without injury to any one.

'But connected with the doctrine of relief, against accident, the doctrine of conversion or substitution comes in. The complainant saw that the period was rapidly approaching when the insurance debt would become due; peradventure, the preliminary proofs might be waived and payment made by the Company immediately. At any rate, the time would shortly come, when that should be done; a time when this Court, for all equitable purposes, would consider it as done; the payment as actually made, and the money as being assets in place of the goods. He therefore files his bill, claiming the effect of this fiction, whenever the time should arrive. It passes. The money thus comes instead of the goods levied on. In what light is it to be viewed? In what other than as the goods themselves, and subject to the same burthen; the payment of the complainant's debt, leaving the balance, or surplus money, if any, to constitute assets for the payment of other claims? In this view it was important to keep the money distinct, so that it should not be confounded with other assets, and the effect of the levy lost. What is the rule of substitution in respect to personal property (and indeed all property) holden in trust? I answer in the words of Lord Ellenborough, in Taylor vs. Plumer, (3 M. & S. 562. 575.) The product of, or substitute for the original thing still follows the nature of the thing itself, as long as it can be ascertained to be such. There a broker had tortiously converted the money of his principal to a large amount into U. S. bank stock, U. S. 3 per cent funded stocks, and doubloons. Held, that the property of the substituted stocks and money vested in the principal. All the authorities are gone over in that case, and they fully establish that debts or money coming into the hands of a trustee as a substitute for the thing originally in trust, follows precisely the nature of the latter. An assignment of an outward cargo carries the return cargo purchased with the proceeds of the former (Conrad vs. Atlantic Ins. Co. 1 Peters' U. S. Rep. 447-8; De Wolfe vs. Harris, 4 Mass. R. 529, 530.) These things are especially so in the eye of a court of equity. Suppose the Company had settled with Coffin, the executor, and given him a promissory note for the insurance money; is there a doubt that the judgment and levy should have been applied to the note, and that the complainants, through this Court, might come in and take the money from the note to satisfy his debt? With these reasons are also conbined the admitted insolvency of W. Coffin, the acting executor. I conclude that the complainant (Mapes) is entitled to relief, provided there has been a loss within the policy, and the preliminary proofs were duly made. I cannot settle the amount due; I shall accordingly refer them to an issue.

'In the view I have taken of Mapes v. the Coffins and this Company, the complainants, Davis and Brooks, would have a right to come in junior to the defendant, Mapes, if their judgment had been followed by a levy. Even in such a case they must have been postponed to Mapes. As the case stands, they have obtained a judgment which covers the assets generally, including the fruits of the policy of insurance, subject to the prior claim of Mapes. The balance, if any, after satisfying him, would be paid to W. Coffin, the acting executor, and might then be recovered by the complainants, Davis & Brooks, in the course of a proceeding on their judgment at law. It seems, however, that the fi: fa: of the complainants has been returned nulla bona; that the Coffins are insolvent; and that if the balance go into their hands, there will be danger of losing it entirely. On this ground, I will retain the bill.'

Upon the trial of the feigned issue, Mr Charles Edwards opened the pleadings; Mr McCoun and Mr B. Ferris appeared for the Washington Insurance Company: and the former and Mr Edwards and Mr Blunt, also on the part of their respective clients, addressed the jury.

The Jury found that the preliminary proof had been delivered to the Company in proper time, and that the loss sustained within the policy was $1531 35—New York Journal of Commerce.

---

EXTRACT FROM THE GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

The importance to the community, of a prompt, able and efficient administration of Justice, will always secure to any proposition, by which it is designed to be facilitated, a favorable attention. It has of late been a subject of very general and just remark, that the increased business of the Supreme Judicial Court has occasioned a severe pressure on time for its regular and convenient transaction, and imposed upon the Judges oppressive labor in the discharge of their duties. In both these respects, I apprehend, much relief might be afforded, and great advantages every way produced, by transferring the Criminal Jurisdiction, except only in Capital cases, to the Court of Common Pleas. When it is considered, how that Tribunal now is, and always may be, composed, of men of talents, learning, and sound discretion, enjoying the full confidence of the People, there can be no distrust, that, from such change, there would still remain the same security to innocence, and like certainty of the just conviction of guilt.—The criminal code, from its object, and in the very nature of our Institutions, is plain and simple, and easy to be understood, rarely giving occasion, in the application of its principles to facts or in the proceedings upon trials, to new, subtle, and difficult legal questions. Should these occur, they may be referred, upon Exceptions, or a Report of the Presiding Judge, for consideration and ultimate decision, to the highest tribunal. It is also to be regarded, that the Grand and Traverse Juries are now by law constituted in the same manner in both Courts, being drawn by lot to serve in either, from the same Jury Boxes. Hence there would be no less qualification, or exercise of intelligence, in those with whom would rest the issues of fact.

As an additional consideration of much weight in favor of the alteration, the investigation of offences would be more prompt, from the greater frequency of the Terms of the Common Pleas. The accused, not unfrequently now are confined for a period of six months, waiting the Circuit of the Supreme Court for opportunity for trial. To the innocent, this imprisonment, in many cases, is scarcely less severe, than the punishment inflicted upon crime, while to the Guilty, it metes out no measure of atonement, and offers no aid to reform. To the State, also, as the Treasurer's Accounts will exhibit, it is attended with great, and to any purpose but a compliance with the law, as it seems to me, most gratuitous expense. The Terms of the Common Pleas are held with intervals of half the time, and from the information which I have of the sittings, and of the duties of the Judges, faithfully and vigilantly performed as they are, the additional assignment of the criminal business would not constitute an unreasonable requirement of service.

